THE COLONIZATION CAUSE.

It is perhaps generally known to our readers, that the colony of Liberia has become independent; that is, they are hereafter to have a Government of their own, and that they are left to struggle on in their infancy, we think will be shown by an extract from the speech delivered on the 13th at Lex-eight years ago, a few individuals met among them at Washington, and laid the foundation of the Society (Colonization Society) has gone on amid extraordinary difficulties and trials; sustaining itself almost entirely by spontaneous and voluntary contributions, from individual benevolence, without scarcely any aid from Government

"The Colonies, planted under its auspices are now well established communities, with churches, schools, and other institutions appertaining to the civilized state. They have made successful war in repelling attacks and invasions by their barbarous and savage neighbors. They have made treaties, annexed territories to their dominion, and are blessed with a free representative Government. I recently read a message from one of their Governors to the Legislature, which, in point of composition, and in careful attention to the public affairs of the Republic would compare advantageously with the messages of the Governors of our own States. I am not very superstitious, but I do solemnly believe that these Colonies are blest with the smiles of Providence, and if we may dare attempt penetrating the veil, by which He conceals His all-wise dispensations from mortal eyes, that He designs that Africa shall be the refuge and the home of the descendants of its sons and daughters, torn and dragged from their native land, by lawless violence."

The colonization cause has therefore an increased demand upon all who are anxious for the welfare of the colored people. To find an asylum in this country, where they can enjoy all the privileges of citizenship, is out of the question Here, if they obtain their freedom they have to toil for a mere subsistence, without the prospect or probability of reaching the level of their fellow men. In Liberia they not only find a home, but a country, where the distinction of color does not meet them There, competency, prosperity and honor await them; and from the evidence we have had in conversation with many who have resided in Africa, both white and colored, we are persuaded that as much comfort can be enjoyed there, as generally falls to the lot of man.

The New York Colonization Society are making increased efforts to meet the calls for the conveyance of emigrants For this purpose they have engaged the services of Rev. Dr. Humphrey, late president of Amherst College, to lay the subject before the inhabitants of this city and that gentleman is now delivering a course of lectures in the churches of various denominations. On Saturday last we noticed the discourse delivered the previous, Sabbath. Last Sunday Dr. Humphrey was in the Methodist Episcopal Church in Bedford street, and there addressed a crowded audience on the independence of Liberia. He gave a rapid sketch of the history of that country from the first settlement. The following is a very brief sketch of the doctor's remarks which we copy from the Journal of Commerce.

Most remarkable, indeed, he said had been the interpositions of Providence in behalf of Liberia, and most wonderful her progress in civilization. That going out from slavery the people should voluntarily have submitted to such laws, so far in advance of their own moral and intellectual advantages, is truly marvelous; the like has never before been seen in the world. And the eye that can see nothing to admire in this republic, springing up on a dark and savage coast, must be jaundiced indeed—the heart that does not leap for joy at their prosperity, must be in a state of mortal collapse: and the hand that is not now stretched forth to aid, must be hindered by a withering paralysis. She needs aid now especially. Liberia cannot rest in her present position. It is altogether anomalous. She owes no allegiance to any state on earth. Her towns were planted on the hill sides and on the alluvial bottoms of the rivers of Monrovia, by the hand of benevolence.

The question, What right have you to collect harbor duties? was constantly urged by the English and French. In these circumstances they felt compelled to a declaration of independence, which was accordingly made near the last of July, with the consent and advice of the Colonization Society, her patron, to take effect in January.

Some may think, if she has done so much, she may now take care of herself. But it must be remembered that she is poor, very poor—She has had to provide for herself a home in the wilderness, without funds, and almost without friends. She must not now be left to struggle alone with increased responsibilities. She wants more men now in all her departments.

The new independent aspect of Liberia said the speaker, places her claims upon new ground. It is for an independent republic we plead, and the more glorious for being composed of colored men. Henceforth the Colonization Society is the supporter of a new state, instead of the protector of a colony

What would New England have been without schools, and colleges and ministers; and how could she have provided them without funds from the mother country? Liberia has done what she could, and done nobly. As did our pilgrim sires, she first built the sanctuary and beside it the schoolhouse, in her land. but they need help to sustain them

If the sons of the New England and the middle states, need help in their Western homes to lay the foundations of moral intelligent society, how much more the sons of slavery in founding a Christian republic that is to be the great moral light house to the whole of Africa? She must have educated men to manage the affairs of her government, and to send abroad into the remoter tribes, daily appealing to them for teachers and preachers.

Liberia is planted not so much for herself as to prevent the slave trade, and to carry into the very heart of Africa, the lamp of the Gospel. She cannot indeed do every thing for that dark land, but who can set bounds to her usefulness?

As he looked from some eminence in the celestial city, he expected to see her 1,000 miles of coast lined with cities, and he should hope, 100 years hence, to see no ships in her harbors laden with hot thunderbolts—but he should see galleries of paintings, and of sculpture, adorning her cities—to see, instead of her blood-stained soil, fields waving with the richest harvests—to see, all over the land, schools and churches and colleges—to see civilization extended all over Africa, and to hear, not the thunders of the battle, but the general song of redeemed and enlightened millions.

THE HOLY LAND.

BY MISS HARRIET MARTINEAU.

Bethlehem, Zion and Jerusalem

As I set on a tomb in the Turkish cemetery the next morning, (March 30,) watching the preparations for our departure, I almost dreaded the interest which every day would now bring, after the calm and quiet weeks we had spent in the Desert. Our encampment looked much the same as it had done every morning for a month past, the Arab servants busy in taking down and packing the tents, and a noisy quarrelling going on in the midst—(this morning about a pistol having been stolen from one of the tents;) and the differences only that there were spectators standing by, and that our camels had given place to horses and asses But, instead of the rocks and sands of the Desert Hebron was before my eyes, and the hills where Abraham spread his flocks, and the spot where he and his family lay buried And before night I should see the place where David was born and lived his shepherd life, and Jesus was born. We had only twenty miles to travel this day to Bethlehem; but it was quite enough, for we were eager about every old tree, and well, and hill-top. The shrubs grew finer; and the wild flowers more abundant the whole way, though the hills of Judah were wild and stony in parts, and no longer fit for pasturing such flocks as covered them when Abraham lived among them, or when the Hebrews drove in their cattle from the Desert, or when David in his boyhood amused himself with slinging smooth stones from the brook, while his father's sheep were feeding on the slopes. We sat down to rest and eat under the shade of a rock and a spreading tree; and for the hundredth time since I life Egypt, it occurred to me, how little we in England can enter into the meaning of David, when, in his divine songs, he speaks of the shade of rocks and of the beauty of "a tree planted by rivers of water," and all such cool images When one has been slowly pacing on, hour after hour, over glaring sands or heated rock, under a sun which makes every bit of steel or metal on one's outer clothing, feel scorching hot, and oppressing one's breast, the sight of a patch of dark shade is beyond belief; and when one has reached and felt the coolness of the rocky ground beneath it, and gathered the wild flowers which cluster in its crevices, and thought of the Psalms and Prophecies which speak of it, and with a fine and fresh-blossoms in one's lap.

of Bethlehem was beautiful. early, just when the yellow churches. Bethlehem was on our right, massive looking (as all towns of Palestine are,) and shadowy, as the last sun rays passed over it to gild the western hills and another village which there lay hid up, embosomed in fig and olive orchards. The valley between, one of which we were rising, lay in shadow Before us perched on a lofty ridge which rose between us and Jerusalem, was the convent of St. Elias, which we were to pass to-morrow. I was sorry to turn away from this view; but we had to take the right-hand road, and ride through the narrow streets, of the village to the great convent, built over the spot where Jesus is believed by the friars to have been born

It was too late this evening to see any of the sacred localities; but it was quite enough to have the moon light streaming in during the whole night through the window of my lofty convent chamber, and to think that on this hill took place the greatest event in the history of the world; and that in the fields near, the gentle Ruth went about her gleaning, little dreaming, in those days of her poverty, that from her meeting with Boaz, among the reapers of his harvests, would arise such events to the human race; that the shepherd grandchild, whose divine songs were to soothe her old age, should be the mighty king he was, and the father of a yet mightier, who should build the great Temple of the Lord; and that a more distant descendant should make these glories appear as childish toys, in the presence of His greater sovereignty over the universal human soul A wise man of a late century has nobly said, that "Prosperity is the promise of the Old Testament, and Adversity that of the new." On this hill was born the prosperity of the Old Dispensation; and on this hill was born the Man of Sorrows, who knew the secret of true peace, and taught it in the saying that it profits not a man to gain the whole world, if he lose his own soul.

In the morning, we went into the church of the convent I cared little for the upper part, with its chapels for Greek, Latin, and Armenian worship; and not much more for the caverns under ground, where the friars believe that Joseph and Mary remained while there was no room for them in the inn. If the town was too full to receive them while the people were collected for the census, it is hardly probable they would repair to an underground cave; but in this case mass was going on this morning; and striking was the effect, after coming down from the sunshine, of the crowded cavern, with its yellow lights and their smoke and the echoes of the chanting. We returned when the service was over, and saw the star in the marble floor which marks, as the friars believe, the precise spot where Jesus was born, and the marble slab which is laid in the place of the manger. When I saw, throughout the country, how the Arabs now use the caves of the hills to bed their goats and cattle this belief of the friars appeared less absurd than it would with us; but still, it is so improbable that the precise spot of these transactions (whose importance was not known till afterward) should have been marked and remembered, that I felt little interested in them, in comparison with the landscape outside, about whose leading features there could be no mistake.

From the bottom of the garden we overlooked the great valley which expanded to the northeast; and one enclosure there—a green spot, now occupied by olive trees, was pointed out to us as the field where the shepherds were abiding on the night when Christ was born. Behind it to the east, lay ranged behind range of hills, stretched off to the north; and among these, we knew, lay the Dead, Sea and the Jordan, where it pours it waters into that lifeless and melancholy lake. As we left the convent and village, and descended the rocky road, with terraced vineyards and olive groves on either hand, we knew that Joseph and Mary must have come this way from Jerusalem, when summoned to the census; and this was more to us than all the sights the friars had shown to us in their zeal and kindness. We looked in at the tomb of Rachel, and at the convent of Elias; but our thoughts were bent toward Jerusalem. I remember, however, that there I first saw the waters of the Dead Sea, lying blue in a little gap between the hills.

As soon as I had mounted my ass before the convent of Elias, I saw from our ridge some buildings on the rising ground which now showed itself before us. I was not immediately certain what they were, but the news soon spread among us That rising ground was Zion, and those buildings belonged to Jerusalem, though they stood outside the walls. Immediately after, the walled city itself came into view, lying along the hills Most of the party were disappointed I was not—partly because I knew that we were approaching it from the least favorable side, and partly because my expectations had much underated the size and grandeur of the city. What we now saw was a line of white walls on a hill side, with some square buildings and small white domes rising within.

I walked the rest of the way. On our right were hills, the summit of one of which was Aceldema, bought by the priests with the money which the wretched Judas returned to them, when he found too late what he done in his attempt to force his Lord to asser his claim to a temporal sovereignty. On our left was the plain of Rephaim. When we arrived at the brow of the high ground we were on, we were taken by surprise by the grandeur of the scene. Zion now appeared worthy of her name, and of her place in the hymns of David, and in history. We were now overlooking the valley of Gihon, more commonly, known by the name Hinnom. From its depth, and its precipitous rocks on our side, I should call it a ravine. This deep dell contains the lower pool, now dry; and the aqueduct from Solomon's Pool is seen crossing it obliquely. Its opposite side is Zion, rising very steeply, still terraced for tillage in some parts, and crowned by the city wall. To the right, sweeping away from the ravine of Gihon, is the deep and grand valley of Jehosophat, clustered with rocks, relieved by trees, and leading the eye round to the slope of Olivet, which, however, is best seen from the other side of the city. The black dome of the tomb of David was the next object; and after that, the most conspicuous roof in the city—the great dome of the Mosque of Omar, which occupies the site of Solomon's temple.

By this time there was silence among us. I walked behind our cavalcade, as it slowly ascended the rocky way—glad of the silence permitted by each to all; for it was not possible at the moment—nor will it ever be possible—to speak of the impressions of that hour. We entered by the Jaffa gate; and every echo of our horses' feet in the narrow, stony, picturesque streets, told upon our hearts, as we said to ourselves that we were taking up our rest in Jerusalem.

Incident of Prussian Camp Life Three and Thirty Years Ago.

My captain, a Pole by birth, was brave as steel, but harsh and rough as the sound of his name. He was deficient in the finer feelings of the heart, in philanthropy, and in a due appreciation of the worth of fellow men. Although a good comrade to us officers, he was a tyrant to his inferiors. Envy and jealousy of his superiors he barely veiled under an almost exaggerated courtesy.

The major was long [illegible] sleep and snoring, but his servant, a cunning [illegible] dog, was still a foot, and watching his [illegible] to get possession of a long bean stick, [illegible] ed as an additional prop to the already se[illegible] ces under which his master slumbered. Myself and the soldiers were witnesses of this singular encounter. Accustomed to regard our superiors with fear and respect, we now beheld them in the most childish and ludicrous position. Astonishment kept us motionless and silent. At last the captain made a violent effort to wrest the pole from his antagonist: the major held firm, and resisted with all his strength, when suddenly, his oppenent let go his hold, and our major, a little round man, measured his length in the mud. In an instant he was on his feet again. Throwing away the bean stick, and stepping close up to his opponent, "To-morrow," said he, "we will settle this like men: here we have been like fools; and you, captain, a malicious one!"

"I accept your invitation with pleasure," replied the captain, "and trust our next meeting will be with bullets. But, for to-day, the [illegible] mine," and he seized it triumphantly.

"Certainly; yours to-day," retorted the major. "To-morrow we will fight it out upon my dirty cloak."

The morrow came, and the battle began, not however, between major and captain, but between French and Prussians. Silent we stood in deep dark masses, listening to the music of the bullets. "Firm and steady," was the command of our little major—of the same man who, a few hours before had played a childish part. Skirmishers were called in, and a charge with the bayonet ordered. The foe abandoned the first position. Animated by success we attacked the second. Our battalion hurried on from one success to another, and my gallant captain was ever the first to obey, in the minutest particular, the orders of our famous little major. The noble emulation between the two brave fellows was unmistakeable. In their third position the French had defended themselves with unparalleled obstinacy, and our young soldiers, in spite of their moral superiority, were compelled to recede. "Forward, my fine fellows!" cried the major; "Follow me, men!" shouted the captain, and, seizing the sinking standard, whose bearer had just been shot, he raised it on high, and dashed in amongst the foe. With a tremendous "Hurra!" the whole line followed, and Napoleon's "Vieille Garde" was forced to retreat.

The major gazed in admiration at his bitter opponent of the preceding day. Calling him to him, he clasped him in his arms. For a moment the two were enveloped in the cloak upon which they were to have fought. Words cannot describe that scene. Suddenly a cannon ball boomed through the air and lo! they lay upon the ground, shattered and lifeless—reconciliation their dying thought. The fight over, and our bivouac established in a stubble field, we paid them the last military honors. Fifty men, all that remained of my company, followed their bodies, and a tear stood in their eye as we consigned the gallant fellows to one grave.—The Examiner.

A CATALOGUE OF MISTAKES.

Little folks make mistakes. Great folks, and [illegible] make mistakes. Our mother [illegible] very outset, made a mistake, [illegible] ruinous; the cause of all [illegible] made a mistake, beastly [illegible] this example Abraham [illegible] denied his wife. Isaac [illegible] made a mistake; that [illegible] well nigh ruined [illegible] eternity. Jacob made [illegible] colors for his son Joseph. [illegible] sad mistake; he found it so [illegible] Moses, the meekest man [illegible], made a mistake at the Waters of Meribah. He gave not God the glory. Take care Sampson made a mistake; he lost his eyes and his life by it. Keep away from the Delilahs, keep away! David, the "sweet singer," made a mistake; blood guilty! Solomon, too, his son, the wisest man that ever lived, made a horrible mistake! he had a thousand wives and not a good one among them all! No wonder—one wife is enough for any one man; often one too many. Eli, the priest, made a very great mistake—his sons were vile, devilish, and he restrained them not. Quite common—wonder there are not more broken necks.) Peter made a mistake; he wept bitterly on account of it. John, even the beloved John, wished to command fire from Heaven to consume God's enemies! (Not so Christ.) The apostolic fathers made mistakes. Luther made mistakes. Calvin, Knox, our pilgrim fathers; ministers, lawyers, doctors, editors, make mistakes. We (our little self) makes mistakes; who has not? Every body makes mistakes. We are a bundle of mistakes. What of that? Knock a man down; task him, keep lashing him? merely for a mistake? Is this the Golden Rule? "To err is human, to forgive divine." What's the man doing? What's his aim?—his general character? Good? Good in the main? very good?—help him on, take him by the hand. Has he too much fire? Very well. don't put it out; temper it, modify it; pull his skirts a little; be kind to him, pray for him. Don't put out the fire! Even the errors of a good man should command our respect. Says an eminent writer—"The man who honestly seeks after Truth, who sincerely desires to promote the well-being of his fellow, is always an object of respect, be he ever so blinded by prejudice and fanaticism. There is nothing on earth more to be prized than an earnest, truth-loving man, struggling to wipe away the cob webs and dispel the vapors that obstruct his vision and keep out the rays of Heaven's blessed light." Help him; take him by the hand.

RANDOM LEAVES.

FORM A LADY'S DIARY IN PARIS.

BY MRS. A.C. GERRETTE.

'OUR little domicil was honored one evening by a visit from Mrs. R——, an English lady whose acquaintance we formed in London. She had just returned from Rome, after having visited all the most remarkable places in Europe.

'I am heartily tired of the continent,' she observed, 'there is, after all, "no place like home."'

'Perhaps not,' I replied; 'but surely you must have been amply paid for your toil by seeing the Alps, the volcanoes, the bay of Venice, the glorious works of art in Rome—'

'O, do not talk to me about Rome,' she said, interrupting my fine speech. 'I was only there three days, and then I was so dreadfully annoyed by filthy mendicants that I was deprived of all enjoyment. I became disgusted with Rome and the Romans, and gave Mr. R—— no rest until he took us away from the hateful place.'

'While in Italy you must have been gratified by a visit to Vesuvius?'

'O, yes, I did see Vesuvius, but I had not the slightest desire to approach it too closely. I care nothing about such curiosities as that.

'And did you see nothing in all your travels that afforded you any pleasure.

'Nothing, nothing, I assure you.'

'You regret, then, that you undertook the tour?'

'O, no; far from it. No one is fit to mingle in the first society who has not performed the tour of Europe. I do not regret that I made it, but I am glad it is so nearly concluded.'

Our friend departed next day for England. This is only one among many similar cases. Travelling like divers other customs, is done very often merely for fashion's sake. To be able to say, 'I have made the tour fo Europe,' is extremely gratifying, even to one who made the tour to no purpose.

I attended a dress ball at Mrs. F——'s, an English lady who has resided many years in Paris. The guests were nearly all English people, and almost every thing pertaining to the ball was conducted in English style. One French innovation, however, was tolerated,—that of ladies appearing unmasked, in male attire. There were several of these female exquisites present. The most conspicuous of the number was Miss P——, daughter of a deceased English officer, whose family temporarily resides in Paris. She was dressed in a full suit of gentleman's clothes, and was decidedly the finest looking beau present. She wore a blue cloth dress coat and buff vest of the latest mode, both highly ornamented with mirror-face gilt buttons of the most exquisite lustre; ruffled linen of faultless whiteness; a dark cravat, and pumps of bewitching neatness. Her nether garments were flesh colored woven silk, that might well have excited the envy of an opera dancer. Her dark hair was dressed in a profusion of short curls, and her whiskers were so ingeniously appended that they seemed perfectly natural. The masculine height of her person, the dress she wore, the 'stately novelty she displayed, and the 'graceful ease' with which see supported her character, all combined to make her a good counterfeit, and an immense favorite with the young ladies. I saw Miss P—— once afterward, in the Champs d'Elysees. She was then dressed in a black frock-coat, a white vest with gilt buttons, sky-blue pantaloons, a black hat and fashionable boots. She was in company with a young gentleman in military garb. Her companion was Lieutenant A——, her affianced husband, who was in a few days to lead her to the altar. Once married, it is hoped she will resume the costume of her own sex.

It must not be supposed that Miss P—— was eccentric in her taste. It is quite fashionable in Paris for females to don the garb of the sterner sex; and the English ladies residing in the city outdo the French themselves in this ridiculous, not to say indelicate custom. The most dashing coats and waistcoats, the most elaborate display of breastpins, safety chains and flashing buttons to be seen on the promenades, are sported by English ladies. Few of them, however, would dare to dress themselves, in this style when at home.

In France matches are sometimes made in the most whimsical manner. I heard of a case in which one was effected by an old hag who told fortunes, between two young persons who never had been acquainted. The young man, an engraver by trade having full faith in the pretensions of the old woman, visited her one day to foreknow his future history. 'Your fate is happy,' said the dame 'You are deeply beloved by a fair, light-haired girl, whose parents live opposite to your own lodgings. She will never confess her love until you declare an attachment on your own part; but this you cannot do before the moon wanes away. On the Sabbath after the next new moon, you will speak together by mutual involuntary impulse. After that all will be as you desire.' The old woman was at that very moment, expecting a call from the 'light-haired girl' herself. Not long after the exit of the youth, she made her appearance. The dame told her that she was beloved by a young man who lived opposite her house, and that she would become acquainted with him in the manner above stated, in short, her destiny was so shaped as to accomplish that of the young engraver. With full faith in the fortune-teller's prophecy, these young people narrowly observed each other whenever an opportunity offered. Both were good looking, and each was pleased with the appearance of the other. A fire of love was kindled in the breast of both, and long before the day of probation expired they were really in love, their hearts were irreconcrably lost. Meeting on the long-looked for Sabbath, they instinctively grasped hands, and lost no time in confessing a mutual attachment. They detected the trick of the old hag, but that did not make the true course of their love run, 'uneven.' In due time they were married and doubtless they are as happy as any couple in France.

Taking advantage of a fine morning, I assayed out as far as Rue de la Paix, to suit myself with a bonnet. I entered a magnificent establishment, and found myself in the midst of a crowd of lady customers, who were overhauling every article before them. Such a chatter as beset my ears I never heard before. Expressions of approbation, Gallic ejaculations, and various other species of talk mingled in wild confusion. The barroom of a country inn, on the day of a grand militia training, was not more noisy than was this saloon of 'modes et des modes.' I made my purchase as soon as I could command the attention of one of the pretty shop-girls, and made good my retreat to a more quiet place. The shop of the milliners are generally the most showy establishment in Paris. The fashions all originate with the Parisians, and no women are more clearly entitled than they are to this important prerogative. Their taste in matters of dress is inimitable; and all Europe aims at copying their costumes, because they cannot themselves originate any thing of equal beauty.

SINGING MOUSE.

The last number of the Journal of the Franklin Institute describes in the following manner, a natural curiosity which had been exhibited at the September meeting of the Institute.

"A natural curiosity was next exhibited, which excited considerable interest. This was a Singing Mouse, which, though declining on this occasion to perform in its best style, yet gave sufficient proof that its musical powers are wonderful, for an animal of its kind. It is a common domestic mouse, (Mus Musculus,) and in appearance differs, in no remarkable particular, from other individuals of its species.

It was the musical talent of this little creature which led to its capture. A lady, who kept some canary birds in her room through the day but who was in the habit of having the cages removed to another apartment for the night, happened to hear, after retiring a musical chirruping in the room, apparently proceeding from beneath a bureau. Supposing that one of her birds had escaped from its cage, and remained in the room, she attempted to dislodge it from its supposed concealment. No bird, however, made its appearance; but a mouse was startled from beneath the bureau, and ran to another part of the room, where it recommenced its song. It was caught and confined in a cage, which it has now inhabited about six weeks; having become quite tame, and evidently recognizing individuals, by showing more familiar regard to its keeper than to strangers.

It is seldom entirely silent, except when sleeping; almost constantly emitting a low chirping series of notes, resembling, somewhat, the twittering produced by a nest of young birds. As the evening advances, its musical disposition is more fully developed, until, usually, towards midnight, its notes increase in power, compass and variety—it then frequently pours forth a gush of melody, resembling the song of a canary bird; but softer and less shrill than the notes of the feathered songster."—The Christian Mirror.

Hazlitt's advice to his Son

From Hazlitt's advice to his son going home from school, we select the following item which contains more sound sense, and a deeper perception of human nature than is dreamt of in every one's philosophy:

The World.—Do not begin to quarrel with the world too soon; for bad as it may be, it is the best we have to live in—here. If railing would have made it better, it would have been reformed long ago—but as this is not to be hoped for at present, the best way to slide through it is as contentedly and innocently as we may. The worst fault it has, is want of charity, and calling knave for fool at every turn will not cure this failing. Consider as a matter of certainty that if there were not so many knaves and fools as we find, the wise and honest would not be those rare and shining characters that they are allowed to be;—and (as a matter of philosophy,) that if the world be really incorrigible in this respect, it is a reflection to make one sad and not angry. We may laugh or weep at the madness of mankind, we have no right to vilify them for our own sake or theirs. Misanthropy is not the disease of the mind at human nature; but with itself; for it is laying its own exaggerated vices and follies at the doors of others! Do not, however mistake what I have here said. I would not have you when you grow up adopt the low and sordid fashion palliating existing abuses of putting the best face upon the worst things. I only mean that indiscriminate unqualified satire can do little good and those who indulge in the most revolting speculations of human nature, do not themselves always set fairest examples, or strive to prevent its lower degradation.—The Examiner.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA, MAY 26, 1848.

Palm Oil.

This article which is now the principle object of attraction to our merchants, is, we are informed becoming quite plentiful down the coast. If foreigners will cease to trespass upon our territory, and confine their trading to ports of entry, their property will be more secure,—they will be free from the exhorbitant demands of the African Chiefs, and in all probability obtain as much oil, if not more, than they would by trading with the natives. The imposition which is practiced upon foreigners by the natives, our people are exempt from, and it need not be expected that the foreigner will receive the same kindness from them as we do. The American, the French, and German traders know this full well, and have no trade on our coast, except at our ports of entry.

The New York Journal of Commerce says, that the colored people of New York, are about sending out persons to Liberia to ascertain its condition, with the intention of making a great move, if their report be favorable.

It is reported, that a Crewman has been purchasing slaves in the neighborhood of Little Cape Mount—this report has been rumored in our town, and seems to be confirmed, as Prince Bob Cain of Grand Cape Mount, has made a statemant to the effect in a letter, to a gentleman of this place. The Executive, we are informed, sent a person to Little Cape Mount to ascertain the truth of this report, but we have not heard of his return. We are of opinion however; that the Crewman could not have made many purchases, as we are informed, that Mr. Green of this town, who has been at, and in the neighborhood of Little Cape Mount for several months past, saw nothing of this Crewman, but heard that slaves were wanted for the Gallinas market, and it was probable that some had been procured.

If only one slave has been purchased at that place, we hope the Executive will take immediate steps to bring its Chief, to a severe reckoning for permiting the traffic to be carried on in or about his neighborhood.

The "Liberia Packet" brought information that Lieutenant Commanding Alexander G. Gordon, of the U. S. Brig "Porpoise," has been promoted to the rank of Commander.

Agriculture.

We are rejoiced to see the interest, which all classes of our citizens are taken in the cultivation of the soil. From all parts of the Republic; we hear, that as a general thing, they are turning their attention to this most important of all branches of industry; and in consequence the value of farming lands, is somewhat on the advance. The beautiful banks of the St. Paul's and the St. John's, will in a very few years, present a prospect that will richly repay the visiter for any trouble he may have in wending his way up these noble streams. Already may be seen rich fields of rice, sugar cane and other productions, adorning these banks. The cultivation of ginger, pepper, arrowroot, ground-nuts and coffee are engrossing all minds—these articles will be for exportation, and will well repay the cultivater for any outlay it may be necessary for him to make, while they are coming to perfection.

Coffee the most valuable of all our productions, will require some four years to grow, before it will give to the cultivator any income—but it will be recollected that after that time, the tree with little or no labor be sowed on it, will yield two crops a year. The quality of the Liberia coffee, by competent judges, is pronounced to be equal to any in the world. In numerous instances we have seen trees full of coffee, only three years old. The other articles if planted at the commencement of the rainy season, will arrive at maturity in less than one year from the time of planting.

Orders have come from Sinoe for "seed-ginger," and we are gratified to learn, that a supply has been sent them. We have every reason to believe, from the well known industry of the people of that county, that every exertion will be used, to raise this article, with the other articles we have named, in the greatest abundance.

Liberia Sugar

Mr. Cyrus Willis of Millsburg has made this season more than three thousand pounds of beautiful sugar, with a quantity of excellent syrup. Owing to a serious accident which befel Mr Willis, just as he was ready to commence grinding, and which kept him in his bed several weeks, he was unable to manufacture all of his large field of cane, and which lessens considerably, the quantity of sugar and syrup he expected to make. From the quantity of beautiful cane he had, it was supposed, that it would yield easily eight thousand pounds of sugar and a considerable quantity of syrup.

The Schooner Herold of Hamburg Condemned.

On the night of the 27th, ultimo, the Schooner "Herold" of Hamburg, J. J. Kruger master, in coming out of Cape Palmas harbor, was run into by a barque, which proved to be the "Cistrean" of Liverpool, Armstrong master, bound for the Benny river—both vessels suffered severely, especially the Herold, she being by far the smallest vessel. The Cistrean was sailing before the wind, when the collision took place, and came down with great force upon the Herold, causing a tremendous concussion, and making the Herold a perfect wreck—carrying away her bowsprit, jibboom, stem and cut-water clean off the bow. The Cistrean sustained less damage—her bulwarks were stove in, some yards sprung, and spars broke and carried away; besides both vessels had to cut away, considerable of their standing and running rigging, in order to get clear of each other. The master of the Cistrean sent his boats on board of the Herold, to ascertain the nature of her damages, and to return several of her crew, who had during the collision, jumped on board his vessel. The master and supercargo of the Herald having expressed their determination not to leave their vessel, the English Captain returned to his barque, and kept with the Herald until day light, when he proceeded on his voyage. The Herold after a long and troublesome passage arrived in this port on the 14th inst. where she found the U. S. Brig "Porpoise," Lieutenant Commanding Alexander G. Gordon, and several other vessels. Commander Gordon, at the request of the Master and Supercargo of the Herald, ordered a survey to be held on board the Herold. The survey was held on the 16th, inst: by Benj. F. Sands Esqr., 1st Lieut. of the U. S. Brig "Porpoise," Captain R. E. Lawlor of the Ship Madonna of New York, and S. J. Gamage of the barque Adoline of New York. The Herold was pronounced, by these gentlemen, to be unseaworthy, and in consequence was condemned. She will be sold here as soon as her cargo is landed.

We have received by the "Liberia Packet" the last Annual Report of the American Colonization Society, in which, there is much to interest our Liberia readers. We will in our next number, make some extracts.

The Liberia Packet.

This beautiful vessel, with her pleasant and accommodating commander, James H. Goodmanson, Esq. arrived in our port on the 16th, inst: after a passage of 32 days from Baltimore. She brought out 140 immigrants for Grand Bassa, and 4 for Cape Palmas. Among the passengers, are Elders S. S. Ball, and Walker.—Mr. Ball comes at the instance of the Convention of the Colored Baptist Churches, in Illinois, and Mr. Walker is sent out by the Colored People of the State of Ohio. The mission of these gentlemen, is, to ascertain the true condition of Liberia. If they become favorably impressed with its state and condition of things, such will be their report to their constituents, and it is supposed that large numbers will imigrate to this Republic from these States.

Religious.

The Providence Baptist Church of this town, has elected Elder Boston J. Drayton its Pastor, particular as a preacher, and very agreeable body of Christians, ever wh[illegible] side. Elder Drayton comes to [illegible] pices of the American [illegible] Society, and it is hoped that [illegible] tership of this church, will [illegible] cordial approbation of his Board.

The Launch.

On the 15th, inst: a handsome, and respectable sized craft was launched from the wharf of our esteemed fellow citizen, James B. Mc Gill, Esqr.—She is now being rigged into a scheoner, and will shortly leave for our trading points. We wish her every success.—she is owned by Mr. Mc Gill, and is called the "Patsey."

Sudden death of a U. S. N. Officer.

We have received the following sad intelligence from a gentleman on board the Porpoise

On Tuesday evening, the 11th of April, on board of the U. S. Brig Porpoise, while lying off St. George de Elmina, on the West Coast of Africa, at 20 minutes past 8 o'clock P. M. Passed Midshipman F. P. Wheelock, died suddenly. He was for some time previo to his demise, evidently labering under mental derangement. His remains were deposited at that place, in the Government burial ground with the funeral rites of the Episcopal Church, and with military honors: and much lamented by his brother officers.

"Many," says Newton, have puzzled themselves about the origin of evil. I observe there is evil, and that there is a way to escape it; and with this I begin and end.—Ibedem.

A SLAVER CAPTURED.

About two weeks since a Brazillian schooner, a prize to H. B. M. Ship Fire Fly went into Sierra Leone, with two hundred and thirty five slaves. She was taken off Gaboon—when taken, she had on board two hundred and seventy. These were crowded into a vessle of such small demensions, that in the space of twenty days, thirty five of these perished. If these pirates would only have vessels large enough to preserve the lives of the poor creatures, it would perhaps render their traffic somewhat less horrible on the score of humanity, if indeed there can be any modifide grade to a crime so high and henious in the sight of God, and man.—Africa's Luminary.

Mr. Editor,—I take this opportunity to inform you of the health of the late immigrants under my medical care at the settlements of Virginia and Monrovia. The company by the Amazon, and twenty nine of the company per Barque Nehemiah Rich from Kentuckey, numbeing in all about seventy five, all of whom have been attacted with the acolimating fever and nearly all may now be considered convalescent. I have lost one, who died however not of fever, for he had been attacted and was in a degree convalescent, but while yet in a debilitated state from the effects of the fever, was taken with an attact of cholera morbus, which prostrated him at once, and he sunk in a state collapse.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

NEW GOODS!

The least that I can say is, that my stock is large in the total, being very near half the Bark Montgomery's tonnage. But small in the various varieties. It is therefore, useless to attempt to articulate the assortments of staple and fancy Dry goods, the new fashions of both Europe and America, Groceries, Hardware, provisions, drugs, medicines, and dye stuffs. And that minutia of things which pertain to ladies tastes. Let all imagine that they can get almost any thing at Roy's new store, on the fairest terms. Any and every thing will be sold for cash down, or the products which will bear exportation. Removed to my new store house onwater street.

The Truth told by Mistake.

The St. Louis Reveille states that in cutting the name for the inscription over the door of the new Catholic church, lately built at Ste Genevieve, in the Southern part of that State, the boy failed to find the workmen to cut upon it the following words; 'My house shall be called the house of prayer,' and to have it correct, he referred him to the verse in the Bible. The mason proceeded to work and cut the whole verse as follows: 'My house shall be called the house of prayer, but you have made it a den of thieves!' The house was consecrated before the mistake was discovered. Upon ascertaining it, the context was puttied up and painted over.—The Christian Mirror

Running in Debt.—Every young man should be ware of running in debt. Running in debt will certainly injure him. Those to whom he is indebted will think less of him for it.—Work, earn and buy what you want. Economize and get along; beg or borrow, but don't get trusted! We have known many young men to injure themselves by becoming involved in debt. Many persons speculate on the property of others and run great hazards on their money, but we rarely ever see the reckless with what they have labored hard for and accumulated themselves.—The Examiner.

POETRY

The Tiller of the Soil.

BY DAVID L. ROATH.

A hardy, sunburnt man is he,
A hardy, sunburnt man;
No sturdier man you'll ever see.
Though all the world you scan.
In summer's heat, in winter's cold,
You'll find him at his toil—
Oh, far above the knights of old,
Is the Tiller of the Soil!

No weighty bars secure his door,
No ditch is dug around;
His walls no cannon bristle o'er.
No dead lie on his ground.
A peaceful laborer is he,
Unknown in Earth's turmoil—
From many crushing sorrows free,
Is the Tiller of the Soil!

His treets are seen on every side,
His barns are filled with grain;
Though others hail not fortune's tide,
He labors not in vain.
The land gives up its rich increase,
The sweet reward of toil,
And blest with happiness and peace,
Is the Tiller of the Soil!

He trudges out at break of day,
And takes his way along,
And as he turns the yielding clay,
He sings a joyful song.
He is no dull unhappy wight,
Bound in misfortune's coil;
The smile is bright, the heart is light,
Of the Tiller of the Soil!

And when the orb of day has crown'd
With gold the Western sky,
Before his dwelling he is found,
With cheerful faces by—
With little laughing duplicates,
Caresses will not spoil;
Oh, joy at every side awaits
The Tiller of the Soil!

A hardy, sunburnt man is he,
A hardy, sunburnt man;
What wise can boast a hand so free,
As he, the Tiller, can?
[illegible] heat nor winter's cold,
[illegible] has him to foil—
[illegible] the knights of old,
[illegible] the Soil!

MISCELLANEOUS.

Birds.—A gentleman of our [illegible] weeks since, remarked an [illegible] brown thrushes in a thick- [illegible] its residence. His attention [illegible] towards them for several [illegible] their loud cries and excen- [illegible], he was at length induced to [illegible] more closely the cause of this un- [illegible] congress, of his feathered tenants [illegible], if possible, the cause of their [illegible]. Upon examining the thicket, he discovered a female thrush suspended by one leg to a limb. Near by was her nest containing several half grown birds.—From the attendant circumstances he concluded that the maternal bird must have become entangled before the process of incubation was completed, and that some kindhearted neighbor had supplied her place in hatching and breeding her callow offspring. He withdrew a few rods, and the committee of relief immediately resumed the self-imposed duty of administering "aid and comfort," in the form of worms and other insects, alternately between the mother and her young—she, in the meanwhile cheering them on in their labor of love with the peculiar note which first led to the discovery of her situation. Having watched this exhibiton of charity for half an hour, our informant relieved the mother bird.—She immediately flew to her nest, expressing her gratitude by her sweetest notes.—Her charitable friends, 'their occupation now being gone,' as the police reporters say, dispersed to their respective places of abode, singing as they went, a song of joy.

The above statement may be relied on in every particular. The many pleasing reflections which it suggests we leave to be recorded by some of our friends abroad.—Presbyterian of the West.

Be Comprehensive.—We commend the following pithy remarks, from the Portland Bulletin. Do, what thy hand findeth to do, with thy might! Do it now! "Be short."—Golden Rule.

"Talk to the point, and stop when you have reached it. The faculty that some possess, of making one idea cover a quire of paper, is not good for much. Be short and comprehensive in all that you say or write. To fill a volume upon nothing is no credit to any body; though Lord Chesterfield wrote a very clever poem upon Nothing. There are men who get one idea into their heads, and but one, and they make the most of it. You can see it and almost feel it when in their presence. On all occasions it is produced, till it is worn as thin as charity. They remind one of a twenty-four pounder discharged at a humming-bird; you hear a tremendous noise, see a volume of smoke, but you look in vain for the effects.—The bird is scattered to atoms. Just so with the idea. It is eveloped in a cloud, and lost amid the rumbling of words and flourishes. Short letters sermons, speeches and paragraphs, are favorites with us. Commend us to the young man who wrote to his father—"Dear sir, I am going to be married;" and also to the good old gentleman, who replied—"Dear son, go ahead.

Such are the men for action. They do more than they say. The half is not told in their cases. They are worth their weight in gold for every purpose in life. Reader be short—and we will stop short with the advice,"—Carolina Baptist.

The Art of Being Agreeable.

The true art of being agreeable is to appear well pleased with all the company, and rather to seem all entertained with them than to bring entertainment to them. A man thus disposed, perhaps, may have not much learning, nor any wit; but if he has common sense, and something friendly in his behaviour, it conciliates men's minds more than the brightest parts without this disposition; and when a man of such a turn comes to old age, he is almost sure to be treated with respect. It is true, indeed, that we should not dissemble and flatter in company; but man may be very agreeable, strictly consistent with truth and sincerity by a prudent silence where he cannot concur, and a pleasing assent where he can. Now and then you meet with a person so exactly formed to please, that he will gain upon every one that hears or beholds him; this disposition is not merely the gift of nature, but frequently the effect of much knowledge of the world and a command over the passions.—Spectator.

The Wife's Universal Rival.

It must ever be borne in mind that man's love, even in its happiest exercise, is not like woman's for while she employs herself through every hour in fondly weaving one beloved image into all her thoughts, he gives to her comparatively few of his; and of these perhaps neither the loftiest nor the best. * * It is a wise beginning, then, for every married woman to make up her mind to be forgotten through the greater part of every day; to make up her mind to many rivals, too, in her husband's attentions, though not in his love; and among these I would mention one whose claims it is folly to dispute, since no remonstrances or representations on her part will ever be able to render less attractive the charms of this competitor. I mean the newspaper, or whose absorbing interests some wives are weak enough to evince a sort of childish jealousy, when they ought rather to congratulate themselves that their most formidable rival is one of paper.—Mrs. Ellis's Wives of England.

The end of rank and station.

What will be our end? Let us not evade the inquiry, for why should we be enemies to ourselves? In the end, station, standing, and acquirements, and worldly reputation will avail us nothing—for God is no respecter of persons. In the end, the great will be little in their own eyes, and heroes will be things of small concern, Czars and Cæzars will be reft of their tiaras, and emperors and kings will be lightly esteemed. The Diveses of all nations will be stripped of their purple, and lowly Lazaruses clad in goodly raiment; the humble heart will then be exalted, and the proud in spirit will be brought low. Death is a sad leveller, for he steals from the monarch his crown, from the bishop his mitre, from the soldier his scarlet coat and gilt epaulettes, from the scholar his book, and from the miser his money-bags. The Judgment day will make the mighty mean, bring down the haughty look, afflict the cruel, unmask deceit, and make oppression tremble. What then is our hope? and what will be our due?—Religious Herald.

LATE HOURS

All animals, except those that prowl at night, retire to rest soon after the sun goes down, from which we may conclude that nature intended that the human species should follow their example. It is from the early hours of sleep, which are the most sweet and refreshing, that the reaccumulation of muscular energy and bodily strength takes place, as well as of that due excitability in the brain indispensable to the operation of our waking hours. Sleep has been called the "chief nourisher in life's feast," but how few find it such! In order that sleep may be refreshing, it is necessary to take sufficient exercise in the open air during the day, to take a light supper, or none at all, avoiding tea or coffee late in the evening, to sleep on a hair matress, with a slight covering of bedclothing, in a room freely ventilated. It is well known that the Duke of Willington, now a hale old man, is accustomed to sleep on a narrow, hard pallet; and we believe the couch of her Majesty is also of the simplest possible construction. It is reported that the Duke justifies the narrowness of his resting place on the plea that when a man wishes to turn, it is then high time to get up.—We seldom hear the laborious peasant complain of restless nights. The indolent pampered epicure, or the man who overtasks his brain and denies himself bodily exercise, is very liable to sleeplessness.—English Paper.

TALLEYRAND'S DEATH-BED.

For nearly half a century this veteran diplomatist acted a prominent part in the affairs of Europe. As the prime minister or ambassador of the directory, the consulate, the empire, the restoration, and the monarchy of Louis Philippe, he negotiated the important treaties which determined the boundaries of empires and the fate of kingdoms, and formed plans which made Napoleon an emperor, and the emperor an exile. Such a man's view of an eventful life of fourscore years, furnishes instructive lessons to men who are wasting the energies of being on political ambition or worldly aggrandizement. Just before his death, a paper was found on his table, on which he had written, by the light of the lamp, such lines as these:

"Behold eighty-three years past away! What cares! What agitation! What anxieties! What ill-will! What sad complications! And all without other results, except great fatuige of mind and body, and a profound sentiment of discouragement with regard to the future, and disgust with regard to the past!"

Constrast with this the exclamation of "Paul the aged," as he was about closing his earthly career: I have fought a good fight; I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous Judge shall give me at that day." A death-bed is the triumphal chariot of the useful Christian, however humble; it is the executioner's cart of the worldly unbeliever, however exalted.—American Messenger.

From the American Messenger.

ETERNITY

What is the eternity of God? Existence without begining, or end. Who can comprehend it? Run your thoughts back, as far as the utmost stretch of imagination, even millions of ages before creatures were made—God existed, and was as old as he is now, or as he will be, when millions of ages more are passed away. From everlasting to everlasting he is God.

What is the eternity of creatures? Existence without end. Such is our inheritance, to live forever and ever. No period of years, or revolution of unnumbered ages, will diminish aught of the duration which will still lie before us. Here we have no abiding place. Time is hastening us into eternity. All we do is for eternity. We are forming characters for eternity. The thoughts we indulge, the feelings we cherish, the words we utter, the works we do, are all drawing the features of our moral likeness. How short and uncertain is the period of our probation. How soon will our deathless souls rise to the joys and employments of heaven, or plunge into the world of hopeless despair!

Do you wish your present character to remain unchanged for ever? Is your preparation all made; is your lamp trimmed, and your light burning for eternity?

Drive away Drive away—the world was not made in an hour. Because you do not see the beneficial effects of one upon line—blow upon blow—word upon word—will you sit still, hang up your hammer, shut your mouth and throw away quill? To advance one new idea—to break one link in the chain of vice—to reclaim an inebriate—is glory enough even though you spend a lifetime at it. Why, sir, thousands have labored for half a century and died without seeing the effects of their exertion. The good seed at last sprang up and made their graves forever green. Ten years of diligence produce the immortal "Elegy in a Church Yard," while only as many months opened to the advent gaze of Columbus a new and wonderful world. A word has effected more than the labors of a whole life. Who knows what will be the effect? Then drive away at the citadel of error—relax no effort—slumber not at your post—and as sure as God reigneth, you will not labor in vain.—Weekly Appeal.

A Fall Indeed.—In the last Wilmer & Smith's Times, is a well written article, headed "Progress of Mercantile distress in England," which contains a blunder very absurd and amusing, yet some times made by our trans-atlantic brethern as well as those near home. The writer, in sketching the progress of commercial disaster, says:—"Cotton had fallen more than £2 per bale, wheat more than 100 per cent., &c. Now this is equivalent to to saying that wheat had declined to less than nothing in England, a circumstance which the "commercial letters and circulars" have hitherto kept us in the dark about. If so, there's "speculation in it."—Ibedem.

A test of friendship.

"I weeded my friends;" said an old eccentric friend, "by hanging a piece of stair carpet out of my first floor window, with a broker's announcement fixed; it had the desired effect. I soon saw who were my friends. It was like firing a gun near a pigeon house; they all forsook the building at the first report, and I have not had occasion to use the extra flaps of my dining-table since."—The Priesbyterian.

Censoriousness.—He who blames, others the most, is usually the most to be blamed. A quick eye to detect faults of another, has usually a blind side to its own. A sharp tongue is moved by an unquiet spirit and an unquiet spirit wanteth not words and complainings. To rebuke, reprove, exhort, with all long suffering and patience and prayer is one thing. To reprove sharply, and with a censorious spirit is another.—"Thou hyecrite, first cast the beam out of thine own eye, then thou shalt see clearly to cast the mote out of thy brother's eye."—Southern Presbyterian.

Pungent Reply.—To a young infidel who scoffed at Christanity on account of the misconduct of some of its professors, Dr. Mason said, "Did you ever know an uproar made because an infidel went astray from the paths of morality?" The infidel admitted he had not. "Then," said the Doctor, "don't you see that you admit Christianity is a holy religon, by expecting its professors to be holy; and that thus, by your very objection, you pay the highest compliment, in your power?"—Ibedem

FORGET YOUR INJURIES.—He is unwise and unhappy—extremely so—who never forget the injuries he may have received. They come across the heart like dark shadows, when the sunshine of happiness would bless him, and throw into a tumult that not easily subsides. The demon of hate reigns in his bosom and makes him of all accountable creatures, the most miserable.—Ibedem.

BLACK AND WHITE PAINTS.—Tools, wagons, &c., painted black, absorb the sun's rays, become hot, and warp, and crack. Painted white, they reflect and do not absorb the rays, and consequently do not become hot, and they remain unharmed by warping. Hence all wooden utensils should be painted of some light color.—National Christian Advocate.

What is Religion Without Sympathy!

The universe is [illegible] is easy of attainment even on the most [illegible] many attempts that have been in all ages to construct a christian Character, omitting sympathy. It has produced numbers of people, walking up and down the narrow plank of self-restraint, pondering over their own merits and demerits, keeping out, not the world exactly, but their fellow creatures, from their hearts, and caring only to drive their neighbors before them on this plank of theirs, or to push them headlong. Thus with many virtues, and much hard work at the formation of character, we have had splendid bigots or censorious small people.—Friends in Council.

Humility.—Of all trees, I observe that God hath chosen the vine—a low plant that creeps upon the helpful wall; of all beasts the soft and patient lamb; of all fowls, the mild and guileless dove. When God appeared to Moses it was not in the lofty cedar, nor the sturdy oak, nor the spreading palm, but in a bush—an humble, slender, abject bush As if he would, by these selections, check the arrogance of man. Nothing procureth love like humility; nothing hate like pride.—Presbyterian of the West.

The Two Heaps.—"I see in this world," said Rev John Newton, "two heaps—one of human happiness, and one of misery: now, if I can take but the smallest bit from the second heap, and add to the first, I carry a point. If, as I go home, a child has dropped a half-penny, and if, by giving it another, I can wipe away its tears, I feel that I have done something. I should be glad, indeed, to do great things, but I will not neglect such little ones as this—Ibid.

Going to Law.—Dr. Johnson compared plaintiff and defendant, in an action of law, to two men ducking their heads in a bucket, and daring each other to remain longest under water.

Complaint.—To hear complaints was patience, even when complaints are vain; is one of the duties of friendship: and though it must be allowed, that he suffers most like a hero who hides his grief in silence, yet it cannot be denied, that he who complaints acts like a man—like a social being, who looks for help from his fellow-creatures—Rambler, vol 2.

LECTURE XIV.

Jurisprudence.

Jurisprudence is the method of enacting and administering civil laws in any constitution.

We cannot propose to go through a system of civil laws, and therefore what I have in view is to make some preliminary remarks, and then to point out the object of civil laws, and the manner of their operation.

I. The first preliminary remark is that a constitution is excellent, when the spirit of the civil laws is such as to have a tendency to prevent the evil and make men good, as much as to punish them when they are evil.

This is necessary. Some measure, for which the general disposition of the people is against the laws, they cannot long subsist, even the strict and rigorous execution of the officers of rulers. There is, however, more or less in one constitution than in others. Socrates and Xenophon, as well as Lycurgus, seem to have directed their plan very much with this view, to direct the manners of the people in the first place, which will always make the observation of particular laws easy.

But how shall the magistrate manage this matter, or what can be done by law to make the people of any state virtuous? If, as we have seen above, virtue and piety are inseparably connected, then to promote true religion is the best, and most effectual way, of making a virtuous and regular people. Love to God and love to man, is the substance of religion; when these prevail, civil laws will have little to do.

But this leads to a very important disquisition, how far the magistrate ought to interfere in matters of religion. Religious sentiments are very various—and we have given it as one of the perfect rights in natural liberty, and which ought not to be alienated even in society, that every one should judge for himself in matters of religion.

What the magistrate may do on this subject seems to be confined to the three following particulars.

1. The magistrate (or ruling part of any society) ought to encourage piety by his own example, and by endeavouring to make it an object of public esteem. Whenever the general opinion is in favour of any thing, it will have many followers. Magistrates may promote and encourage men of piety and virtue, and they may discountenance those whom it would be improper to punish.

2. The magistrate ought to defend the rights of conscience, and tolerate all in their religious sentiments that are not injurious to their neighbours. In the ancient heathen state there was less occasion for this, because in the system of polytheism, the different gods and rites were not supposed to be opposite, but co-ordinate and consistent; but when there is believed to be but one God, the sentiments about his nature and worship will often be considered as essentially repugnant one to another.

The pretence of infidels, that persecution only belongs to the Christian religion, is absurd; for the Christian was the first religion that was persecuted, and it was the necessary consequence of saying, that the gods of the heathens were no gods.

At present, as things are situated, one of the most important duties of the magistracy is to protect the rights of conscience.

It is commonly said, however, that in case any sect holds tenets manifestly of a society and inconsistent with the rights of society, they ought not to be tolerated. Thus popery is not tolerated in G[illegible] they profess entire subjection to the See of Rome; and [illegible] opposition to the pu[illegible] state; and because [illegible] religion is a part of the their prosperity th[illegible] as the principle in deny, that faith is [illegible] But however just th[illegible] soning, we ought to g[illegible] persecution on a religious possible; because such [illegible] are seldom dangerous P[illegible] er dangerous, but when they ed. Papists are tolerated in Holl[illegible] danger to liberty. And though n tolerated, they are now connived at In ancient times, in great states, th power was found necessary to their cou which inspected the manners of men [illegible] robable, that supporting the religion in modern times answers this end, [illegible] particular discipline of each sect is intended for the correction of manners.

3. The magistrate may enact laws for the punishment of acts of profanity and impiety. The different sentiments of men in religion, ought not by any means to encourage or give sanction to such acts as any or them count profane.

Many are of opinion, that besides all this, the magistrate ought to make public provision for the worship of God, in such manner as is agreeable to the great body of the society; though at the same time, all who dissent from it are fully tolerated. And indeed, there seems to be a good deal of reason for it, that so instruction may be provided for the bulk of common people, who would, many of them, neither support nor employ teachers, unless they were obliged. The magistrate's right, in this case, seems to be something like that of the parent, they have a right to instruct, but not to constrain.

II. The second preliminary remark is, that laws should be so framed as to promote such principles in general as are favourable to good government, and particularly that principle, if there be one, that gave rise to the constitution, and is congenial to it.

Such a principle as I have in view, is general point of honour in a country, and [illegible] and administrators of law should endeavour to preserve in its full vigour; for whenever it is undermined, the constitution goes to ruin.

Of these principles, sobriety, industry, and public spirit are the chief. Some states are formed to subsist by sobriety and parsimony, as the Lacedemonians.

Industry is the prevailing principle in others, as in Holland. Public spirit in others, as in Greece, ancient Rome, and Britain. Only public spirit may be diversified; sometimes it is a passion for acquiring glory and dominion, as in Rome, and sometimes for preserving liberty, as in Greece and Britain.

When it is said, that in the management of a state the utmost attention should be given to the principles of the constitution, to preserve it in its vigour, I mean that though all other crimes are bad, and in part tend to the ruin of a state, yet this is much more the case with crimes against that principle than any other. Any act of immorality was bad at Sparta, but to make poverty and parsimony reproachful, and to introduce fine houses and furniture, and delicate entertainments, would have been instant ruin.

Any act of immorality would be hurtful in Holland, but to make fraudulent bankruptcy less infamous than it is, would immediately destroy them.

Sobriety industry, and public spirit, are mean[illegible] allied, and have a reciprocal influence upon one another. Yet there may be a great degree of some of them in the absence of the others. In Sparta there was much sobriety and public spirit but little industry. In Athens, much industry and public spirit, with very little parsimony.

In opposition to the whole of this, Mandeville wrote a book, called The Fable of the Bees; which seems to be levelled against sobriety, industry, and public spirit all at once; his position is that private vices are public benefits, and that the waste and luxury of one man supplies the wants of another; but it is [illegible] to overthrow his reasonings for though [illegible] er and industrious persons spend each less than a profuse person, yet sobriety and industry send much more to population, and by that means they are mutually serviceable to each other. Luxury and vice only waste and destroy, they add nothing to the common stock of property or of happiness. Experience fully justifies this, for though from the luxury of one man another may reap some gain, the luxury of a nation always tends to the ruin of that [illegible]

[illegible] third preliminary remark is, that laws [illegible] two kinds of [illegible] the [illegible] of magistrates. In [illegible] institution [illegible] there is something of [illegible] of these [illegible] is uncertain whether it is better to [illegible] any new special laws. Of the one [illegible] it seems to be the very spirit of a free constitution to have everything as strictly defined as possible, and to leave little to the power of the judge. But on the other hand, a [illegible] of laws is so apt to [illegible] obligations, [illegible] in society, that perhaps judges of equity, chosen by the district in which they live and are to act, and chosen but for a time, would be a more just and equitable method of ending differences. But the difficulty of setting a constitution so as always to secure the election of impartial judges, has made modern states, where there is liberty, [illegible] city of written laws.

IV. The last preliminary remark is, that no human constitution can be so formed, but that there must be exceptions to every law. So that there may be in every nation, oppression under form of law, according to the old maxim summum jus summa injuria. This further shews the necessity of forming the manners of a people.

After having laid down these preliminaries, we may observe that the object of civil laws may be divided into the three following particulars:

1. To ratify the moral laws by the sanction of the society. The transgression of such laws are called crimes, as profanity, adultery, murder, calumny, &c. And they are prosecuted and punished by order of the public, according to the spirit of every constitution.

2. To lay down a plan for all contracts in the commerce or intercourse between man and man. To show when a contract is valid, and how to be proved. The transgressions of such laws are called frauds. They chiefly regard the acquisition, transmission, or alienation of property.

3. To limit and direct persons in the exercise of their own rights, and oblige them to show respect to the interfering rights of others. This contains the whole of what is called the police of a country.—And the transgression of such laws are called trespasses. A number of things in this view may become illegal, which before were no immoral.

Open the Windows Wide!—Open them; are you sick? Open them; are you in the pure fresh air. Gangrene is upon you; let us have it in [illegible] Some rooms are steamed. Breathe? Much [illegible] ever. No wonder so many people die and nobody knows how they die. No mystery about it; they are smothered to death, suffocated, choaked up fairly; can't breathe; then they are dead; no mistake. Some churches are kept in the same steaming condition, very little better than the hold of a slaver! The Sexton ought to know all about this, and every man of common sense, and keep his eyes open.—Southern Baptist.

RECOGNITION OF THE REPUBLIC OF FRANCE BY GREAT BRITAIN

The steamer Caledonia was announced last night, at half-past 10 o'clock, as having arrived at Boston, and at 2 o'clock this morning the following despatch came through from our telegraph correspondent at New York, the gentlemanly operators of the whole line having volunteered to remain at their posts during the night, on account of the importance of the news.

She sailed from Liverpool on the 12th inst., and has been over fifteen days on her passage, bringing thirteen days later intelligence from Europe.

NEW YORK, March 23—1 A. M.

The steamer Caledonia arrived at Boston at half-past 9 o'clock last night, and the following summary of the important news received by her has just reached this city:

Riots in London, Glasgow, and Edinburg, have taken place.

The European Times dated Liverpool, Saturday, March 12, says:

It is said that the revolution [illegible] throughout France. All the Departments have joined the Republic. Louis Philippe and the Royal family, with Guizot, have arrrived in England.

The revolution in France is now au fait accompli. The abdication of Louis Philippe, the appointment and rejection of a regency, the complete triumph of the Parisians over the army, the establishment of a Provisional Government, the proclaim of a Republic, the overthrow of the House of Peers and titles distinction, the precipitate and abject flight of all the members of the Orleans family and their misguided ministry to our own shores or other places of exile. The immediate recognition of the new Republic of France by Great Britain, Belgium, Switzerland, and the United States, have all followed in such rapid succession, that the events of every hour come teeming with some mighty occurrence affecting the doctrines of whole nations and dynasties. The speculation, respecting the cause, incidents and probable results of this sudden, serious, and mighty social convulsion, are various and weighty.

The facts stand out in historical boldness of outline, depicted in such indelible characters that they must endure until the last syllable of recorded time. A provisional government has been organised by our neighbors, the members of which are celebrated through the world for genius, eloquence, and science. Some of them are of almost romantic integrity. Carried away by the eloquence of Lamartine, the excited, ungovernable mob of Paris threw down the muskets, which in the first fury of their newborn zeal for liberty they had taken up against the popular leader, and by their unanimous shouts invested the provisional Government with full authority. As the Revolution of July was the work of the Bourgeois, so is the revolution of 1848 the act and deed of the working classes, who have sealed the inauguration of their labors with their own blood.

The question which every one asks of his neighbor is "will it last?" Every man in England, and we believe, elsewhere, hope so. Lamartine himself says, in his address to foreign powers—"We desire for humanity that peace may be observed. We even hope it." Sincerely do we re-echo these words, applying them emphatically even in a more enlarged sense than M. Lamartine. We hope that peace may be observed both without the Republic and within the sphere of its dominion. Our sympathies, nay our interests, are all interwoven with the maintenance of peace, but the great social problem which these men, who are aiming to govern millions by a stroke of the pen, is of too intricate and complex a character at once to be solved.

The difficult question of human labor, the real and only source of wealth, and its more equal distribution is the great argument to the height of which they propose to direct all their efforts. They may cut their gordeon knot, but the sure process of the developed industry founded upon peace and security far exceeds the ephemeral power of any provisional government. "However absolute or well disposed to make a government," said Mr. Burke, more than half a century ago, upon a similar occasion, "requires no great prudence to settle the seat of power—to teach obedience and the work is done. But the formation of a free government is to temper together the opponents of liberty and oppression, which requires much thought and deep reflection—a sagacious, powerful and combining mind."

The French are but in the first stage of transition. They must not only teach, but they must secure obedience from the masses, before the regular edifice which is to crown their hopes can be raised. If the foundations are laid in peace, the French people may erect a proud monument, to consecrate throughout all ages the glory and liberty of a gallant people. But if the elements of war insinuate their fatal agency into the fabric, the whole will assuredly crumble into dust, and perish.

The provisional government became constituted by an usurpation, or rather by the free choice of the mob. But, however that may be, eleven members established a supreme authority at the Hotel D'Ville. Royalty and peerage have been swept away in a few brief hours; but hunger, gaunt hunger, and one hundred thousand mouths, yawning around the seat of gorernment, and something was to be done immediately to appease the multitudes. A gigantic system of out-door relief was conceived and immediately executed. Formidable legions of National Guards were then formed at a stipend per day. These have been packed off to the frontiers. The compact between the employers and the employed was broken, and in a short time a decree was passed limiting the hours of labor.

The journals were also to be propitiated. Accordingly, the stamp duty was removed, but these and numerous other decrees will not satisfy the [illegible] nor does the taxing of one large class who [illegible] regad by industry, in order that another may carry a musket on the frontier in the garb [illegible] Guard, tend to carry out, to its legitimate, the old received Jacobin doctrine of liberty, equality and fraternity.

[illegible] another decree has gone forth that a new [illegible] Assembly is to be called on the 20th of April, when the Provisional Government will resign its power into the hands of the definitive government. Universal suffrage, and vote by ballot are to secure liberty, equality and fraternity to France. [illegible] the good working people of Paris will have the vast majority in the new Assembly. Leaving more or less profitable occupations, will try their hands as statesmen. Shipping, in the meantime, and commerce is at a stand. The funds have fallen enormously. Considerable failures are announced. Clubs are in the course of formation to advise or overawe the government. Strikes among the workmen are becoming more numerous. Daily operatives demand an increase of wages, and have expelled large bodies of the English workmen for their rivalry in the construction of railways.

PARIS, March 9—Our latest advices from Paris represent the city as tranquil, but the financial crisis still continues unabated, and some eminent bankers are spoken of as being in difficulties, but no further failures have been announced. The funds have fallen considerably. On the 8th the Three per cent. funds opened at 50 francs, and after having been done at 46 francs, closed at 47 francs, whilst the Five per cents opened at 85 francs, done at 74f. and closed at 75f. There was no tumult or agitation. All was sad and gloomy. Men came and offered their securities for money only, at whatever price they could get, but scarcely a buyer could be found.

We have just received a telegraphic despatch from Folkstone stating that the French government had stopped the payment of the Treasury Bonds, which they have hitherto been in the habit of discounting. It is understood that the Provisional Government has abandoned the idea of removing Cavignac from the Governorship of Algeria in order to place the War Department under his care. It is now fixed that Gen. Lamorice is to be the Minister of War.

Our latest foreign news is not much in amount, but is important. The account of the revolution in Paris reached Vienna on the 1st instant, and produced a most profound impression. The consternation which prevailed there, says an article in the National, cannot be described. The five per cents. fell from 95f. to 82f.

The intelligence from Italy received in Vienna was anything but satisfactory. The Arch Bishop of Paris, accompanied by two vicars general, presented himself to the Provisional Government on Tuesday, and gave in his adhesion to the new order of things in the name of the entire clergy of the Diocese. M. Duchere has been appointed under Secretary of State of the Ministry of France.

Numerous diplomatic appointments are announced, among which are M. Cidevant, to Constantinople; M. de Faces, to the United States; M. de Beaumont Vasse, to Denmark; M. Cidevant Moskdna to Spain.

The coming elections in France excite great attention. The Govenment, aware of the serious importance of this matter, were preparing for the crisis. Eight hundred mercantile firms, connected with the Paris Bourse, waited on the Provisional Government to ask further delay of a month on bills due on the 29th ult, which by the desire of Government had already been extended to the 10th inst. It not being accorded them, they were said to have threatened to dismiss their clerks and workmen, and commenced their determination not to satisfy their engagements. Three per cent closed in the Paris Bourse on the 9th at 52f.—five per cents at 73f.

On the 10th the papers say the the Duke d'Aumale and Prince de Joinville arrived off that port and made communications with Admiral Baudin who through telegraph, applied to government for instructions. The admrial, it was said, had been authorised to place a vessel at the disposal of the Prince to carry them wherever they pleased.

French Miscellaneous News—M. Arago the Republican Minister of Marine, sent for the French Admirals in Paris. They all attended. He then addressed them and asked them if there were any of them willing to serve the Republic. They replied all. He then said he requested men of courage and steadiness,—that he knew them all to be so,—and he was ready to appoint to the command of the fleet of the Republic and ony they might choose.

He therefore appointed in accordance with their recommendation, Admiral Boudin who left Paris for Toulon, to take command and to sail for Algiers. His instruction are take possession of any ships he may find in the port of Algies, or intergrals of the French Republic.

The Chateau of Neuville has been sacked and burnt to the ground.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA, JUNE 30, 1848.

The Vice President has thought proper to purchase the Hamburg schooner "Herold," for the Republic. We are indeed much in want of the use of a vessel, but it is to be regretted that we have not more than one, well armed and equiped to protect our coast, and clear it of slavers. When the purchase was first mentioned to us, we unhesitatingly applauded the measure, and thought the Vice President could not have done a better deed. Since then, however, we have, in thought at least, seen some reason to change our mind, and to regard the purchase with regret. It would be highly impolitic and indiscreet to state our reasons here, and therefore, we for the present only put down our opinion.—Whatever the issue may be—whether the vessel prove a blessing or a curse to our little community, no blame can be attached to the Vice President, for he no doubt, acted with counsel, and on the best calculation which he could make at the time. The vessel is said to be well built, and is of the burthen of one hundred and twenty tons.

In our last, we noticed the election of Elder Drayton to the Pastorate of the Baptist Church in this place, and we now propose to say a few words on a subject connected with it.

That the laborer is worthy of his hire, is a maxim of Holy Writ, and a maxim acted upon with all professions, but the clerical. If the gospel ministry be of any importance, it should be supported, and supported too by those who desire it, whenever and wherever they are able. For this purpose it is always expected that sincere and conscientious christians will make some sacrifice. We hope therefore, that the church will make some provision for the support of Elder Drayton, that he may give himself wholly to the work to which he is called.

That the church is competent to give him an adequate support, there is no doubt. And if any one is disposed to cavil, he has only to enter the church on a Sabbath day, and look upon the respectable congregation assembled. Very few churches in America except in those pompous edifices in the Atlantic cities, exhibit a greater amount and display of elegance in dress, than is to be seen in our church on the Sabbath; and is not a shame that where there are so much superfluity—so much indulged in, that can be dispensed with without the least discomfort:—the minister who deals out the bread of life and guides to the portals of bliss, should be refused a miserable pittance to feed his body. Let the church go to work and prove her love to God, and her respect for herself by amply sustaining her pastor.

The rains have fairly commenced, as the showers on the 10th, 11th, and 12th, inst., testified. It did not rain, but poured down like a water-fall.

Some of our farmers are already eating new rice.

We have lately had a large increase to our population by immigration from America; and if reports are to be credited, and we have no doubt they are, a still larger accession may be shortly expected. Let them come—they cannot come too fast, provided they be of the right stamp. Men, and women too, to be sure—of sense and perseverance—who have calculated on some difficulty and trial in settling a new country—who will not be dismayed by small things—who will suffer, yet go forward, these are the emmigrants we want. They may come as fast as they please, Liberia is large enough for them.

We are paying enormous prices to the Native Chiefs for land, if the price paid by Captain Owen, of H. B. M. Ship Eden, is to be assumed as a standard. In a proclamation issued by that officer at Fernandopo, on the 25th December, 1847, we find the following:——

"In obedience to the orders of His Royal Highness, the Lord High Admiral, I directed the first operations of clearing the land on this point, (Point Willian) to be commenced on the first of November last, and on the tenth and twelfth following, purchased from the native chiefs and from the tenants of one small part of that ground which I now desired to occupy, the full right of property and possession, for which Iron was paid to the amount of three bars."

It must be recollected that this purchase included the whole settlement of Clarance, its suburbs, &c., &c. This is the way to do it. We paid two thousand dollars for New Cestas.

The slave trade is still going at New Cess, and the Spanish occupants of the place show no disposition to evacuate. What is to be done, we know not. We were sure that he would either leave or change the nature of his buriness. It is rather to be regretted that any such assurances were made, as led the British to withdraw the force they had there, until we were ready to enforce compliance with the President's order, to desist from the purchase of slaves. And this we fear cannot be done shortly, as the season is now so far advanced. However, this may be only conjecture with us, as we are altogether ignorant of what may be concocting in the higher quarters. If it can be done, it should be, and that without delay. For if we are able to break up that establishment and yet suffer it to remain, and the fact should transpire, we will most certainly be accused of winking at the slave trade. Yet to say we are not able to remove a few slavers is humiliating.

Hard Times, Hard Times!!

This is the general cry throughout the town. The reply prompt and invariable is—hard times! As an evidence of the hardness and dullness of times, let it be borne in mind, that here has been erected this season a greater number of houses than in any previous season, since the settlement was formed, and of these the fine stone store of Messers Payne and Yates, stands conspicuous. This is a fine building and has a more commanding appearance than any in the business part of the town. Until our neighbors stop building they ought in modesty to stop complaining.

Robberry.

We are doomed to the hardest luck. Loss after loss follows rapidly in turn. Our store on the water side was entered on the evening of the third inst., and a large quantity of goods abstracted. The larger part of the matter is, the most of the goods which were [illegible] left with us on commission. No trace of the thief has yet been found.

It is sincerely to be regretted that the School established by the Southern Baptist Board at Louisiana, should have been discontinued. The people there highly appreciated the favor, and were making arrangements to erect a permanent building, which might answer the double purpose of a school-house and place of worship. They say the children were improving, and their hopes were raised that permanent good would be effected. Although we go upon the principle that no people is entitled to aid until they have put forth their utmost effort, yet we do not hesitate to say the people at Louisiana are entitled to the sympathy of the Board. They are poor and cannot support a school. It is to be hoped some missionary society will send a school there. The teacher has been transferred to Virginia. It is highly probable the respected Superintendant of the mission has reasons for his course, with which we are altogether unacquainted, and it is also highly probable that were we in his place, and in possession of those reasons we would have acted as he has done. We merely state the single fact of the want of a teacher at Louisana, without entering at all into the why and wherefore of the case.

The Decatur sailed on Saturday 10th inst, for Port Praya, after having cruised for two months along the coast between New Cess and Sherbro. She goes to windward for the purpose of getting additional supplies of provision from the Naval Stores, of the Cape de Verde Islands. All well.

The only death on board since she arrived on this coast, was that of Charles Brown, a Petty Officer, who died about the time of her arrival here, and was intered in the burrial ground of Monrovia. He was a colored man who had served in the Navy of the U. States for many years, having participated in the successful battles of the U. S. Frigate Constitution with the English Frigates Gurriere and Java. COMMUNICATIONS.

HON. HILARY TEAGE, Esqr:

My dear sir:—You have lived to see Liberia an independent commonwealth, and you are one among the few prominent citizens on whom the duty devolves of guiding your young Republic to maturity. I have no fear of your experiment, believing that yourself and other prominent men will feel your responsibility—will watch with unsleeping vigilence, the working of the political machine which you have erected.

Supposing the rest of your lives is devoted to your country; what more worthy objects on earth will engage your attention, promoting industry, directing the labour of the new emigrants, and those whose energies have been paralysed by slavery, will require no little of your attention. The Governor and some of your principal men ought several times a year to visit the agricultural settlements, give advice in relation to improvements, crops, stock, &c., and encourage industry, without which, your goverment will prove a shadow.

Raising your provisions, must be a prominent object with you, indeed it is indispensable to your success. You may safely calculate that emigration will annually increase, provided you can supply the necessary provisions. This is a matter of the highest importance, which no doubt you fully appreciate.

The encouragement of agricultural industry at this time, I deem of vital importance, second only to good common schools.

I have full confidence in your legislatures, and doubt not that they will pass such laws as will be best adapted to the condition of the people; and if they should commit great errors, the intelligence of the people will apply the proper corrective at the ballot box. If demigods sould get hold of the reigns of government, a labouring community will not long sustain them. The character of your emigrants will improve every year: you may expect many enterprising free colored men. The ministers and religious men of the South, have been engaged for the last three years, in giving religious instruction to the slaves, which will have a happy influence in preparing them for citizenship in Liberia. The emigrantion to this country of Norwegians and Dutch, is making a great change in the value of slave property at the South; these emigrants live cheaper than the slave, spreading themselves over the valley of the Mississippi, are content with small wages, and are most faithful labourers. Their numbers will increase at least to a hundred thousand a year: and every year their labor will be more and more preferred to that of slaves. Emigration to Liberia will hereafter be as great as could be desirable. You have a great work to do in building up a commonwealth, if you succeed, you and your colleagues will immortalise yourselves as benefactors of your race. With wise measures pursued harmoniously, and with the blessings of God, your success is certain, and millions will bless the patriots who declared Liberia independent. And now then, I trust you are expressing your grateful thanks to God, for having brought the colony from its feeble beginning to independence. I hope you will remember those who have devoted their energies and sacrificed their lives in your service. Among those is Governor Buchannan. I doubt whether many of the citizens know how much the colony is indebted to Gov. B. In 1838, the confidence of the American People, in the A. C. S. had become so much impaired, that the receipts was less than 11000 dollars $4000 of which was required to meet the expenses of the office at Washington, the balance was not enough to pay the interest accruing on the debts of the Society: not one emigrant, nor one dollar in cash or stores had been sent to the colony that year, and many believed that the colony would be abandoned to its fate. I too had watched the progress of the colony with deep interest—had spent a year in the slave region to satisfy myself of the ability of the colored men to govern themselves, by a free inttitution. Satisfied on this point I proceeded to consult the friends of the cause in N. York and Philadelphia, learning the true cause of the embarrasments of the Society. I believed it could be revived, and the colony sustained, if a suitable agent could be found to repair to the colony. Thomas Buchanan was applied to. His answer was—It would, be put in a position to sustain me, I will go: measures were imediately adopted to unite the colonies, and remodel the American Colonization Society. Buchanan was appointed Governor, myself made general Agent of the Society, gave me a good opportunity of knowing the value of his important labours. He was extensively and favorably known in this country—well acquainted with the causes of the failure of the Society, rendered great service in reuniting and encouring the disaffected friends of the cause; and as governor, you well know that by his wise measures, he inspired the colonists with renewed hopes, and cheered them on to renewed expectations. Before his death, the debts amounting to over $70,000 in this country and Africa, were settled. His official despatches from the colony were of great value in diffusing correct and cheering information, and thereby increasing our receipts. The unfortunate controversy in which he was drawn into, in the colony, made him enemies for the time. I trust however that all unkind feelings towards him have been forgotten, and that now a monument (if no more than a pile of rocks,) will be erected to his memory:—The man honored, beloved and surrounded by elevated friends in his own country, who freely gave up all for the sake of Liberia, ought not to be forgotten. I pray you my friend perpetuate his memory; tell his noble efforts to your children, that they speak to their children of the self-sacrificing dead, as one of their greatest benefactors.

Yours truly,
S. WIKESON,

For the Liberia Herald.

Messrs Editors:—Sirs, in musing on the condition of our young Republic, and devising in my mind the most feasible plan for our speedy rise, in such a manner as to render us conspicuous to the various civilized nations; my most rational conclusion is Internal Improvement. The preeminent of which I deem the mental culture of our youth.

This, sirs, I am aware, is a subject that has come before the public in every form, and by various authors. But as it is a subject in itself, inexhaustable, and to us in common with the rest of mankind, a matter of vital importance, and being aware of the fact, that without it no set of people in the present day can ever become a nation of respectability, power and permanency.

The day possibly might have been, when a body of people might have been able to support their national dignity in some considerable degree by their numerical strength, independent of erudition.

Those days of ignorance were winked at, they being rather in the darker ages of the world. But now the signs of the times of the present age calls for mental improvement and a high state of education to support the dignity of nations.

Knowing these facts, it behoves us to make use of every plausible mode, to induce all—but more especially the youthful portion of this Republic to arouse themselves on this important subject: Remembering that very soon, in the order of nature, the Barque of State must be committed to their skill, to be conducted over the shoals and reefs of national affairs; and that great will be the responsibility and awful the consequence, if through wilful neglect and sheer indifference, they make not themselves acquainted with the Chart of national seas, and in consequence thereof, our little ship of State become stranded on her course.

The damage would be incalculable to all concerned, and the anathemas of all on board, would sink such recreant wretches to ignomy and destruction.

Such then being the fatal consequence of a miscarriage, should not all be stimulated to action? For surely there is no retracing the steps we have recently taken. Our motto therefore, should be Onward, or the inevitable result will be destruction.

Think you we need despond? No, never.—The voice of thousands, who this moment groan beneath the tyrant's yoke in the land of our nativity, forbid it.—Millions of Afric's sons who ergulphed are in more than Egyptian darkness, forbid it—The [illegible] forbid it.—The beaming hopes of succeeding generations, forbid it.—The immortal spirits of our illustrious dead, forbid it.—Yea, God and nature forbid the despondency of Liberia's single hearted sons. Then our only ultimatum is Onward.

And have we not that, whereof we should be encouraged? surely we have. Ask the genius of ancient and modern history if from it is to be borne aught he can produce as a parallel to our efforts, although they be but as yesterday begun? His negative response is audible to all.

Let us enquire; whence came we forth? Indeed it is marvelous. And was it in the days of the wondrous deeds of Aladen's lamp, I might impute our present improved condition to the friction of that magic substance, when I call to mind the state and condition of Liberia's pioneers, when first their wearied soles, some four and twenty years ago, resting pressed the shores of this insalubrious coast, the entire atmosphere of which, was ever impregnated with miasmatic virous. They were a set of people with the rest of their countrymen of like color, crushed and tramelled, by a superior power, in their native land, and by might robbed of their every right. Debared they were from all halls of literature and science, with every means that ennobles the soul, and makes the man. We roamed like animals of the brute creation, without knowledge scarcely to comprehend the idea of a God. And like the Athenians, we worshipped we knew not what.

Of such a stamp was the founders of Liberia, and of similar materials have the constant assertion been to our edifice of state, with but a very few exceptions.

Such then being the materials for building up a Republic; is it not a matter of encouragement, when we take a retrospective view and compare the present state of things with the past; not to comment on the indigent condition of emigrants, nearly all of whom have come to the colony in a state of penury. No government to sustain us, but dependant wholy upon on our own feeble efforts, and the humanity of a few in America.

We were as outcasts in the wilds of Afric's barbarous coast, surrounded by the ferocious savage, who incessantly thirsted for our blood, while we in point of protection were in a manner in a state of nudity. Heaven protected us, and we were brought by a way we knew not, to our present position.

The present crises, I deem the most important in all of our history. The eyes of all Europe and America are upon us, and while some regard us with envy, hatred, and jealousy, others there be of nobler origin, who stand amazed at the phenomena, and admire the unparaleled improvement of our little colony, eulogise our feeble efforts, and cheer us on our tedious way.

The work is now but fairly begun. Its embryotic stage is past. The tree of state has germinated, and buded and its foliage and tender boughs are now spread to the virulence of the storms. Now then is the time for support and nourishment. The work begun must be carried on to perfection. The viable fetus must be reared to manhood. And the tree of state be brought to perfection. To accomplish all which, such means must be used, as we know by protracted experience to mature and perfect all such things. And it having been demonstrated time and again, that education is the only means, (temporally speaking) by which a community can be raised to any degree of notoriety, it must necessarily follow, that for us to obtain education is the only alternative for our becoming so situated as to maintain a respectable position on the plat form of national distinction.

It may be asked how can we become proficient in education, not having among us halls of literature and science. All of our schools being of a primary order?

To reply, I quote the assertion of a certain gentleman, who very wisely remarked, "that he who understands the English Alphabet, may by assiduous application and study, become master of any science in the English language."

I flatter myself that the day is not far distant, when the philanthrophists of our native land, seeing our feeble but untiring exertions, will aid us in the establishing and support of seminaries and colleges, to fit our youth of either sex for filling with ability and honor, all of the various posts of trust, that are found in Republican Governments.

Let us not however idly await the coming of better days, but each, assuming a becoming jealousy, with ardour and perseverance rival his neighbor, for the good of our common and beloved Liberia.

Yours, &c,
H. J. R.

AN ADDRESS.

Delivered by E. J. Roye Esq. before the Liberia Lyceum February 9th, 1848.

A miscellany on the civil and moral polity of the Republic of Liberia

The elevated rank of this little African Republic, must depend upon those peculiarly virtuous principles and exertions adequate to the measure of it, required. The position of our national renown and true merit, will take the place of, and succeed the exact sum of causes employed for their effects. National greatness is the same thing from the same causes, as individual advancement, a work emphatically its own. Therefore it ensues that there is no pinnacle of glory which may not be ours, nationally. Never let us think, that what others have done we cannot do. There are many principles to be [illegible] for the welfare of our beloved Country. A few of which, by way of discharging an incumbent duty, I venture to presume. That which must concern the Liberian Patriot is, how shall the agricultural interests be sustained unless the surplus be purchased and shipped by our merchants to other countries? And fairs be instituted and rewards be given to the most indomtiable perseverance and emulation, which may be proven by the quality and quantity of productions per acre and man. In a word, to deduce the means of prospering a country, is to make its inhabitants respectable and happy. The same encouragement must hold good with regard to every industrious or mechanicle branch of business. Again, the resources of this unexampled rich country must not only be brought out in the sense last alluded to, but exploring expeditions should be sent out at the expense or contrivance of the government, by which the character of the barbarian tribes may be better understood, and the uses this government may put them to for a general benefit also; the Geological charcater of their lands and the Botanical virtues of their productions. This expedition may be fitted out upon the authority and promise of government, to validate their title to a portion of the valuable lands, or treasures which they cannot fail to discover, or commission them to the Vice Archion-ship under this parent commonwealth to said lands &c. thus discovered. On whom it should be impressed as a duty to evangelize the late pagan owners; and civilize them under the mildest, but most effectual means in the power of the Republic. Then we may look for forward with hope to the day, when the African, free from the mental, moral, and phisical disabilities of ages past, shall have again begun to gain a name and rank among the great nations of the earth. Liberality of enterprize and success in it, will break down any narrow, sordid, or immoral jealousies of individuals.—If, by a national maneuver every citizen have the means, of geting an honorable support, or competency as well as through an alacrity to subserve the public good. Therefore such an unanimity and union would exist that it could induce some folks to wish that they were colored; and make all colored folks desire, at once, to be restored to this the land of our common ancestors, and explode the ignoble ideas entertained by some Divines and Philosophers, that the black man cannot be equal to the white, when the data and evidences are equal. But color, as the only difference, cannot weigh with these neither pro nor con.

There are wants in every community, and the banishment of them must be a prime object. As there are wants either of abandonment or of attainment in every community. There are some acknowledged good ones, examples of all or many of the virtues. Such should feel the importance of the influence they exert for good or for evil, upon that needful class above mentioned; if any were an idle or dissipated people, they must be led to feel the superiority of the one, before they can think about the abandonment of the one or the attainment of the other; as all men like virtue better than vice, so the arbitrary practice of virtue by the virtuous will effect all men for happy results, then wholesome wants will be the only wants. One feature as a principle has been concocted, "the declaration of Independence." The consequence of our late formal declaration of Independence will, either serve to elevate us nationally in the scale of political importance and prosperity, or will administer to our further decline and paralysis. The hope of an enviable fortune to our little new Republic, presupposes new and untiring efforts on the part of the wise and good, aided by the influence of everey citizen of hope and intelligence in the whole commonwealth. As this object, no less real than ostensible, is national importance and honor, political weight and virtue. Every measure will, by our wise Legislators from time to time, be analized and synthetized before being legalized and concerted. Which course cannot scarcely fail to leave behind many propitious fortunes to practice as well as to the theory. For while we the Republicans may add new laurels by a new political constitution, by its invoking or calling the new energies of every thinking patriot into account to commute the prejudices of our enemies and set at ease the fears of friends. Contrary, to the thought of some Liberians, valuable for judgement and station, that to sever the relation between the society in America and the then colony would be to destroy every benignant pulsation of its organization. Your humble servant thinks that at the time of its organization, its executive counsel, fostering care, and pecuniary aid were needful, but now only the latter. But have we not as much to hope for under the Beneficence of an Omnicient Providence, from the true philantropist as we had before the declaration of Independence? So then, if the means of supplies be not excised (or cut off,) would it be polite or manly to operate them with an unprofitable dominion or mastership over us while they have sought and yet continue to seek our highest good and that of our race. Even in that act, itself, Independence. But on the other, hand, if our little bark of State should be wrecked on unfore-seen rocks or quicksand, farewell to every fondly cherished hope of the patriotic Liberians, and the prospects of our now degraded race. Farewell to friends and sympathy, from even the philanropist, for then will, according to the laws of mind and mankind, be established valid because natural relations between white masters and black or colored slaves. An auspicious moment to radicate this apparent axiom, the one born to rule the other to obey. Who in this African Republic, would supinely allow the little bark of State to be wrecked on his or her account? He a misanthrope that would, should be placed on the pages of future history eternally disgraced as the enemy of his afflicted race, and the common interest of mankiud in every point of view. Because the evangelization and civilization of the whole of the African race is to make something out of a cipher more than it stands for, and to restore man to the embrace of his fellow man, of which achievement this little Republic is the germ.

The presumption of a few more virtues very essential to the perpetuity of any form of government but especially to the Republican, is to be cherished. First, high respect, is due but should always be paid to the Executive, Lesislative, and Judicial departments of the government, when above an unanimous and just public censure. But when their conduct is intolerable to be borne, the safest remedy is an appeal to the ballot box at the time appointed, of choosing a new administration. Indeed, every one who serves in either a political or ecclesiastical capacity is entitled to, but should receive similar courtesy, for their posts of honor and trust are, and yet ought to be more a creation for the general benefit of the people than for themselves. But with these noble spirits the honor is more a consideration than the emolument of office, and so it should be, so ministers of State and church are found more for the flock than the fleece.

It is to be hepod that ere long measures, for the establishment of an academy and college among us, as well as many more good schools will be matured, for the thorough training of youth illy circumstanced or indisposed to forego the perils and privations of a foreign classical education, for upon them will devolve the subsequent well-being of this country and its institutions. We have no reason to be discouraged, because only 26 years have elapsed, since the first care-worn, tempest-tossed pilgrims, saught an home on this then benighted coast of cannibles, disease, war, and death, where now stand elegant mansions and churches whose spires point to heaven. They came hither under nameless circumstanaes; but great credit is due to them, they have conquered the maladies of those times, and we the 13th, hour citizens enjoy the invaluable boon of liberty and every wholesome appendage thereof, exempt with care and some pecuniary means from the besetting hardness of those years. If the above adjunct be true let education, the sword of almost every prosecution be ever esteemed and cherished among us. For the true policy of education is to direct and blend every avenue to virtue and good. It is conceded as a fixed principle that the true object of education is lost which does not ameliorate, mollify and improve.

You Ladies of this new Republic cannot know too well the great influence you exert either for weal or wo upon every citizen. It is no more nor less to be virtuous than the cousulting your own best interest both directly this of the present and that of future generations. You give perpetuity and fashion to the practice of every virtue or accomplishment. You learn men to know that from your example and very modest, but eloquent precept they cannot be happy neither here nor here-after, unless the heart be the temple of virtue and unfeigned goodness. It is your province, ladies, to put your signal veto and condemnation on any immodest thing, to discountenance independently of a sacrifice of any temperal good, all counterfeit characters either among your own or our sex. You should remember that there are some who walk in the first circles of society in every land, who more on account of birth, learning, fortune, or some other accidents, rank in the first society than for correct morals. But who could do infinitely more service in behalf of your merit, if they were free from those exceptionables: who would or might contribute to illumine the most liberal pathway to ineffable bliss. All men will esteem you, nay, love you, even if some be depraved and evil; and subscribe for and defend the obedience to your grave mandates, your imperative edicts. Ladies, forever give your influence against word or deed in favor of the slavetrade; but unreserved generosity to any portion or part of the human family who have good for their specific object. Finally, the uncertainty of human life, of human affairs, of fortune, of every thing terrestrial; the precariousness of which should incite us all to make the only effectual provision against a similar state in that world to which we all hasten, remembering that all mortal things at best, are fleeting and transitory. Glory and riches, at a dying hour, are as a bubble on the billowy ocean. Then, let us view life as from that solemn hour, coolly and dispassionately.

Oh! then, what levity can we not cogitate to have deluded us in reference to mortal affairs, or what could induce us to live out the probation either of a long or short life, to the neglect of such a fat moment, on which hang matters of such infinitely important and unknown results.—Africa's Luminary.

POETRY

From the Southern Baptist.

BY MARTIN F. TUPPER.

All's for the best; be sanguine and cheerful;
Trouble and sorrow are friends in disguise—
Nothing but folly goes faithless and fearful;
Courage forever is happy and wise.
All for the best—if man would but know it:
Providence wishes us all to be blest;
There is no dream of the pundit or poet—
Heaven is gracious, and all's for the best!

All for the best! set this in your standard,
Soldier of sadness, or pilgrim of love,
Who to the shore of despair may have wandered.
A way-wearied swallow or heart-stricken dove.
All for the best!—be a man but confiding,
Providence tenderly governs the rest.
And the frail bark of His creature is guiding,
Wisely and warily all for the best.

All for the best! then fling away terrors,
Meet all your fears and your foes in the van,
And in the midst of your dangers or errors,
Trust like a child, while you strive like a man,
All's for the best!—unbiassed, unbounded,
Providence reigns from the east to the west;
And by both wisdom and mercy surrounded,
Hope and be happy that all's for the best.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ROBERT HALL AND JOHN FOSTER.

BY JOHN SHEPPARD, ESQ.

A comparison, which I confess may appear too far-fetched, has often presented itself to my mind, as picturing the differences between the respective style and manner of these remarkable preachers. On the noble modern road over the Alps, formed by the engineers of Napoleon, one gains here and there a view of the mountain track by which the passage had been made before. In moving quickly up the long traverses and sweeping curves of the new ascent, you trace on some opposite height the short angular zigzags of the path that preceded it. One might compare the eloquence of Hall to this great work carrying you with ease to the loftiest elevations, winding with graceful and simple, though elaborate course, amidst varied sublimities, gliding smoothly beside snowy summits where angels would seem to tread, and over gulfs where the voice of the wind or torrent might bring to mind the lamentings of the lost. On the other hand the eloquence of our much recently departed friend has reminded me of that former mountain road, with its sudden turns of discovery and surprise; bringing us now to the brink of an awful precipice, then starting us by the quick descent to a goatherd's quaint dwelling in the glen; advancing along the giddy ledges of a cliff, and then by a sharp turn placing us close to some household scene in its recesses. Here, if there were less comprehensive or facile views of the sublime, one had nearer and more astounding glimpses of the inaccessible.

The path came more within the echo of avalanches; and while it oftener passed the chalet and herd, it sometimes crossed the very inlet to dark untrodden chasms, "which no fowl knoweth." In that original and singular course, the guide, the mule, the litter, were forgotten; nothing was thought of but the grandeur of the mountains and floods. If the one might be styled a road truly imperial, the other was a path worthy at once of the simplicity of Oberlin and the daring of Alpine barons. The imperial road deserved and had the just admiration of the great and the many. I exceedingly admired it also; but, (peril and toil being in the ideal journey excluded) I would have preferred for myself, at least at times, the original path.

In this attempt to depict figuratively the style of Mr. Foster's preaching, my reference is not at all to his elaborately prepared sermons or lectures, but to those which had for me a still greater charm, in which he expatiated freely in every mode of thought and illustration, with little; if any, verbal precomposition. None but those who have heard such unfettered and powerful excursions of his mind, can judge how far the figures may somewhat help to characterize them.

The mention of the imperial road has called to my recolection a saying of our friend, when once conversing with me about Coleridge and Hall. Some comparison being made, chiefly as to their conversational power, he said, "Hall commands words like an emperor; Coleridge like a magician." The saying would, I think, be still correct, with his own name in place of the latter. The magic of Coleridge whose extraordinary powers our friend fully recognized, was probably indeed more splendid and imposing than his own. It was much the habit of that man of genius if I may judge by the report of others, to invest himself with brilliant clouds; passing sometimes the bound of the intelligible for his hearers, if not for himself; and even occasionally (as some university professor said to him) "discoursing most eloquent nonsense;" which, amidst its obscurities, had a sort of magical prestige. If Foster could have so discoursed—which may be easily believed—it cannot be doubted that he would not; deterred at once by a sense of Christian duty, and by a manly unaffected daylight of clear sense, amid the shining mists of what his own phrase may designate as "subtlety attenuated into inanity; and this I imagine no wise companion would regret. But, as it was, we had sometimes magic enough from his lips—if that may be termed intellectual magic, which summons, as from all points of the compass, the most sudden and happy combinations and illuminations of thought. Images arose on all sides at the master's bidding, nor did he hesitate to call them from the loftiest region or the lowest.—Southern Baptist.

I'm too busy.

A merchant sat at his office desk; various letters were spread before him; his whole being was absorbed in the intricacies of his business.

A zealous friend of mankind entered the office. "I want to interest you a little in a new effort for the temperance cause, said the good man.

The merchant cut him off by replying: "Sir, you must excuse me, but really I'am too busy to attend to that subject now."

"But, sir, intemperance is on the increase among us," said his friend.

"Is it? I'am sorry; but I'am too busy at present to do any thing."

"When shall I call again, sir?"

"I cannot tell. I'am very busy. I'am busy every day. Excuse me, sir. I wish you a good morning." Then bowing the intruder out of the office, he resumed the study of his papers.

The merchant had frequently repulsed the friends of humanity in this manner No matter what was their object, he was always too busy to listen to their claims. He had even told his minister that he was too busy for anything but to make money.

But, one morning a disagreeable stranger stepped very softly to his side, laying a cold moist hand upon his brow, and saying, "Go home with me."

The merchant laid down his pen; his head grew dizzy, his stomach felt faint and sick; he left the counting-room, went home, and retired to his bed-chamber.

His unwelcome visitor had followed him and now took his place by the bed side whispering ever and anon, "You must go with me."

A cold chill settled on the merchant's heart; dim spectres of ships, notes, houses, and lands, flitted before his excited mind. Still his pulse beat slower, his heart moved heavily, thick films gathered over his eyes and his tongue refused to speak. Then the merchant knew that the name of this visitor was Death!

All other claimants on his attention except the friends of Mammon had always found a quick dismissal in the magic phrase "I'am too busy." Humanity, Mercy and Religion had alike begged his influence, means and attention in vain. But when Death came the excuse was powerless; he was compelled to have leisure to die.

Let us beware how we make ourselves too busy to secure life's great end. When the excuse rises to our lips and we are about to say we are too busy to do good, let us remember we cannot be too busy to die.—Ibedem.

DELAWARE

The following we copy from a slave State paper the Blue Hen's Chickens, published at Wilmington Delaware, and in favor of JOHN M. CLAYTON, as a candidate for the Presidency:

"SLAVE TERRITORY—OPINION OF THE DELAWARE LEGISLATURE ON THE SUBJECT.

"The following unmistakeable preamble and resolutions were passed at the last session of the Legislature, which embody the sentiments of a very large majority of the citizens of this State, who see too clearly the wrong and evils of slavery to desire its extension and propagation. The recent declarations of some Southern slaveholders in the public councils of the nation, that slavery is a blessing, is so revolting to humanity, common sense and genuine republicanism—so contrary to the principles upon which our Independence was achieved and our present United States Government founded—that it ought to be frowned upon by every patriot and honest man of any and every party, sect, or name, and opposed in every form. That we should acquire territory for the accommodation of two or three hundred thousand slaveholders, men who keep their fellow men in bondage, men who traffic in human flesh, to the exclusion of nearly fifteen milions of free men, is too unreasonable as well as too unjust to belong entertained, even by the most abandoned and designing. It would be like sanctioning and appropriating places for drunkingness, lewdness, and gambling, and other loathsome vices, with a view of promoting virtue. Can the human mind in this enlightened age tolerate such heresies? Not in America certainly. But the resolutions speak volumes for the virtue and intelligence of Delaware, which is nominally a slave State. Slavery as it is we would not meddle with, but leave to be cured by the States in which it exist

"Whereas a crisis has arrived in the public affairs of this nation which requires the full and free expression of the people through their legal representatives; and whereas the United States is at war with a sister Republic occasioned by the annexation of Texas, with a view to the addition of slave territory to our country, and the extension of the slave power in our Union; and whereas, in the opinion of this General Assembly, such acquisions are hostile to the spirit of our free institutions, and contrary to sound morality: Therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Delaware in General Assembly met, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are hereby requested to vote against the annexation of any new territory which shall not thereafter be forever free from slavery.

"Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing resolution be transmitted to our Senators and Represenatives in congress.

"Adopted at Dover, February 25, 1847."

PENNSYLVANIA.

From a brief statement of the fact, that the Democratic State Convention of Pennsylvania, which recently met at Harrisburg, nominated Mr. Buchanan, it might seem that the preferences of the Democrats of that State were decided. But within a few days we have been informed of several facts, which lead to a different conclusion. Although Mr. Buchanan was nominated, his friends were defeated in every other movement of any importance. Their first effort was to induce the Convention to appoint a committee of twenty to nominate all the delegates, the design being to secure a delegation fully committed to Mr Buchanan. It failed, the delegates from the several Congressional districts claiming their right to select their own delegates. The result was that out of the twenty-four chosen, fifteen were unfriendly to the nomination It is true, the Convention passed a resolution, instructing them all to sustain Mr. Buchanan, so long as there should be, in the judgment of a majority of them, a prospect of securing his nomination; but we presume the majority will be easily discouraged.

Mr. Sanderson, the delegate chosen from the district of Mr. Wilmot being obnoxious to the supporters of Mr Buchanan on account of his strong hostility to the extension of slavery, and his warm friendship for Mr. Wilmot, a strenuous effort was made to defeat the ratification of his nomination, but it utterly failed after a powerful speech of Mr. Wilmot, in which he defended the great measure with which his name has been identified.

This was not all. We have been informed of other facts not very encouraging in their import to Mr Buchanan, the statement of which, however, we copy from the New York Evening Post:

"As Mr. Buchanan was recognised as the candidate of Pennsylvania, it would naturally be expected that the Convention which declared him to be its choice should express its decided concurrence with his views on the slavery question. Nothing of this kind was done, however—no such expresion appears either in the address or the resolutions but this was not for want of due effort on the part of his friends. They presented in the committee a resolution condemning in strong terms the Wilmot Proviso, and another approving of the extension of the Missouri Compromise to new territory; adopting, in short, implicitly the views of Mr. Buchanan on this question. The resolutions were rejected in committee, and went no further. In the draft of the address prepared and presented to the committee, was a passage sustaining the Missouri Compromise, and complimenting Mr. Buchanan on his well-known Bucks County letter. This was also expunged in committee."

The Evening Post remarks:

"One of the most remarkable circumstances attending this Convention, according to the accounts we have received, is the effect produced by Mr. Wilmot's speech when the attempt was made to exclude him from the delegation. After observing that the [illegible] to Mr. Sanderson was his known and [illegible] first friendship to himself, Mr. Wilmot took occasion to enter, somewhat at length, into an examination of the merits of the controversy between the extensionists and those who urge for keeping the new territories as a place of settlement for free laborers only. The explanation was seasonable, its effect was tremendous, and we are assured that when he closed, a strong and respectable favor might have been raised among the members in favor of a resolution asserting the principle of the Wilmot Proviso. The grounds of that measure, it seems, are yet imperfectly understood in many parts of Pennsylvania, but as the discussion of the question proceeds, its true merits are perceived. Our letters assure us that, if present indications may be relied on, the time is not far distant when Pennsylvania will move shoulder to shoulder with New York in this great controversy.—Ibebem.

Channing on Books.—In the best books great men talk to us, with us, and give us their most precious thoughts. Books are the voices of the distant and the dead. Books are the true travellers. They give to all who will faithfully use them, the society and the presence of the best and greatest of our race. No matter how poor I am; no matter though the prosperous of my own time will not enter my obscure dwelling. If learned men and poets will enter and take their abode under my roof; if Milton will cross my threshold to sing to me of Paradise; and Shakspeare open to me the worlds of imagination, and the workings of the human heart; and Franklin enrich me with his practical wisdom, I shall not pine for want of intellectual companionship, and I may become a cultivated man, though excluded from what is called the best society in the place where I live.—The Examiner.

A TART REPLY.—A lady who presumed to make some observation while a physician was recommending her husband to a better world, was told by the doctor that if some women were to be admitted there their tongues would make paradise a purgatory. "And if some physicians," replied the lady, "were to be admitted there, they would make it a desert."—Ibedem.

THE DEAD SEA TO BE EXPLORED

The Dead Sea is to be explored by officers of the U S Navy, who have recently sailed for the Mediterranean The enterprise is directed by the Federal Government, and the results of it will be looked for with deep interest —Scientific inquirers from the new World in the West on the shores of the Dead Sea—investigating questions over which the wise men of the East have slept for ages in apathy! This is new.

The Dead Sea, (says the N. Y. Courier,) is to be explored by American sailors—that sea of marvels which after engulfing the guilty cities of the plain"—has been ever since invested, to the imagination, with awful and suppernatural character. "A pestilential vapor, it has been said rises continually from its waters; fish cannot live in nor birds fly over them; iron will not sink in them nor have they ever been navigated by ship or bark. Such slight examination as occasional travellers of more recent days have given to this bitter sea, has dispelled many of these fables; but still these deep dark waters are a mystery to the world They have been found to contain—as accounting for their extraordinary specific gravity, which led to the tale that iron would not sink in them—41 parts in a hundred of salt; a much greater proportion than that of the sea and derived from entre rocks of this mineral continually dissolving on the southern shore. Bitumin also rises in abundance from the bottom and floats on the surface—and hence these waters acquire a consistency which enables them to bear up bodies that would sink in other waters

The Rev Dr. Durbin, late President of Dickinson College, (Pa,) gives the following illustration of the density of these waters.

"I waded in carefully to test the oft repeated statements of the great specific gravity of the fluid and repeated the experiment several times; the uniform result was that when the waters rose above my armpits but not over my shouldres my body was balanced and I could not touch the bottom but my feet tended stongly to rise and my head to dscend. When I turned on my back and drew up my knees so as to balance the body on the surface, I lay as still as a knot of wood, my head, knees and half of my feet, out of the water; and so long as I was perfectly still I floated in this position These expiriments satisfied me of its great specific gravity."

The Doctor adds that his hair was matted with the bitumin which on being pressed by the fingers covered them with a sticky substance.

Josephus in his fourth book of the wars of the Jews, relates that the waters of the Dead Sea support on the surface whatever is thrown into the lake, and confirms the relation by the fact that Vespasian to convince himself of the truth of this assertion, ordered several persons, with their hands and legs tied to be thrown into the lake, and that not one of them sank.

But it is less to verify or refute problems such as these that an exploration of the Dead Sea by competent and scientific observers is desired, than to ascertain its actual relation to the waters of the Mediterranean, from which it is distant not more than between 30 and 40 miles yet the level of the Dead Sea is said to be some hundreds of feet below that of the Mediterranean.

Into the Dead Sea the River Jordan discharges and loses itself. Descending from the Sea of Tiberias which is in fact a shallow outspreading in the fashion of a lake of the river—some 60 miles in a winding course; the Jordan disappears in this deep and bitter asphaltic sea which is about 24 miles in length from north to south; and not more according to modern travellers than six or seven in breadth.

It is comparatively shallow at its southern extremity, but its general depth is reputed to be unfathomable.—Its western shore on the side of Arabia or Moab, is one prodigious black perpendicular wall in which there is not a summit or the smallest peak; its eastern or Indian shore is of limestone and sandy chiffs of varied and fantastic forms.

All however, but the more external appearances of this dismal sea and its dreary shores, is matter of conjecture and uncertainty; and hence the greater stimulus to investigation.

The U. S store ship Supply, being bound to the Mediterranean with stores, is to be employed under Lieut Lynch, as her commander with Lieut. Dale, who will be more specially charged with the scientific researches

To effect the exploration of the Dead Sea they will, it is presumed land at Acra, and thence direct their operations across the ancient plains of Jericho and the point of research carefully levelling the intermediate route, in order to determine first of all the relative altitude between the two seas.

It is singular that a government of the new world should be the first to explore and verify the facts concerning a region so intimately connected with the common faith of Christendom and the witness of one of the most awful penalties of transgression under the Patriarchal Dispensation: and we cannot but hope from this expedition what will gratify natural and intelligent curiosity, while confirming the orginal record of the Bible

The great obstacles will be in the jealousy, rapacity, and the evil propensities of the wandering hordes who inhabit or traverse the deserts in the vicinity of the Dead Sea. But our sailors will find some additional sources of relief in an enterprise of science that carries with it some danger; and they will doubtless take care to have arms as well as instruments and keep as sharp a look out on their land cruise as they are wont to do when sailing the salt water.

ANECDOTE OF DR. CHALMERS.

There was a little old woman in the city of Glasgow who much admired Dr. Chalmers and diligently attended all his sermons, on Sundays and week-days, whether they were doctrinal or practical, theological or astronomical. One day she came home in great perplexity, Dr. Chalmers had dweit much upon a "moral lever," with which he wished to uplift human nature. What a "moral lever" was, the little old woman could not divine. A friend took the poker and placed it on the bar of the grate, trying to realize the idea, and make the imagery palpable. The little old woman paused—mused—and at last the fire burned. She bethought of the indignity of the pulpit, the subject, the doctor, and herself, by so gross a materialization of the moral lever," and, bursting with indignation, she asked—"Do you mean to tell me that Dr. Chalmers would preach a whole hour about a poker?"—Ibedem

THE EDUCATION OF THE HEART.

The following remarks, on a subject of great practical interest, are commended to the consideration of Parents and Teacher. They are from an able article which recently appeared in the London Quarterly Review.

It is the voice of the age, to substitute learning for wisdom—to educate the head, and forget that there is a more important education necessary for the heart. The reason is cultivated at an age when nature does not furnish the elements necessary to a successful cultivation of it; and the child is solicited to reflection, when he is only capable of sensation and emotion. In infancy, the attention and the memory are only excited strongly by things which impress the senses, and move the heart; and a father shall instil more solid and available instruction in an hour spent in the fields, where wisdom and goodness are exemplified, seen and felt, than in a month spent in the study, where they are expounded in stereotyped aphorisms.

No physican doubts that precocious children in fifty cases for one are much the worse for the discipline they have undergone. The mind seems to have been strained and the foundations for insanity are laid. When the studies of maturer years are stuffed into the head of a child, people do not reflect on the anatomical fact, that the brain of an infant is not the brain of a man; that the one is confirmed and can bear exertion, the other is growing and requires repose; that to force the attention to abstract facts, to load the memory with chronological and historical or scientific detail; in short, to expect a child's brain to bear with impunity the exertion of a man's is just as rational as it would be to hazard the same sort of experiment on its muscles.

The first eight or ten years of life should be devoted to the education of the heart—to the formation of principles rather than to the acquirement of what is usually termed knowledg. Nature herself points out such a course; for the emotions are then the liveliest and most easily moulded being as yet unalloyed by passion. It is from this source that the mass of men are hereafter to draw their sum of happiness or misery; the action of the immense majority are, under all circumstances, determided much more by feeling than reflection; in truth life presents an infinity of occasions where it is essential to happiness that we should feel rightly—very few where it is at all necessary that we should think profoundly.

Up to the seventh year of life, very great changes are going on in the structure of the brain and demand therefore the utmost attention not to interrupt them by improper or over excitement Just that degree of exercise should be given to the brain, at this period, as is necessary to its health; and the best oral instruction, exemplified by objects which strike the senses

It is, perhaps, unnecessary to add, that at that period of life, special attention should be given, by parents and teachers, to the physical devotement of the child. Pure air and free exercise are indispensable—and wherever these are withheld, the consequence will be certain to extend themselves over the whole future life The seeds of protracted and hopeless suffering, have, in innumble instances, been sown in the constitution of the child, simply through ignorance of this great fundamental physical law; and the time has come, when the united voices of these innocent victims shall ascend, "trumped-tongued," to the ears of every parent and teacher in the land: "Give us free air and wholesome exercise; leave to develope our expadingn engrise; in according with the laws of our being, and full scope for the elastic and bounding impulses of our young blood."—Ibedem

CHEAP.—We find the following in some of our exchanges:

"Give me freedom in every thing said a man to us a few days since. I have been a member of church for forty years and up to this time it has not cost me a penny. That's what I call a free gospel."

This reminds us of an anecdote of Rev Mr. S, a distinguished Methodist preacher well known in the west, who was remarkable for his piety and eloquence, as well as his occasional eccentricities. He went to his rest a few years since, after having labored long and faithfully in his Master service.

On one occasion he was preaching with great fevor the freeness of the gospel, and around him was an attentive congregation with eager eyes turned to the preacher and drinking every word into thier souls Among the rest was an individual who had always been more remarkable for opening his mouth to say amen, than for opening his purse. Though he never gave money for the support of the gospel yet he might be said to support the pulpit, for he aways stood by it. He had on this occasion taken his usual place near the preacher's stand, and was making his responses with even more than his usual animation After a burst of burning eloquence from the preacher, he clapped his hands, and cried out in a kind of ecstacy, "Yes, thank God I have been a Methodist for twenty-five years and it hasn't cost me twenty-five cents!" God bless your stingy soul!" was the preacher's emphatic reply.

Character of the Gentleman.

Dr. Lieber, of the College of South Carolina' in a recent address before the students of that Institution made the "Character of the Gentleman" the subject of an excellent address. If space permitted the address, should exhibit its good points by abundant extracts. In the absence, however, of larger quotations we give the following:

"I have stated already that the forbearing use of power is a sure attribute of the true gentleman; indeed, we may say that power, physical, moral, purely social, or political, is one of the touchstones of genuine gentlemanship. The power which the husband has over the wife, in which we must include the impunity with which he may be unkind to her; the father over his children; the teacher over his pupils: the old over the young; the young over the aged; the strong over the weak; the officer over his men; the master of a vessel over his hands; the magistrate over the citizens; the employer over the employed; the rich over the poor, the educated over the uneducated; the experienced over the confiding; the keeper of a secret over him whom it touches; the gifted over the ordinary man, even the clever over the silly—the forbearing and inoffensive use of all this power or authority or a total abstinence from it where the case admits will show the gentleman in a plain unostentatious manner. Every traveller knows whether a gentleman or rude officer is seeking his trunks. But the use of power does not only form a touchstone; even the manner in which an individual enjoys certain advantages over others is a test. No gentleman can boast of the deligins of superior health in presence of a languid patient, or speak of great good luck when in hearing of a man bent by habitual misfortune. Let a man who happily enjoys the blessings of a pure and honest life, speak of it to a fallen criminal fellow-being, and you will soon see whether he be in addition to his honesty a gentleman or not. The gentleman does not needlessly and unceasingly remind an offender of a wrong he may have committed against him. He cannot only forgive, he can forget and he strives for that neatness of soul and manliness of character, which impart sufficient strength to let the past be past. He will never use the power which the knowledge of an offence a false step, or an unfortunate exposure of weakness give him, merely to enjoy the power of humiliating his neighbor. A true man of honor feels humbled himself, when he cannot help humbling others.—The Examiner.

Mock Oysters of Corn.—Take a dozen and a half ears of young corn and grate all the grains off the cob as fine as possible. Mix with the grated corn three large table spoonfuls of sifted flour and the yolk of six eggs well beaten. Let all be well incorporated by hard beating. Have ready in frying pan an equal proportion of lard and fresh butter. Heat it over the fire till it is boiling hot, and then put in portions of the mixture as nearly as possible in shape and size like fried oysters. Fry them brown, and send to table hot. They should be near an inch thick. In taste it has a singular resemblance to fried oysters The corn must be young.

Presure of the Sea.—If a piece of wood which floats on the waters be forced down to a great depth in the sea the pressure of the surrounding liquid will force it into pores of the wood and so increase its weight that it will no longer be capable of floating or rising to the surface. Hence the number of ships which have foundered in the deep part of the ocean never rise again to the surface like those which have sunk near to the shore. A diver may with impunity plunge to a certain depth of the sea; but there is a limit beyond which he cannot live under the pressure to which he is subject. For the same reason, it is probable that there is a depth beyond which fishes cannot live. They according to soundings have been caught in a depth at which they must have sustained a pressure of eight tons to each square foot of their bodies—

Considerations Respecting the Lawfulness of War under the Gospel Dispensation; addressed to the Teachers and Professors of Christianity in the United States of America [Issued by New York Meeting for Sufferers.]

Solemnly impressed, as we are, with the belief that war is irreconcilable with the precepts and the spirit of the Gospel, and prohibited by it, we cannot but feel that a fearful weight of responsibility is assumed by Christian nations in its prosecution, and under this conviction we are constrained to invite the professors of the Christian religion, and especially those who are looked to as its expounders, to a very serious and unbiassed consideration of this subject.

If we advert to the consequences resulting from war—its tendency to lower the standard of public morals—the slaughter and misery it produces—the domestic bereavements, anguish, and mourning inseparable from it—a subject is presented to our view, possessing the strongest claim to the serious reflection of the professors of the benign religion of Jesus Christ.

It has been highly gratifying to observe of latter years, that the most enlightened nations have manifested an increasing reluctance to appeal to the sword—that cruel and uncertain arbiter—in the settlement of national controversies; and that the efforts to adjust those controversies by peaceful negotiation, have, in numerous instances, been crowned with the most satisfactory results.

The hope indeed, has been cherished, that in the present enlightened age of the world, and particularly in this enlightened country, the influence of pure, elevated moral principles and feelings, had obtained such an ascendency in the minds of the people, as to prevent an appeal to arms; but this pleasing anticipation has not been realized. Our country, for a considerable time, has been engaged in war—exerting its powerful energies in the work of human slaughter. The fields of a neighbouring nation have been strewn with the bodies of the slain, and its soil drenched with their blood. Can it be that this is in accordance with the precepts and the spirit of our holy religion?

The Prophets in foretelling the coming of the Messiah, and describing the nature of his mission, present him in the character of the Prince of Peace,—of the increase of whose government and peace there shall be no end. It is declared that "He shall judge among the nations and shall rebuke many people; and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks, nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." This strong and unequivocal language clearly indicates, that it was the will and purpose of the Most High that war should eventually be abolished.

And in the fulness of time, when an angel was commissioned to announce the advent of the promised Saviour, the announcement was accompanied with a rapturous song from "a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God, and saying, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will towards men."

In harmonious agreement with the language of prophecy, and the ecstatic song of the angelic host, was the life and ministry of our Lord and Saviour. The law of the preceding dispensation, admitted the principle of retaliation—"An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth." Moses refers to this for the express purpose of placing a prohibition upon it. "But I say unto you, That ye resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also." While those under the Law were allowed to hate an enemy, His command is—I say unto you, love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you, and persecute you—that ye may be the children of your Father which is in Heaven."

Now, if the followers of Christ are forbidden to resist evil, and to have an enemy; it is evident that the spirit which engenders war cannot be entertained by them; and this conclusion is rendered, if possible, still stronger, by the high standard, and holy inducement to which he immediately directs their attention,—"That ye may be the children of your Father which is in Heaven."

Many other similar precepts from the same high authority could be adduced, but they are familiar to the class of readers whom we address. They are plain and positive, and they receive additional force from the accompanying reference to the Law of the preceding dispensation. They are the precepts and injunctions of Him whom we call our Lord and Master—and whom we profess to love and serve.

We ask for no new, or strained meaning to these precepts; we accept the words in their plain literal import and so they were evidently accepted by the Apostles, and the primitive believers. Of this there can be no doubt. If we revert to Apostolic language as it is presented in the Epistles to the Churches, we shall there meet with injunctions, and exhortations, entreaties in strict accordance with the precepts of their Divine Master. "Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." "See that none render evil for evil, to any man; but ever follow that which is good, both among yourselves, and to all men." "Love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous, not rendering railing for railing, but contrariwise, blessing; knowing that ye are thereunto called, that ye should inherit a blessing." "Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves; but rather give place unto wrath; for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay saith the Lord."

Now let us ask, if language could be framed, more strongly prohibiting the indulgence of the spirit which produces war, than that in the preceding passages.

If it be said that war is not directly, and specifically interdicted; we reply, neither was suicide nor many other universally acknowledged crimes.

It was seen fit to forbid them by enforcing those virtues that must effectually exclude them. If Christianity forbids those passions which engender war—which are fed by it, and without which, indeed, it cannot exist, it follows inevitably that Christianity forbids war.

I will be told, that the views and the practice of the Quakers, in regard to Christianity—giving as they did, rise to the time of its Founder, and upon the teaching of the Apostles, in their immediate successors—are entitled to great influence in settling this momentous question; and ecclesiastical history of the highest authority establishes the fact, that the early Christians refused only to fight—that they were forbidden to fight—but that they manifested their sincerity by offering up their lives, rather than violate, what they deemed, an injunction of their Divine Master. A few cases may here be cited:

Maximilian, a Roman youth, on being brought before the tribunal, to be enrolled as a soldier, refused—saying to the Proconsul, I am a Christian and cannot fight." On being told that there was no alternative between bearing arms, and being put to death, he promptly and firmly replied—"I cannot fight, if I die." He continued firm to his principles, and was led to execution.

The primitive Christians not only refused to enlist, as soldiers but those in the army who embraced Christianity, immediately abandoned the profession, without regard to consequences.

Marcellus, a Roman Centurion, on professing a conversion to Christianity, publicly resigned his commission, declaring, that in order to become a Christian he could serve no longer. "It is not lawful," said he, "for a Christian to fight, even for any earthly empire." He continued firm in his refusal, and was executed on that account.

Cassian, who was a Notary, at the same legion, on embracing Christianity, resigned his commission, and flung away the several instruments employed by Maximian, was led to execution. Marinus, a Roman, who was bred to the profession of arms, on being converted to Christianity, abandoned the army, saying, "I am a Christian, and therefore I cannot fight."—Phila. Paper.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA, JULY 28, 1848

The Besiegers Besieged and Taken.

About four months ago a large and populous native town in the vicinity of Bo Porah, and directly on the great road which leads to that formerly celebrated emporium of slaves and merchandize, was furiously assaulted by a large force, which suddenly presented itself before the walls of the town. As no known provocation had been given for the war, there was no expectation of it, and no preparation had been made for defence.

Boolah-Jah (Boolah's-town) for such was the name of the city, had been newly rebuilt—greatly enlarged and surrounded by a wall about twenty feet high, pierced with numerous gates for facility of egress and ingress. The wall had just been completed, and the scaffolding around the outside had not been taken down. After a short resistance, the besiegers by means of the scaffold scaled the walls, and carried the town. Having secured the victory, they at once commenced the work of destruction, and a venerable Mahomedan priest fell first under the blow of the battle-axe. They proceeded in their butcheries until the blood of fifty victims drenched the earth, when their avarice of blood a little glutted, they paused for a while in their sanguinary career.

Very fortunately for the whole country, Boolah, the King or Chief of this town with his principal men were absent at another town on business of state, or of pleasure. Had this formidable chief been involved in the common destruction, the whole country would have been ravaged by those foreign marauders. The news of the capture of the town soon reached the King, and with characteristic energy, he commenced concerting means for resistance and revenge. It required no long argument nor much persuasion to kindle the rage of the whole Kondah and Mandingo population, as the attack on this town was considered by those trafficking tribes a general injury. Boolah-Jah was formerly an inconsiderable hamlet. It is situated on the interior boundary of the Golah country. It has long been a kind of carravensary and subject to constant attacks by predatory bands of Golahs roving in quest of plunder. Boolah anxious to preserve the peace of the country, and to keep open a safe and constant communication between the Atlantic and interior tribes, made war upon a bevy of petty Golah Chiefs, compelled them to sue for peace, which he granted, on condition that they would remain quiet and throw no obstructions in the way of trade, and in order to keep them to the terms of their stipulation, as well as to be able to keep open the communication enlarged, and fortified his town. He had just completed it when the Mendians made their attack. The Mendians come from a considerable distance. Their country, we are told lies to the North east of Gallenas, and the force which attacked Boolah Jah, is one of three divisions sent out to different quarters on similar errands of robbery and murder.

While the Mendians were rioting in the midst of fancied security and triumph, and exulting over the easily conquered and defenceless captives, and displaying to themselves their skill and prowess, in uncouth gestures and fiendish grimaces, and anticipating the gratulations with which they would be received on their return to their homes, they were suddenly appalled by the appearance of a powerful force, advancing on all sides upon the town.

They made no attempt at a parly—they knew that was altogether out of the question: they were the aggressors, and now they had nothing to hope from the humanity or laity of their enraged enemy. They remained quiet for some time meditating plans for escape; and they contrived to convey a message to their country for a reinforcement. The detachment came, but was met by the Kondahs, and after a hard and bloody fight, the Mendians were driven back. The seige was vigorously kept up, and the small stock of provisions which the Mendians had in the town, was nearly exhausted. They determined to abandon the town—to commit themselves to the issue of a desperate struggle, and if possible, cut their way through the enemy's line, and thus regain their liberty. This was a noble resolution, and they attempted to carry it into effect. It appears however, their counsels, or rather deliberations were anticipated—for when the gates were thrown open, and the Mendians rushed forth with a hideous yell and furious onset, the Kondahs, with a firmness and bravery which unprovoked injury alone inspires, met them and manfully drove them back. The Mendians made two subsequent attempts to evacuate the town and cut their way through, but with similar results—on both occasions they were driven back, and the lines of circumvallation were drawn closer.

After some weeks their stock of provisions entirely failed, and famine, gaunt and spectre-like made its appearance. Still they held out—and with a sullen obstinacy would neither open the gates nor submit to capitulate. Death followed in the train of famine, and soon the town became an extended burying ground; with this difference, that the dead bodies either through the carelessness or weakness of the survivors, were rather sprinkled with earth than buried in it. The town at this time presented a most sickening aspect. Hugh carcasses of bones held together apparently only by a shrivelled integument, through which they threatened to cut their way, and this shrunken and smoked and coked with the accumulated filth of weeks, and pierced by a thinly beard, the growth of months, the whole moving along in a tottering and wavering gait, gave some intimation of the misery to which these wretches were reduced.

Close upon the footsteps of famine its fore attendant, black and deathful pestilence made its appearance. Reduced and debilitated by starvation, these walking carcasses presented an easy prey for the first approach of disease, and as the fetid exhalations arose from the putrid, half buried bodies, they fell to the earth, and the dying and the dead mingled in one promiscuous and melancholy heap!!

The town where this unfortunate affair took place occupied an important position. It stood in the great thoroughfare of the country, on a confluence of many paths, which diverge thence to all parts of the interior. Consequently there was a total cessation of trade from all the regions interior to that. The effects were severely felt even here; and the answer of the natives to every inquiry "why no trade come," was "war done stop all dem parts" and it was constantly affirmed that the country would continue unsettled, and trade depressed until a decisive victory should declare in favor of one or the other party. Of course the traders of this place became not only anxious for this event, but willing to aid in accelerating its arrival. In aid of the Kondahs messengers instructed in the management of rockets were despatched with a supply, with instructions, to throw them into the town among the thatched huts. The messengers arrived a few days before the pestilence broke out, and strange to say, when they arrived, the houses were uncovered and divested of every thing which could be easily ignited. Such an opportunity, however, for the display of military genius was not to be lost, and the rockets were thrown, but fell harmlessly to the earth. A few days afterwards the pestilence broke out and they died by scores. "Dis fire be debil" said they, and opened the gates and yielded themselves to their fate!!

It is a singular fact, and worthy to be noticed, that wherever a Mandingo man establishes himself among Pagans, he invariably attracts respect and deference—gains influence in the councils of the people amongst whom he sojourns—becomes the idol of the place, and not unfrequently gathers the reins of power in his hands, and governs whole regions with an absolute and uncontroled sway. He prescribes in all matters pertaining to religion—presides in all religious exercises—steers in all matters of the hearing art—decides in political deliberations, and leads the armies to battle. Indeed a well educated Mandingo, which is but another term for Mahommedan, is regarded with a degree of respect, bordering upon idolatry, and a town is regarded fortunate in which one of these book men takes up his residence, and all are ready to do him savice, from the owner of the horse-tail to the meanest of his slaves. We will not undertake to say whether this sentiment is inspired by the fact that he sabby-book, or that he be God man, we only assert the fact, and leave others to assign the cause. Perhaps we would not be far from the truth were we to attribute it to the latter. The natives have some secret political-religious system among themselves, in which the devil is allowed to have an important influence; and in the unsophisticated minds of these heathen, religion and diabolical agency are synonymous terms.

A Beautiful Custom.

A very simple custom prevails among the natives of these parts, which we do not remember to have seen adverted to. It is this. When a native is passing in the territory of another tribe, or through the territory of a different klan of his own tribe, approaches a town, he invariably provides himself with a leafy branch from some tree or bush. We have seen them go some distance from the town to provide themselves with this emblem of peace. Thus they enter in the hand, and if they carry a lamah or other wrist, they attach thereto, and hold it so as to be conspicuous. If there be fifty in a company, each one provides himself with an olive branch," and it seems to be the very first object to which the people of the town direct their attention, as soon as they enter; especially if there has been recently a war, or rumor of war, they deposit all their baggage and trading apparatus in some conspicuous place, surmounted by the friendship-declaring twig.

COMMUNICATION.

For the Liberia Herald.

MESSRS EDITORS:—Among all the solemn and important things which relates to religion, there is nothing that strikes the soul of man, with so much awe and solemnity, as the scene of death; the very dreadful, or very delightful circumstances which attends it:—it has two forms to come to man in: one in the garb of consternation and dreadful foreboding, to usher the soul into the presence of an angry Judge, to receive its just doom, and to be the companions of miserable spirits; this state is awful in the extreme, it causes the soul to quake to meet such a doom. The other is, the happy welcome to the soul, that have been suffering for to gain eternal felicity,—that has been washed and made clean by the blood of the Lamb, and have had numerous cares, wishes to be relieved from them:—to be loosed from all toils, care, perplexities and hardships, in this world, to rest with Jesus Christ" and happy spirits in the Heavenly mansions. Though this is a happy state, yet man shrinks back to live again, why because the change is awful, to die is man's greatest fear; he lingers on the shores of time, reluctant to depart. Taking every thing connected with it into serious consideration, who can think of entering into that unknown world, or region, where spirits dwells, without having the strongest impression on the mind, arising from so strange a manner of existence, from whence no traveller never return, to tell the regulations of its hiden government; surely it is awful in all its premises, and deserves the attention of men, to be awakened, and be in readiness to meet their God. All men must die; the decree has gone forth; many has been brought to obey, though they endeavored to defy the strength of the same. We can take a survey of the millions of the resurrection of the dead, and of the tribunal of Christ, before which men and angels must appear to be judged, and therefrom, receive their doom, without having the most painful and sad solicitude, "what will my sentence be!"—Who can meditate on the real unmingled pleasures or pain in the world to come, without the most pathetic emotion of the soul, since each of us must be the subjects of one of these states, and they are coeternal in their duration. These are things that touch the springs of every passion, no matter how stern they might be, in the most sensible manner imaginable. The approach of death moves every faculty of the creature, and causes him to shrink back into life again.

"The pains, the groans and dying strife,
Fright us approaching souls away;
Still we shrink back again to life
Fond of our prison and our clay."

Man, rather be grovelling with the growing trouble to come, than meet the monster death, though it may bring the assurance of "Eternal Happiness." The great assurance of protection has been made sure and fundamental, by our "Lord and Master," to all those who will live a virtuous life; the appearance of death to the whole is fearful, yet the whole aspect is changed. Death to those who are bought with a price, no longer the tyrant, who approaches with his iron rod, but the messenger who brings the tidings of life and liberty. The prisoner's youth opens to him, cheers him onward, even in the valley of death's shade; green pastures appears to rise. They look upon themselves as going forth,—not to be silent and alone in the darkness of the grave; not to wander forsaken in the wild desert of the universe, not even to enter into a world where they are altogether strangers to the inhabitants, though many shall be ancient sages and fathers, who have fought and gained the immortal shores, yet they will be familiar, with those whom they never saw in the flesh. The attack of death upon those who are Christ's, don't avail much, for the great and decisive battle has been fought already. The leader of the Christians made sure work, at the great Battle on Mount Calvary, when the Sovereign, with the sceptre of Hell and Death trampled, and the Star erected on the sepulchre, and the victory proclaimed, "Hell thou art overcome, and shall be forever; that is said, the world is overcome, his people shall exist, eternal, the Cyprian triumphant exclaims "O Death where is thy sting! O grave where is thy victory." The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law! But thanks be to God, which gives us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ!"—A joyful note to be sung from the gates of the skies, to the unto himself a people, to dwell with him forever. Happy are they whose lot it shall be to put their feet upon the threshold of the Heavenly shores.

These remarks arises from the so ennui task I had to perform a few days ago, in preaching a sermon over the remains of brother and sister Hall, who died in the same house, and the interval between their deaths, was about 28 hours or more. Both had emigrated to this country in December 1845, in the ship Roan Che, from King George County Virginia.

Brother Hall was a practitioner of the Thomsonian scheme. He has practiced here, and no doubt met up with tolerably good success. They also joined the Baptist Church at Caldwell, and from what I can gather, both was consistent members up to the time of their death; from the time they professed to Christ, by receiving the wholesome instructions of redeeming grace. They endeavored to live up to having the fear of God before them by a Christian walk. To those of an Arminian Providence is entirely a stranger to the case.—The happy country to have had the privilege of living here together as friends and at the end of their days, to be called away, to appear before the throne of their "Heavenly Father" almost at the same time, to enjoy their reward to all eternity. O—how sad and how a cloud was upon us. Language cannot express the solemnity that pervaded the whole assembly;—free tears rolled from every eye, to behold the "valuable pair" of souls, having in its confines, the couple, who for years struggled to gain everlasting rest. What jaughter can be more keener than that. Ought we not to look around ourselves, and strive to be ready, being aware that the "Son of Man will come as a thief in the night" that is sudden and unexpected. Mankind, notwithstanding the message given them, shall continue to the last in their wonted security. Our Saviour tells us, that "as in the days of Noah, before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriages, until the flood came, and took them all away; so shall also, the coming of the Son of Man be."—How many projects and designs, shall that day suddenly confound:—what long continued schemes of pleasure shall it overthrow:—what plans of cunning and ambition shall it utterly blast. How miserable they, whom it shall overtake in the midst of dark conspiracies of criminal deeds, or profligate pleasures; in what strong colours is their danger: such a description is apt to be considered as exaggerated.—The impression of those awful events, is weakened by the distance of time, at which our imaginations places them. But have not we had a striking image set before us, in our own country, to show us that the summons will be tendered to us in short. It is highly necessary for us to find out our true position with our Lord. Yea, we should find out at once, for we know not who will be the next.

To tread the lonely vale of death,
Whilst gloomy thought arrest the breast;
Whose irresistable awfulness,
Cause the strongest heart to quake.

Death, the lonely path from earth,
In which no traveller dare to lurk;
But onward press his way to bear,
The sentence just, for life, or black despair.

The passage though dark and forlorn,
Yet the christian through it pass with songs;
Jesus, the captain, with the light of his grace,
Conducts all of those who have finish'd their race.

The two spirits that have recently fled,
Have by their Master, through conflicts been led;
Their conflicts, sorrows, pains and death,
Shall no more disturb, for in Jesus they rest.

The joys of Paradise, they have received,
No more the intrigue of Satan to deceive;
But hovering around the throne of glory,
Repeating delightful stories.

Will we, who are left behind,
The proffered hand of mercy decline?
Nay but hasty steps the heavenly road pursue,
Thrown up for the Gentiles, Greeks and Jews.

It leads to a world of spirits bright,
The brightness thereof, excludes the night;
And as it is bright, their flaming songs do sing,
Whilst millions fall before the imperial King.

Yours, &c.

An extract from the speech of Hon. Henry Clay, President of the American Colonization Society, delivered before the Society at its last annual meeting.

Gentlemen of the Society: You have placed me in a position which I feel to be both embarrassing and painful. I came here as I told you without note, and almost without preparation of any kind. I have thrown out these remarks in a loose, disjointed manner, mainly that I might gratify wishes which seemed to me irresistible. I have gone through most of the topics—indeed, all of them—which I designed to touch. And I would now implore all parties; I would beseech the Abolitionists, and I would entreat those who carry the doctrine of slavery to an extreme; I would supplicate all men to look calmly and dispassionately at the great enterprise we have in view. I ask them in the name of that God under whose providential smile, as I in my heart believe, this Society has thus far prospered, to look at it, at its objects and at its efforts, with unprejudiced and candid eyes. During, now, a period of twenty-five years without power, without revenue, without aid save the voluntary contributions of the charitable and the humane, has this Society continued its labors. During that period it has carried on a defensive war. It has made treaties. It has purchased territory, and that to a large extent; owning now some three hundred and twenty miles along the western coast of Africa, throughout the whole of which extent (with one dark exception) the slave trade has been suppressed. And in this connexion I may be permitted to remark that if the Government of Europe and of the United States, who have united their efforts for the suppression of the slave trade, would consent to lend but a small portion of the navies they now, at so great a cost, maintain off the African coast, in furtherance of that object, to the great object of colonization, they would prove much more successful than they have hitherto found themselves in putting an end to that detested traffic. I believe that no other means will ever prove so operative and effectual to that end as the covering the entire coast of that quarter of the globe with colonies of free colored men. Them would also be united by sympathy for their enslaved countrymen, in heartily advancing a design which commends itself to every feeling of the black man's heart.

Then let all men look on our Society as it is, and judge of our design with fairness and impartiality.

I am aware that a single motive, which actuated the founders of the Society, has been seized upon, and urged (in some cases with but too much effect) as an objection to the whole plan. It has been stated that the degradation of the free people of color among us is so great that a very large portion of those we fill our jails and penitentiaries consist of them, and it has been truly inferred that the slaves among us would be greatly benefited by the withdrawal of the free blacks from their vicinity and intercourse. And hence the abolitionists have taken occasion to affirm that colonization is but a scheme of Southern slave-holders to perpetuate slavery at home and rivet the chains of every bondman in the land. But I ask is that fair? Ought they not before coming to so injurious a conclusion, to look at all the motives which led to the formation of the Society, and not lay hold on one alone and tear that away from all the rest, to found on it a charge against the whole design? Should they resolutely shut their eyes against such motives as a desire to benefit the subjects of colonization themselves, by conferring on them the substance instead of the mere name of freedom—to the hope of benefiting Africe by spreading there a knowledge of the arts and civilization, and ultimately diffusing the blessings of Christianity among her benighted millions—to the humane design of suppressing the slave trade? Is it right to overlook all these considerations, and fasten on only one motive which could be perverted into selfishness and judge the whole purpose of the Society by that? Let them deal more justly by their neighbor. Let them put together all the causes and motives which combined to give origin to our attempt, and judge us from the whole, and not condemn us on one solitary ground, forcibly and uncharitably torn away from the mass of considerations, which might lead men to such an enterprize.

And now, in conclusion, I should fail of expressing the feeling which are rising in my bosom, did I not congratulate you, gentlemen of the Society, on the eminent success which has already crowned your benevolent labors. A new republic has sprung into existence under your auspices. Yes; a free representative, constitutional republic formed on the model of our own beloved institution. A republic, founded by black men reared by black men put into operation by the blacks, and which holds out to our hope the brightest prospects. Whether we look at what has already been done, or lift our eyes to the future and cast them down the long vista of coming time—when we may anticipate, as we are warranted to do, the dissemination over a large part, if not the whole of Africa, of our own free principles of government, our love of liberty, our knowledg of Christianity, our arts, and civilization and domestic happiness—when we behold those blessings realized on that continent which I trust in God we are long, long destined to enjoy on this, and think how the hearts of posterity will be gladdened by such a spectacle—how we ought our own to exult in hope and to swell with gratitude!

Go on then gentlemen go on in your noble cause. For myself, I shall soon leave you and this stage of human action forever. I may never occupy this chair again; but I trust that the spirit which originated and which has sustained this Society will long continue, now that our African republic is at length born to discharge the duties of guardianship, and aid and co-operation, and evangelize the interests of African freedom, civilization, and social happiness your best energies and most fervent prayers. From this auspicious hour even to the end of time or until the great object of the amicable separation of the two races shall have been fully effected, may others spring up to take your places and to tread in your steps. And finally invoking on this great and good cause the blessings of that God without whom nothing is strong, nothing is holy, and whose smiles, I believe, have hitherto been extended to it, I bid you a cordial farewell.

POETRY

From the Friend.

THE CHILD'S INQUIRY.

[However taste may vary in regard to the following selection, as to whether the poetry be good, it will hardly be denied that at least the logic is; and that Pa has been completely put hors de combat by his boy.]

Child. How big was Alexander pa,
That people call him GREAT?
Was he like old Goliah tall,
His spear an hundred weight?

Was he so large that he could stand
Like some tall steeple high,
And while his feet were on the ground,
His hands could touch the sky?

Father. Oh, no my child; about as large.
As I, or uncle James;
'Twas not his stature made him great.
But greatness of his name.

Child. His name so great? I know'tis long.
But easy quite to spell—
And more than half a year ago,
I knew it very well.

Father. I mean, my child, his actions were
So great, he got a name,
And every body speaks with praise,
And tells about his fame.

Child. Well, what great actions did he do?
I want to know it all.

Father. Why, he it was that conquered Tyre,
And leveled down her wall.

And thousands of her people slew—
And then to Persia went,
And fire and sword, on every side,
Through many a region sent.

A hundred conquered cities shone
With midnight burnings red,
And, strewed o'er many a battle ground,
A thousand soldiers bled.

Child. Did killing people make him great?
Then why was Abel Young,
Who killed his neighbour training day,
Put into jail and hung?

I never heard them call him great.

Father. Ah, that was not in war—
And he who kills a single man
His neighbours all abhor.

Child. Well, then, if I should kill one man,
And kill a hundred more,
I should be great, and not be hung,
Like Abie Young before.

Father. Not so, my child—'twill never do—
The Gospel bids, be kind.

Child. Then they that kill, and they that praise,
The Gospel do not mind.

Father. You know my child, the Bible says,
That you must always do
To other people as you wish
To have them do to you.

Child. But pa, did Alexander wish
To have some strong men come,
And burn his house and kill him too,
And do as he had done?

Yes every body called him great,
For killing people so!
Well pa, what must he to kill,
To be a little low?

If one should burn the building near,
And kill the folks within Should any body call him great,
For such a wicked thing?

From the Maryland Temperance Herald.

GO AHEAD!

Never doubt a righteous cause;
Go ahead!
Throw yourself completely in;
Conscience shaping all your laws,
Manly through thick and thin,
Go ahead!

Do not ask who'll go with you;
Go ahead!
Numbers spurn the coward's plea:
If there be but one or two,
Single-handed though it be,
Go ahead!

Though before you mountains rise,
Go ahead!
Scale them?—certainly you can;
Let them proudly dare the skies—
What are mountains to a man?
Go ahead!

Though before you mountains rise,
Go ahead!
Let no hardship baffle you;
Though the heavens roar and flash,
Still—undaunted, firm and true—
Go ahead!

From the Christian Observer.

The following beautiful stanzas, which breathe all the spirit of poetry and the spirit of the best philosophy, are transferred to our columns from the works of Mrs. F. Tegner, recently published by Messrs. Wiley & Putnam, of New York, and noticed in our last.—ED.

CHEER UP! CHEER UP!

FOR MUSIC.

Never go gloomily, man with a mind!
Hope is a better companion than fear,
Providence, ever benignant and kind,
Gives with a smile what you take with a tear;
All will be right,
Look to the light.—
Morning is ever the daughter of night,
All that was black will be all that is bright,
Cheerily, cheerily then! cheer up.

Many a foe is a friend in disguise,
Many a sorrow a blessing most true,
Helping the heart to be happy and wise
With love ever precious and joys ever new;
Stand in the van,
Strive like a man!
This is the bravest and cleverest plan,
Trusting in God, while you do what you can,
Cheerily, cheerily then! cheer up!

AN EXTRAORDINARY EFFECT OF IMAGINATION.

There resided at Schamburg, in Germany, a respectable citizen, who supported himself by book-binding. He was an intimate friend of Dr. Stilling's and when any of his family was sick, usually employed his professional services. On a certain occasion, when his wife was ill, he sent for his physician. Stilling hastily mounted his horse and rode thither. He arrived late in the evening, and was obliged to remain over night.

After attending to his patient, and refreshing himself with a social repast, his friend conducted him to the chamber. Just as he was setting the candle on the stand, the eye of the Dr. caught a picture that hung near the looking-glass. It was painted on copper, and was a master piece of art. He stood awhile examining it with admiration but as he did so he gradually felt a cold chill of horror creeping through his system, for he observed in it something of a ghastly appearance. He tried to trace the peculiar feature which seemed to produce it. The effect was the combined result of the whole. This impression was so strong upon the mind of the Dr., that he found it necessary to call in the aid of reason to remain in the chamber over night.

The portrait was of great size—the half portrait of a man between thirty and forty. His costume was that of the present (18th) century. He had on a broad hat, a periwig, and was clothed in embroidered scarlet. Stilling found it impossible to take his eyes from it. The more he surveyed it, the deeper became his sense of horror. His friend observing the effect it had upon him, asked how he was pleased with the portrait. He replied, "Indeed I know not what to say. I perceive it is a masterpiece of art, and the portrait of an exceedingly handsome man, and yet its highly regular features fill me with a sort of horror, though I am entirely unable to define the cause. It is not awe that I feel, nor terror, but something akin to that which I think I should feel if Satan stood before me in the disguise of a handsome man." His friend showed surprise that he should express himself so strongly. He remarked that all who examine it discover something strange and awful in it, but you are the first person who has made so unfavorable a criticism upon it. If you are not too weary, I will give you the history of the singular person to whom I am indebted for this rarity. Stilling was so impressed, that he felt no disposition to sleep. They both therefore sat down, and his friend gave him the following relation:

"About five and twenty years ago, my father made a journey to D———. When he entered the hotel in which he usually put up, a number of persons were sitting around a table drinking wine; but behind the stove he observed a well-dressed stranger, whose despondent and melancholy countenance, excited my father's attention. He inquired of the landlord who he was, but received for an answer, that he was a travelling painter who had arrived there a few days before, and who had been extremely melancholy, but who he was, or whence he came he was unable to inform him. This roused my father's curiosity still more. He drew a chair and seated himself directly opposite to the painter, who showed by his uneasy manner, that the act was by no means agreeable to him. Presently my father noticed that this singular man would occassionally look over his shoulder with a countenance of mingled fear and horror, then immediately start back, with a convulsive shudder, and in a fit of deep despondency, fix his eyes again steadfastly on the floor. "I must have it out of him," thought my father, let it cost what it may. "He moved his chair still closer, so as to converse with him in a low tone. In a kind and friendly manner he said, "My friend, I hope you will pardon my familiarity; you seem to be unhappy; I profess myself the friend of such; perhaps I may be able to relieve the distress you appear to suffer." All who know my father, know well that no one could easily resist his courteous address.—The stranger brightened up a little, and replied, "I am heartily obliged to you for your sympathy, but the nature of my misery is such that no one either in heaven or earth can remove." "But the balm of the gospel, my dear friend" returned my father, "is a sovereign remedy for all miseries. Confidence in the divine Redeemer, can work wonders that nothing else in the universe can equal." His sympathy and counsel proved unavailing, though the wretched man did not entirely close his heart against my father. He was familiar, and kept in his society. My father therefore did not entirely abandon all hope of benefitting him, and of drawing out his secret. He desired to administer substantial consolation. He requested the landlord, if it was convenient, to lodge them in the same room. The request was kindly granted; and as there were two beds in the room, my father chose the vacant one, with the consent of the painter. After supper they proceeded together to the chamber. Here they conversed some time together, when the painter became quite free and communicative, so much so as to open his whole heart to my father.—His dreadful secret was an assassination which he committed in following manner:

He had been royal painter to the court at D———, where one evening at a ball, he was highly insulted by a certain cavalier. The painter lay in wait for him, and when he arrived at a dark solitary place, stabbed him with a sword through the body, and fled. After finding himself in a place of security, his boiling passion cooled down; he felt deep regret for what he had done, attended with a raging sense of remorse, and a dreadful sinking despondency of heart. The heavy burthen of his crime settled upon his conscience like a mountain and a sense of abandonment swept away all hope. The fit he said, raged about him with all its fury, and every thought of forgiveness and comfort, like a drop of water in a glowing furnace, dried up in an instant. The wretched man gradually felt that he was cursed in his living body, so that he always saw the horrible and menacing countenance of the murdered nobleman, whenever he looked over his shoulder. This terrible fiend which never left but constantly pursued him, made himself more and more visible to his eyes. As often as he turned his head in that particular direction, like a tormenting spirit, it stood in natural form before him, clad just as he was on the evening of the ball at the distance of a few paces. He said it appeared to him as if the avenger of blood would immediately fall upon him. This terrible apparition it was that the painter had painted. He had no rest day nor night; whenever his deed of blood rose up to view, it crushed his spirit to the earth.

My father now discovered the nature of his exquisite sufferings. He sought to present to his mind all the grounds of comfort offered in the gospel, and he applied them with all his accustomed ingenuity and affection, but they were of no weight whatever. At length he suggested that he should return to D———and surrender himself to justice, or do the same where he was, but this suggestion he also rejected. In one word, all the pains which my father took to rescue him from his wretched condition, were entirely fruitless. He passed the night in groans, and lamentations. In the morning after dressing, he went to his portmanteau and drew out this picture, and presenting it to him, he said, 'This is the portrait of my terrible persecuter—I finished it but a few days ago—I present it to you as a memorial, on account of your affectionate sympathy—let it remind you of a man who is eternally lost,—all I ask is, that at every recollection you devote to him a sympethizing tear'

My father accepted the awful gift with great satisfation. He still employed all the means in his power to soften his heart, and to penetrate it with divine consolation, but in vain. Every argument he assiduously rejected, earnestly protesting that for himself there was no help nor hope. My father then took leave to him to attend to his business in the town, but promising to return and converse with him again in the evening. But whilst absent in order to consult with skilful men in relation to his condition, the melancholy intelligence was circulated that he had jumped into a stream near by and was drowned."

Stilling approached the portrait once more. It now seemed as if he had seen a menacing fiend itself. He slept but little that night, in such near nighborhood to it, and the next morning, he rode home, fully absorbed with the dreadful history.

This phenomenon is an important one in a psychological view, for the image constantly before his eyes, but saw it only when he looked behind him. The cases are numerous in which the patient sees the figure always before him, opening his eyes. This is easy to explain, but that any one should see but one such form, and only when looking over the shoulder, is something both singular and extraordinary.—The fact has led many intelligent persons to whom I have related the case to believe that the spirit of the murdered man actually persecuted and tormented the murderer, but any one who has a tolerably clear view of the matter, will see that it is far easier to explain it on the principles of phantasy, than on the theory of spiritual agency, especially since by the latter mode, we shall readily wander into byepaths, where, though we err with pleasure, we shall be diverging farther and farther from the truth

THE DEVIL'S RAGGED SCHOOL.

If you are determined to be poor, go to the Devil's ragged school,—that is the gin shop —and you will soon be ragged enough, and pennyless too

If you wish to starve your family, go to the Devil's ragged school,—for that will consume the means of their support.

If you would be cheated by rogues, go to the Devil's ragged school,—for that will make their task easy.

If you would become a fool, go to the Devil's ragged school, and you will lose your wits.

If you are determined to expel all comfort from your house, go to the Devil's ragged school, and you will do it most effectually.

If you would expose both your folly and secrets, go to the Devil's ragged school, and they will run out as the liquor runs in.

If you think you are too strong, go to the Devil's ragged school,—and you will be conquered by so powerful an enemy.

If you'd get rid of your money without knowing how, go to the Devil's ragged school,—and it will melt away directly.

If you would be a dead weight on the public, go to the Devil's ragged school,—and that will render you useless, helpless and burthensome.

If you would be hated by your family and friends, and be a nuisance, go to the Devil's ragged school,—and you will soon gain your wishes.

Finally, if you are determined to be utterly destroyed both in mind, body and estate, go to the Devil's ragged school, and you will soon know that it is impossible to adopt more certain means to accomplish your ends.—Washingtonian.

Growth in grace manifests itself by a simplicity —that is, a greater naturalness of character. LIBERIA HERALD

An Address delivered by H. J. Roberts M. D., at the first Celebration of the Independence of the Republic of Liberia, July 26th, 1848

Friends, Liberians, Countrymen:

We as citizens of this Infant Republic, in celebration of this the first anniversary of our Independence, the memory of which event is so pregnant with consequences beneficial to mankind in general, should swell every bounding heart with joy, and fill each tongue with praise. Here we are fellow citizens, convened, and for what? Is it to celebrate the glory of some sanguinary victory? Not at all. Is it to triumph over depressed humanity in riveting the chains of slavery, accursed on our fellow man? God forbid.

But we have met to celebrate the resurrection of liberty, the emancipation of mankind, and the promised redemption of bleeding Africa.

These are then the causes of our present rejoicings: nobler themes than which, were never by man conceived.

As Liberians we are taught to love liberty, delight in the rights of man, and glory in independence.

Liberians, it was but as yesterday, when pendant over his new consecrated hill, was obvious to be seen, a sable cloud, dense and ominous, threatening our patriotic fathers with quick and sudden destruction,

> Those were the times that tried men's souls.

Consternation agitated the hearts of the invincible few, dark and dubious forebodings pressed on them sorely. War, that common enemy to man, ensued, 'twas fierce and bloody, but of short duration.

> Yet half their strength they put not forth,
> But checked their thunder in mid volley: for they mount
> Not to exterminate, but to remove them
> From their purchased right.

Soon the day spring from on high opened upon them its glittering portals, and the angel of conquest and liberty, descending dropped, and passed on golden pinions, majestically rested on our banner's pinacle; and stamped on Liberia's shores of freedom and destined independence, the seal of Omnipotence.

Then did oppression take its eternal flight, and true light and liberty burst forth to enliven and cheer the desponding spirits of our race,

Liberians, from the landing of our pilgrim fathers on yon deminutive Isle, has our march (though slow and oft obstructed) been progressive. Notwithstanding dark and gloomy has been the wearied progress of the little colony, and many uncertain steps been taken in the gloom, yet faithful hearts, by a firm reliance on a gracious Providence, hath cautious and safe (though fearfully) brought us thus far.

I deem it not expedient on this occasion to dwell on the particulars of our rise and progress, this you have had time and again from abler sources.

Fellow citizens, since the ever memorable year of '47, when in holy conclave, the Representatives of this people drew up our glorious Declaration of Rights, signing the same, and praying its recognition by the civilized world, "in the name of God and humanity." And since that august morn, (the most glorious of all that ever, from the lofty mountain's peak tinted our vale of eternal verdue with their golden hue,) when in the sight of all the people and face of Heaven the Flag of this Republic was first unfurled, to flow upon the gentle zephers, uncontaminated with the curse of slavery's minions, waiting for our sunny shores, bearing on its broad union the high toned motto, "The Love of Liberty Brought us Here!"

Since that period, I say, we have as it were, tread a new earth, abounding in righteousness, in the sight of a new heaven flaming with stars of eternal duration.

No more my countrymen will your feet traverse the roads of oppression—no more shall the accursed lash of the cruel task masters pollute the form that stands erect in God's own image.—Nor shall our shoulders bow to the weight of that slavery which is as cruel as it is unjust.

Well may we rejoice then on such an anniversary; most glorious, not only to every Liberian, but to all lovers of our race.

This day should be held in perpetual memory, for it is a day the light of which carries joy to the hearts of all of our trammeled brethren, and every true republican; but dismay to the breath of the tyrant who holds his fellow man in bondage, denying him the free use and improvement of those faculties granted him as a boon from high heaven.

The day has gone by, when man was deemed susceptible of intellectual improvement only in direct ratio to the whiteness of his skin. The advocates of that abominable doctrine were blinded by the god of prejudice, the force of utterance to such libelous sentiments, despite their better informed judgment.

Fellow citizens, I deem it not flattery here to assert, that you have done wonderfully in bounting up as by magic power to the pinnacle of your present fame, from the very depths of ignorance, in your native country, where color and not mind makes the man. There where millions of your race, have for centuries been robbed of mental as well as physical rights; enslaved by a power they could not successfully resist, and by its blighting influence been degraded both in body and mind; debared have you been from Halls of literature and science, and made to grope your way in mental chaos, in the midst of a country blazing with the effulgence of erudition. Around the man of color alone was entwined the chain of prejudice and hatred, which divested him of all those means that beautifies the mind and makes the man, and which convinces humanity of its superiority over the brute creation. Such my countrymen is but an index to the mighty volume on the condition which our fathers and millions of our fellow men have been in for centuries gone by, and are still laboring under. And such to day would have been our condition no doubt, unless by the kind hand of death we were released from that terrestrial hell, had not the angel of promise brood over the oppressive land of our nativity, and inspired the hearts of some who had yet human sensibilities, to devise a plan for the amelioration of our unhappy race.—Thus was the scheme of Colonizing gotten up, the only effectual means for the redemption of our race. Omnipotence blessed the experiment. And by its means hath order been brought out of confusion; light out of darkness. The chaos of our minds was broken up, the light of Nature's intellectual sun began to penetrate their dark recesses, and the long hidden gems was seen to glitter in the distance with nature's polished purity, which forced the prejudiced world to acknowledge our inalienable right to manhood, reluctantly assenting that the man of color is a man for all that.

Liberians you have indeed made rapid and gigantic strides to attain the position you now assume, as well as given a blow to the demon of slavery, from the effects of which he'll never recover. Thus numbering the days of the reign of that demon prince, by proving conclusively to the world your ability of self government. Thereby giving such a cant to the ponderous weight that has for centuries born down our unfortunate race, as will ensure its certain and constant declination; until in full manhood we shall behold with supreme disdain, its huge and unsightly form in irreparable ruins crumble 'neeth our feet.

Soon will the lamentable language of the trammelled and tyranised of our native land, cease to be born upon the wings of every gale, which fans our transatlantic shores, exclaiming

> "When shall I breathe in freedom, unreserve scope,
> To these unframable and burning thoughts,
> And restless aspirations which consume
> My heart in this land of bondage.
> By asking me what I am a man?"

Unto all such, the "Lone Star" of our beloved Liberia, which after ages of wandering, is happily centered in its eternal orbit, is held up as a charm and a cordial, like as was the brazen serpent of ancient Moses, that all were unto it shall resort with tear beaming and crown hands, having been stung by the fiery serpents of slavery, which (by the by is an hundred fold worse than those that stung the Israelites) may be generously healed of all the deep rankling effects of the curse of oppression.

Then as a talisman floating over his cradle of liberty, and as the magi star of Epiphany, may it draw with irresistable power, and direct with unerring certainty, the noble and the brave of the oppressed of our native land, to be transplanted in this (to us) a more congenial soil.

But fellow citizens notwithstanding we need very much an increase of population yet I truly deprecate the coming of any among us, but such as can give an unequivocal and heart response to the Motto of our country's union, The love of Liberty, &c.—For fear of such a one that we can hope to obtain fit materials for the building up of our little republic;

> To all such our hearts and arms are expanded wide,
> Hands to work and cheer, and arms to protect and defend them.

Anticipating the day speedily come when all rich hearts encased in colored caskets, shall hasten to forego the delusive pleasures of their native land, where every would be sweet, is ever mingled with the gall of oppression, from the Dan to the Beersheba of that boasted country. For throughout the land, where there actually the man of color is not claimed as common stock or chattles, the hydra-headed monster Colorphobia, like a giant wroth stalks, emitting such a stream of infecting virus, that its blasting influences are felt to a deplorable extent throughout all the northern states; their boasted freedom to the contrary notwithstanding. For there, even are the energies of their sons crushed and dwarfed. With a glance they can see their neplus ultra, which says, here shall your ambitious strides be stayed. Beyond these bounds you cannot go. Here shall your energetic souls be crushed.

Disheartened and desponding, the young aspirant, under such circumstances begins to falter in his energies; his once laudable ambition, now takes the retrograde move, and concludes that if he cannot rise to the summit, but must be circumscribed in his mental acquirements, he will content himself with the dross of ignorance. (For ignorance in many instances is bliss.)

Such being the case my countrymen who, I ask, of us, that would not rather die under any circumstances a freeman in Liberia, than live actually or virtually a slave in America.

Liberians remember it was the love of liberty that brought us here. And here at the shrine of the godess of liberty, let us ever renew our vows, to prove her sacred in life, and seal the sacred renewal of the same with our last lingering breath.

Fellow citizens, while salutations of this day in its anual course, can never fail to waken associations the most pleasing, that move the heart to national sympathy, it must remind us also of the great responsibilities which we have assumed. We must reflect on what we have assayed to do. Enquire how far our position presumes success; and what we owe to those who have preceeded as well as those who may succeed us. For taking the position which we have, the attention of the civilized world has been directed towards us. Due defference therefore ought and should be maintained to the opinions of the powers that be: inasmuch as in the present position, to be successful, would be to reflect distinguished honors on our race; while a failure on the other hand, would load us with shame, and engulph us in a vortex over which our race would moan, and at which our enemies would point in scorn and derision.

Let us take heed then, that we build on a foundation well laid in the eternal principle of truth and justice, and such an one as will bear the superstructure of our nationality.

Citizens of this young republic, our work is but just begun. Unforeseen events await us, and must be met, and manfully grappled with—difficulties, national difficulties of which we now have no conception, will arise, and must be met with becoming determination and courage. And unless we meet them as freemen having at heart the foundation and building up of a government upon which alone depends the salvation of our race, depend upon it our efforts will prove abortive.

Let us as a warning, reflect upon the instability of governments. History will sicken you with the sad recitals of such proofs of the fallibility of man.

There look and inform you of the founding of Empires, Kingdoms, and Republics, mounting up in all the glory of which man is capable of embellishing them, as, though eternity alone would rival them in duration.

Then drop the curtain. And now ask where are their ancient greatness? Alas! their stately ruins are all that can be seen, to tell of their former glory, and mock the efforts of man.

Enquire for ancient and renowned Egypt? Her antiquities but bespeak the eminence from which she has fallen. Ask fame of Carthage and Rome? Demand ye where are they? and each answers where.

Can no proofs these of the liability of the fall of governments, their instability and innovation.

Let us then be cautious. And let our watch word be, Industry to our fellows, firmness to our government, and a compact of indissoluble union among our citizens. Thus armed in constancy and truth we must and shall succeed.

Taking the advice of an able statesman, let us be ware of political corruption, remembering that of all enemies to a nation, none can be more formidable, and work more destruction than internal ones.

Let us therefore be careful of a thirst for fame and personal distinction. Let not ambition for vain glory blind us to the interest of our government. We are but men, and therefore falable; corruption steals upon us in a thousand insidious forms. And says a man of penetration, "that of all the forms in which it presents itself, the bribery of office is the most dangerous, because it assumes the disguise of patriotism to accomplish its fatal sorcery.

Fellow citizens, in as much as our government is based on republican principles, and as such it is the people who govern in the main, and those who are put in authority over us, are thus honored by the vote of a free and untrammeled people, let every citizen of Liberia rise with becoming rivalry to prove himself loyal to his government, and a staunch supporter of the constitution, thus proving themselves civilians worthy of the honors of a free people, remembering that none is fit for governing who is himself ungovernable. While it is to be hoped on the other hand, that those among us who are honored with posts of distinction, will demean themselves with becoming dignity knowing that as the voice of a free people placed them there, and as such, are in faith bound to support them in all their constitutional acts, so are they equally bound to defend themselves, families and their property, against any attempt at tyranny or usurpation on the part of such officers.

Then with all of our power to sustain right by a strict and critical adherence to the constitution, we must strenuously avoid oppression, otherwise adhere to liberty and all of its sweets.

With honesty and integrity let us speak our sentiments when required. For know ye that there is no slavery more oppressive than that which binds the thoughts and tongue of him who supposes himself to be free.

Among the many evils that may be recorded against us, let there not be the one that we have wanted the courage to protest against injustice and violence; or that we have moved to applud a measure that we in heart disproved, by the vulgar clamor of such as look no deeper into matters, than the temporary success of party.

Liberians should the price of favour or influence be the sacrifice of principle, then let favour, influence, and all places of honor away. For there is no fear of integrity loosing eventually, permanent respect and reward. For all such sacrifices thus made, are justly due to the memory of our worthy and illustrious pioneers, and abundantly so to succeeding generations. "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it."

Such principles carried out and instilled into our youth, and properly transmitted to our children, will cause our little Republic to grow and flourish.

So shall the commonwealth of Liberia, being just in the world's view, and sound in principles within, remain steadfast on her foundation, on the rock of that faith which brought our fathers to this land, and on which, we their successors dare to act.

And now it may be asked, by what means are we to arrive at such a state of eminence? In my opinion the cultivation of the intellectual powers, are the only means to enable us rightly to appreciate such noble sentiments. For ignorance is a soil which produces not such good harvests.

Need I here admonish fathers to set the example of assiduous application for the cultivation of the mind? I think not. They know their duty and will perform it.

But to the young men of this Commonwealth, I may address me. Upon you rest the fair hopes of future greatness. Yes—It is you who must retrieve the lost glory of our unfortunate race. By your exertions hang the destinies of millions, who are now bound down under the burden of cruel task masters. Young men be diligent and learn in order with perseverance in all that's good and great, pervade your breast. So shall more than ancient Egypt's glory be regained by this Republic, with the fame of Carthage and her immortal heroes, who led victorious armies over space immense of many leagues, and pushed their seizes to the very gates of the eternal city. Upon you centres the hopes of thousands, while millions of our race, sunk in imagination and superstition shall [illegible] with [illegible] eye look up, entranced [illegible] of redemption, at the meteor star in [illegible] are set, [illegible] first seen in [illegible] of [illegible]. A [illegible] given. Then [illegible] not short of qualit[illegible] fill the most distin[illegible] in our government. [illegible] Magistrates, Judges [illegible] Representatives, Congress[illegible] Presidents, and [illegible] to foreign nations. Then qualify [illegible] with integrity and [illegible] capable [illegible] responsible [illegible] a government [illegible] without the facilities of other nations in [illegible] common, yet [illegible] resolution [illegible] perseverance [illegible] in a few fleeting years bring us to the [illegible] goal, when with composure [illegible] gratification we may retrospect the rugged road [illegible] we have come.

Liberians I would not be thought so wanting in courtesy to the fair sex, as to have them presume that they have neither part nor lot in this matter. Such a presumption on the part of any, (to draw an analogy) would be to presume a ship at sea with canvass set and breezes fair, would of her noble bark no further service need. How absurd the presumption.

Know ye not that even while the powerful mind of man governs this spacious world, that it is equally true that, that great Governor himself [illegible] by woman ruled? Such being the case then my gentle auditors, you have a part to perform in this important matter of creating and sustaining a republic, upon which the future well being of your children depend, and it is of vast and ponderous moment.

Then look to it matrons and maidens, that you exercise that extensive influence which you have over community, [illegible] of the public good. For in its weal or woe, your extensive influence must be greatly felt.

Mothers [illegible] your care is committed the [illegible] of the child of either sex. You [illegible] must teach the young "idea how to shoot"—M[illegible] into the youthful mind [illegible] greatness [illegible] of liberty.

[illegible] you [illegible] instil [illegible] the sufferings of [illegible] ancestors [illegible] and the [illegible] on [illegible] Exhort [illegible] liberty [illegible] 'twas written. Keep before their mind's eye the lonely "star," our country's guide. Tell them to honor it as a [illegible] from their fathers—To love it for the honor of themselves; and to protect it for the safety of their families. Teach them to consider it as their Polar Star, to lead them on to the preservation and enjoyment of their liberties, or a glorious struggle for the same until the vital tide of life, shall ebbing cease to flow.

This done, you shall instil into their youthful minds principles, glorious and high born principles, which will defy oppression and fit fellows will they be for the support of this noble edifice of state.

And now to you young ladies, whose presence adorn this assembly, what shall I say? Could I but impress your young minds with the importance of the influence you are capable of exerting in this community, I think your movements would be guided by caution.

On you young ladies depend the virtue of this commonwealth, without the maintenance of which, all of our efforts will be of no avail. Our country will sink into ruin and disgrace, and our name will become a proverb and a by word among all nations.

Cultivate then, virtue, temperance and sobriety in all things. Become intellectual; put far from you the abomination of novel reading, which debase the mind, and fill it with morbidity. But let your knowledge be based on solid and useful matter; such as will fit you for wives, mothers and tutors. Countenance alone young men of moral worth, sober habits, and intelligence; extend your centre to none, but such as will adorn society, and prove [illegible] to your country. So shall you prove a blessing to the land; and your names be had in perpetual memory being indelible [illegible] on the tablets of the hearts of the lovers of your country.

Liberians then bring the case [illegible] I not say the eventuality of our existence [illegible] the [illegible] ing of our joy has [illegible] of our rising glory [illegible] has already [illegible] rays may be seen scattered [illegible]

Then behold the wonder, but [illegible] century ago, a few [illegible] these shores, to seek [illegible] of their [illegible] fraught with [illegible] came, but [illegible] rected amid the forest trees—[illegible] ted back across the seas, [illegible] amid her [illegible] were [illegible] To credit this, the [illegible] stretched. A Telescope of 40 feet in length could not realize the [illegible] too great. And when, after the [illegible] a few fleeting years, one from these shores returning to his native land, he greeted was, as having emerged from the chambers of the dead. Many looking on him, [illegible] their eyes with optical illusion, and with assuming dignity, brushed [illegible] the notes, and scanned anew.

But now what do we see? there is no extra [illegible] to prove our existence nor the use [illegible] to realise our being.

For the [illegible] ships of various nations, tells [illegible] story in their father land. Nations [illegible] regard with interest our growth. While [illegible] visitations of her sons to foreign countries tell the inquisitive that these things are even so.

Judging from the past, think you it boots [illegible] to suggest our anticipations of future in some degree?

In looking through the vista of futurity [illegible] the telescope of faith, I behold [illegible] improvements, as the building of [illegible] cities; and among the densely [illegible] mercial marts [illegible] hear the hum [illegible] tudes—the uncouth sound of trade [illegible] with foreign accent, [illegible] admi[illegible] ons. I behold [illegible] Ocean's liquid swells, [illegible] white winged barks [illegible] majestically rolling, [illegible] pitching their gallant [illegible] taste the briny foam. Be[illegible] ly at their gifts, our nation's stripes and central star.

The land bound waters with distant nations [illegible] hail with due respect our eastern star in [illegible] poise over Liberia's ships and gallant crews, while they at anchor nobly ride, or out of harbor safely steer.

All of this and a great deal more of sterling worth, will the resources of our country, when through the medium of education, they are fully developed, fully warrant.

No more my countrymen are we spoken of as a novel story, that scarcely needs a passing notice.

Great and mighty nations have our cause in contemplation. From the fire side and family [illegible] it has wended its tenuous way into Halls [illegible] has so conspicuously grown as [illegible] in the august assemblies of mighty lords and peers, even famed England's supinest sons.

The pride of France has been arrested, to enquire of [illegible] And Columbia's haughty sons have been forced to contemplate this great phenomena, on Western Africa's shores. The forming of a Republic by her oppressed sons.

Oh! how sublime [illegible] Liberia gave,
[illegible] the free and the brave;
[illegible] flash on the eye,
And the star of our freedom [illegible] the sky.
Oppression [illegible] may smile,
In their [illegible] while;
But [illegible] they [illegible]?
Can they [illegible]?
No, she has [illegible] around.
The words has been spoken which the [illegible] bound.

Fellow citizens, in casting my eye over this assembly, I behold [illegible] the corner-stone of the Republic [illegible] days. Their hoary locks [illegible] veterans. The enlivening brilliancy of their keen eyes awakened by the sensations of this auspicious day, is but an index to their noble [illegible] youthful souls within. What pleasing sensations must their bosoms crowd? With faith's immortal eye, I see them in communion sweet with the disembodied spirits of their early contemporaries, a Cary, a James, a Benson, a Newport, with the whole band of immortal worthies of [illegible] strife. Behold [illegible] spirits—how they exult. Their easy poise how graceful. The scene heightens: mark their greetings. Hail immortal founders of our liberties: we greet [illegible] forms; And may the God of liberty save the Republic of Liberia.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA, AUGUST 25, 1848.

The Celebration.

After some considerable debate and discussion in [illegible] meetings, as to the most appropriate day for the celebration of the anniversary of our Independence, whether it should be the 24th of August the day on which the Flag of the Republic was first seen to float upon the breeze of [illegible] or the 26 of July, the day [illegible] Declaration [illegible] 2d of October [illegible] His Excellency the President [illegible] to be [illegible] I [illegible] finally [illegible] that [illegible] the Declaration [illegible] Republic. [illegible] For our native land [illegible] fertile soil, [illegible] Although [illegible] and all that makes it desirable, [illegible] eternal and inseparable [illegible] standing out in bold relief, forever [illegible] residence within thy bounds of any man [illegible] who contemns oppression. And we say in the ever memorable words of the illustrious Patric Henry, while with his soul in his eyes, beaming forth unyielding determination "Give me liberty or give me death." Yea, [illegible] do we prefer death and a premature grave in Western Africa, than the tolerance of oppression in our native land.

Yet will we gladly profit by her wholesome examples.

Having thus [illegible] for the 26th of July; for the celebration, all due preparations were accordingly [illegible]

[illegible] from her rosy [illegible] discernible in the eastern horizon [illegible] was greeted by the booming of cannon; [illegible] the rising of the powerful king of day.

[illegible] might be seen in all directions the laughing [illegible] number [illegible] inhabitants, busily engaged in arranging [illegible] preparatory to the celebration of the day, in which all minds were absorbed.

All business of ordinary character ceased, and the [illegible] of the day.

The hour of [illegible] was announced by the firing of a cannon, when the flag of the Republic was displayed at Central Hill and at Fort Norris; and the vessels in harbor displayed their several flags.

At nine o'clock the military line was formed, and at 12 o'clock it moved off to Central Hill, when the [illegible] salute of twenty-one guns was fired. The salute was handsomely responded to by the United States Brig of war Bainbridge, and the flag of the Republic was seen flying at her gallant foremast, throughout the day, as representing a student destined to tread in the praiseworthy footsteps of his tutor.

The military moving from thence was drawn up in front of the Government House to escort His Excellency the Vice President, and the Civil Officers to the M. E. Church to hear an oration delivered by H. J. Roberts, Esq.

After the oration, we were well nigh thrown into ecstacy, in listening to the juvenile oratory of four of Mr. James' scholars, Masters Cooper, Warring, Yates and Johnson, who acquitted themselves so masterly, that they brought down deafening and repeated cheers from the immense concourse. The audience were so delighted, and profuse in their oft and protracted cheers, that the cry of hear, hear, hear, loud and often insisted upon by Colonel Hicks, the Marshall of the day, in order to gain a hearing for the juvenile orators.

After listening with delight for a respectable length of time to these young and enthusiastic Liberians, the line was again formed and marched to the Government Square, where it was dismissed about 3 o'clock.

The after part of the day was spent by ladies and gentlemen in promenades, and other modes of [illegible] and recreation.

In the evening we had the pleasure of associating with a large assembly at a [illegible] entertainment at the Government House. The large number of gentlemen [illegible] happy by the timely and graceful presence of a suitable number of the fair sex.

After discussing the more substantial business of the evening with the sense of taste, improved under the influence of music, the guests [illegible] enjoyed themselves in promenades of measured steps to the buoyant sound of a band of music [illegible] giving forth various lively airs.

At a [illegible] hour for a national celebration, the harmonious company well pleased with themselves and the general transactions of the day, retired to consume [illegible] what had been omitted to fill up their cup of pleasure in the [illegible] of the day.

Grand Cape Mount.

This country is again in a disturbed state. Prince George Cain, who has, ever since the death of King Fanatoma, been acknowledged on all sides as the legal sovereign of that country, was a few weeks since murdered by one of his relations, in the most cruel and assassin like manner. Mamorah the murderer, is a young man, prepossessing in appearance, and heretofore always spoke of George Cain in the highest terms of respect. We hope, ere long, to learn the particulars which gave rise to this appalling act, which we will lay it before our readers. Mamorah, assures our citizens, residing at Cape Mount, that they need not be under any apprehension—that themselves and property will be secure.

Cape Palmas.

The sloop Curlew of Cape Palmas, arrived in our harbor on the 17th inst. She brought distressing [illegible] of the scarcity of provisions at that place, especially of bread stuff. The inhabitants were living on Palm cabbages, to obtain which, hundreds of palm trees were cut down daily. The Curlew left on the 23d [illegible] cargo, [illegible] hearts of a [illegible]

[illegible] our present [illegible] the address of H. J. Roberts, M. D. delivered on the 26 [illegible] the first anniversary of the independence of Liberia. The address was listened to by hundreds of our citizens, with the greatest interest—and it gave general satisfaction. [illegible] opinion, that the orator done full justice to the occasion.

U. S. Commercial Agency.

It is with [illegible] that we notice the appointment of an officer by the U. S. government to the Republic of Liberia. J. W. Lugenbeel, M. D. a gentleman well known in Liberia, has been appointed by the government of the United States, as Commercial Agent in Liberia. This movement on the part of that government is a very important one, and we presume it is only in advance of an act of recognition of Liberia as a Sovereign State.

Prince Boyer, King of Trade Town, in a letter to a gentleman at Grand Bassa, professes a willingness to enter into an arrangement with this government for the abolition of the slave trade.

We learn that the free colored people of the United States, are becoming more interested for Liberia than they had ever imagined they would be.—And the probability is, that great numbers will be coming over to seek a resting place. They have no alternative—prejudice, which is stronger than law, proves an insuperable barrier, to their ever rising to the true position of men in that country. Nor does it seem altogether unreasonable, that the predominant class in the U. S. should regard them as inferiors, and debar them from a participation in the affairs of the country. Ever since they were old enough to know the right hand from the left they were sensible that they were to occupy degrading positions in society—and they have been contented to live on in this state, when [illegible] held out to them equal rights and privileges. They put themselves to no trouble to seek for a free home, they were satisfied to be subservient to those who could appreciate liberty, and [illegible] enjoy it, [illegible] through seas of difficulties. No such ennobling emulation inspires their breast, they seem not to know that liberty, which gives to men equal rights and privileges, of all other considerations is the most to be desired. With such narrow and unmanly feelings is it to be considered oppression on the part of the whites, because they have debared a class of people, living in their midst, of privileges, which they seem unworthy to enjoy, and we take it for granted that they were not fit subjects for so precious a boon, or they would have searched for it in other lands. We know of no spot in the U States where the colored man is permitted to enjoy the same rights and privileges, as the white man. Then why will they tarry longer in the land of oppression? If they possess the true feelings belonging to man, they will without delay, leave a land which debar them from those rights and privileges which God and nature intended for them.

BIG LEG; (A MIAMI CHIEF.)

HIS TRIAL FOR MURDER.

The Indians of the Maumee and Wabash valleys untill very recently held a sort of supremacy over the white population of that region; or, at least so much so, as to cause their depredations among themselves to be overlooked, or winked at, by the civil authorities.

Fort Wayne, on the Maumee for many years the head quarters of the Miamies, Ottowas, and Pottowattamies, was, during this period, the scene of many a brutal murder, which, for want of power in the white population, was suffered to go unpunished—or if punished, or noticed at all, was left to the Indians themselves to redress, by their own well known custom of retaliation. This, of course, caused an accumulation of murders, and frequently brought these warlike nations into hostile collision with each other.

At length, however about the year 1825 or 30, when the white population had increased to about two or three hundrd, it was thought proper to assume a more authoritative attitude, and if possible, to arrest the further progress of Indian murders. The resolution had hardly been formed, when an opportunity to try the white man's power was presented; one, too, which is no less amusing for its novelty, than characteristic of the Indian customs, and the entire ignorance of municipal law.

A Miami chief, called Big Leg, because of the large and muscular proportions of his limbs, was the first selected to undergo the transition from savage to civiliz[illegible]ment.

His father, at his outset in the world, had given him, as a part of his portion, a fine young, and interesting squaw. She was the child of the same father, but by a diff[illegible] mothers. Big Leg was a pure Indian, but his squaw was the child of a Kentuckian, whom her father had taken captive in the wars. As the Indian had never read the XVIII chapter of Leviticus, nor the christian codes founded thereon, they knew of no objection to a union where the tie of consanguinity existed only in the half blood. They accordingly exchanged the relation of master and slave, for the more affectionate one of husband and wife—or rather of Indian and squaw; and as such Big Leg and his squaw lived together for many years.

But at length, for some reason, of which we are not apprized, they separated, and agreed to pursue their respective journies alone. Big Leg continued to reside in his ancient wigwam, and as he was a great hunter, generally kept it well supplied with venison. But she seemed to have been less successful, and either from want, or to gratify a thievish nature, could return, when Big Leg was absent, and steal his provisions.

This incensed the Indian very much. By the custom of the nation she was his own property which he might dispose of as he thought proper. But, as an act of Indian humanity, he chose rather to spare her life, than to murder her—but on condition that she would leave him, and not return. His authority was thus trampled upon, and, as he thought, his humanity cruelly repaid—but still he refrained from the exercise of his severe right, and again notified her that a further violation would certainly cost her life. This seems to have had but little effect. The same offence was again and again repeated. Big Leg now determined that his words should not be idle; and accordingly sought for an opportunity to consummate his resolve. A few weeks only elapsed before an opportunity presented. He had followed her to Fort Wayne, where he knew she had retreated, and there, while lurking around in her pursuit, he discovered her in a yard, at work, leaning over a wash tub. Now was the time, he thought to make good his words, and to prove his power. He accordingly closed upon her, with the silence and adroitness of an Indian hunter, and while she was still leaning over the tub, unconscious of his approach, plunged a large knife clear through her body. A single shriek proclaimed her agony, as she sprang from her inclined position, and the next moment she lay struggling in death at the feet of her murderer.

The wretched monster still thought he had done right, and drawing the knife from her body, held it aloft, still reeking with her blood, turned to the spectators with a savage grin, and, in broken English, exclaimed, 'was not that nice.'

Such is but a single instance of an Indian murder; cruel, barbarous, and wretched in the extreme. The very recital shocks our nature, and brings down our whole indignation upon a people so dreadfully depraved. But stop, white man, stop! nor vent your whole indignation upon the poor Indian. He is savage and cruel, but he is wild and ignorant, and the dupe of civilized villany, with an education, too, which makes it honorable to kill. But in this, as in every other Indian murder with which I am acquainted, the principal ingredient in the crime was the bewildering spirit of intoxication; the use of a poison which the Indian drank, but which the white man made.

Big Leg was arrested, put in jail tried for murder, convicted, and sentenced to be hung. Then follows a train of simplicities, before which the gravity of the law is turned into ridicule.

The Indian heard his sentence pronounced, and looked with wonder upon the solemnity of his grave and sympathizing judge. But he knew as little what was meant or intended, as the man in the moon. At length, however, after a great deal of trouble he was made to understand that he was to be suspended by the neck until he was dead.

For a long time he was unable to appreciate this mode of execution it was something entirely new. He was both a hunter and a warrior—learned in all the arts of Indian torturer; but the civilized idea of suspending people by the neck, had never before entered his mind. For a long time he knew not by what name, within his comprehension, to call it; but having seen traders weigh with steelyards, he adopted that idea, and accordingly called it weighing.

The word soon got out; and ran through the whole Miami nation; that Big Leg was to be weighed by the neck till he was dead. Alarm and consternation followed. He was a useful Indian, a very good hunter, and killed most of the deer eaten by his tribe. For these reasons they wished to save his life; but they had been told that the law must be fulfilled—that is according to their interpretation, as sanctioned by immemorial custom, that for blood, blood must be shed.

In this they somewhat resemble the Jews, and from it, and some other customs, have been supposed by some to be the descendants of the lost tribes of Israel.

The principal men of the tribe were called together, to devise, if posible, some means by which to obtain the release of Big Leg, and at the same time to fulfil, if possible, the requisitions of the law. An expedient was soon discoverd fully equal in their conception, to satisfy all the demands of retributives justice.

They had, among their number, a lazy Indian called Sam. Him they determined to [illegible] or, as they said, 'swap' for Big [illegible]. Accordingly they all came to town in a body, and made their proposition to the jailer and [illegible] of Big Leg. "Sam" said they, [illegible] less Indian—him you may take [illegible] as you please. The absurd[illegible] was only equalled by the a[illegible] urged. But what was still a[illegible] characteristic of the Indi[illegible] Sam was along,' and with[illegible]

Time passed tiings with t[illegible] lay in prison, patiently a[illegible] execution, and seriously [illegible] death he was about to d[illegible] heard of hanging. He k[illegible] ers, nor of the pun[illegible] To inform himself, however, [illegible] he got his dog into jail, [illegible] cord round its neck, and hung it until it [illegible]

He then told the jailer that [illegible] did not wish to be weighed; he had weighed his dog,' he said, and it made dog very sick. They might poor him, or kill him in any way that Indians kill men; but white man's way no good."

The absurdity of a direct and forcible application of our laws to the condition of uncivilized man had now become too apparent to admit of futher consideration. Every body saw the impropriety of inflicting capital punishment on the poor ignorant Indian. His case was therefore, presented by the citizens to the governor, who very properly granted him the executive pardon. Thus was Big Leg after passing through what he thought a world of wonders, released from his threatened execution, and sent home to his tribe on the Wabash, where he continued to reside until last, when I saw him in this city, with the rest of the Miami Indians, on their way to the far west.—Daily Enquirer.

MAN OVERBOARD.

BY IKE MARVEL.

It was one of those [illegible] and lightning gales at night when, for a moment, all would be as light as day, and a second after as dark that you could not see to one length from the vessel. The Captain was forward, and all hands except the look and myself were aloft.

The ship was pitching madly, and the waves were topping up sometimes as high as the yard arm, and then dipping away with a whirl, under our keel that made every timber in our vessel quiver. The thunder was roaring like ten thousand cannons; and every now and then, as I said, half the sky would split into a stream of fire that glared over the tops of the waves and glistened on the wet deck and the spars lighting up everything so plain that I could see the men's faces at the main-top, and catch glimpses of the reefers on the yard arm—clinging like death—than all would be horrible darkness.

You could hear the spray spring against the canvass and the great waves breaking on the weather bow and the howl of the wind through the rigging, and now and then, when a gasket gave way and the sails bellied out to leeward—you could hear the canvass splitting like the crack of a musket. You could hear, too, the Captain forward, screaming out orders, and the mate in the cross trees, screaming 'em over, till the lightning came, and the thunder—both together—and deadened their voices as if they'd been a pair of little chirping sparrows

It was in one of these flashes that I saw a hand on the the yard-arm lose his hold, as the ship gave a plunge, but his arms were clenched round the spar. Before I could see any more the blackness came over, and the thunder broke with a crash that half-deafened me. I thought I heard something like a tiny bowl, as it died off; and sure enough, at the next flash of lightning, which came in a moment, what should I see on the top of one of the waves a longside; but Tom Meeks; the lightning glared on his face, so that I could see the look in the poor fellows eye.

As good luck would have it he had caught hold of one of the stu'ing sail sheets as he fell, and as we pitched, I could see it sliping off the coil upon the deck.

I shouted like mad "Man overboard!" and had just time to catch the rope when we could see nothing again. I was a boy then and could'nt hold on by the rope; the sea was too high, and the man too heavy for me.

I shouted; and shouted; and shouted, and felt the sweat starting all over my forehead, as the rope slipped through my hands. Poor Tom had been our messmate for a year, and we all loved him.

Presently the Captain felt his way aft, and took hold with me just as the coil was nearly spent and we pulled upon it, and there it came, and we three hauled together upon it.

Poor fellow, it must have been desperate work for him, for the ship was diving at a prodigious rate, and we pulling up at the same time, but he clung like a man.

Presently at a flash, we saw him on a crest of the waves length away from the vessel.

"Hold on, my man," shouted the Captain

"For God's sake, be quick!" said the man, and he went down in a trough of the sea.

And we pulled the harder; and the Captain kept all the while calling to him to keep up courage and hold strong. But in the pause we could hear him say:—

"I can't hold on much longer—I'm most gone.

We called on the more to him to hold on, and presently got him where we could most lay hold of him, and were only waiting for a good lift of the sea to bring him in, when the poor fellow groaned out—

"It's no use—I can't—good bye," and a wave passed the end of the rope clean up upon the bulwark.

At the next flash we saw him go down under the water.

I never shall forget how [illegible] for we [illegible] and "Good bye" and let [illegible]—Evening Bulletin

Moral Courage—All virtue, to serve and real value, must be crowned with a certain degree of courage. We must be bold and resolute, to do what we think necessary to be done. Nay, sometimes we must be bold enough to admit that we are doing well. We fail for no small share of our courage. [illegible] possess it. There [illegible] to admit that they [illegible] however may be done by [illegible] Now seldom do we hear one confess [illegible] to buy this or indulge in that luxury. This miserable cowardice, this sole progeny of vanity, runs through the whole circle of society. The miserable trickery which obtains our persons, the riotous and lavish articles of living, the constant changes of dress and furniture, the costliness of the materials used for both, these with a thousand other heads of expenditure, are almost universally sinful. The conceited and blind [illegible] used change, and fancies that it is safer to become the recipient of untold evil of censure, simply because he has nodded his head, or raised his finger at the happy moments! The poor moral butterfly, his Age, assumes that the dead is already preying upon her, the sooner immediately raised from it as the heir of a millionaire; the dowager procrastinates as the favorite of fashion; and what is left a mint to the moneyfolkses, and world-lessness, and social-lessness, of these parties! Nothing but one object—as certain as fate at the usual season—which runs the root of all these precious weaknesses, and consigns them to a bankruptcy which brings with it no shame, and to a poverty which finds them without any preparation. The mere life of such people is a lie—and must continue a [illegible] lie, until they can recover sufficient moral courage to set out the truth and to appear the truth only. But all these evils, the very evils of vanity, rise in exaggerations of [illegible] the illusions of which, like those of original fable become [illegible] and bewilder, and [illegible] the strangers accompanies, are utterly lost, [illegible] come painted vessel, [illegible] flags flying, [illegible] all sails spread, rushes on, unconscious, reckless, presently, headlong into the dismal maelstrom, which is a real vortex to be found in every human [illegible]

THE CRIME—How [illegible] their solemn [illegible] the [illegible] seems as if spirits were leaning from the clouds and calling to us in their own [illegible] What heart can refuse the [illegible] to [illegible] that in their duty to [illegible] the voices of the loved and lost from earth! And who knows that were our hearts as open as our ears, we might not hear in very truth [illegible] calling ever to us?

MEN of splendid talents are generally [illegible] too volatile, too adventurous, and too unstable to be more relied on; whereas, men of common abilities, in a regular, plodding routine of business, act with more regularity and greater certainty. Men of the next intellectual altitudes are apt to strike off suddenly, like the tangent of a circle, and cannot be brought into their orbits by attraction or gravity—they often act with such eccentricity as to be lost in the vortex of their own reveries. Brilliant in general are like the ignis fatui; they excite wonder, but often mislead. They are not, however, without their use; like the fire from the flint, once pronuced, it may be converted, by solid thinking men, to very salutary and noble purposes. —Bulwer.

POETRY

The following lines composed for and sung on the occasion on Wednesday, the 26th of July last, being the first annual celebration of the Independence of the Republic of Liberia.

BY MR. R. L. SIDYKER.

Hail! this day Liberia's sons,
And unite your joys in one,
For around your happy homes
Is spring the natal hour.

Think your fathers spurned the chain,
Dare the rough and stormy main,
Not for glory not for gain
But for right you have.

Let it be shared in thee that morn,
When Liberia's sons was born,
Who had been so long forlorn
Beneath a nation's power.

Africa long cowraut in might,
Let behold a joyous sight,
Bursting on her vision bright
A lonely rising star.

Higher yet it doth ascend,
Fewer yet its rays extend,
Barbaric nations do attend
The glory from afar,

Now the song I hope we sing,
And the heav'n with welcome ring,
For the joyous it doth bring
The mighty everly.

Long we'll raise the song of praise,
And our father's deeds we'll raise,
To the honor of the days
That brought deliverly.

Far and wide the news shall spread,
Through all distant lands be said,
Let See Egypt's mighty dead
Now each live again.

For Liberia's Star shall shine,
Thraldom's cruse their chains unbind,
And the banner own the sign.
That Ethiopia reigns.

Ever shall we the Star revere
For the cause that brought us here,
Ever shall be the watchmen's cheer,
"The Love of Liberty."

Now to One our thanks we'll raise,
Alone to Him our homage pay,
Unto Him we give our praise
The Mighty Deity.

From the Friend.

SYMPATHY.

There's language that is mute, there's a silence can speak,
There's a something that cannot be told;
There are words that can only be read on the cheek,
And thoughts but the eyes can unfold!
There's a look so expressive, so tuneful, so kind,
So reflective, so quick to impart,
Though dumb, it can instantly speak out the mind,
And strikes in an instant the heart.
This eloquent silence, this language of soul,
In vain we attempt to suppress;
More prompt it appears from the wish to control;
More apt to find truth to express.
And oh! the delights in the features that shine
The rapture it becomes that to tell,
When blessed with each other, the converse divine

[illegible]ARTICULE E[illegible]R.

The better to illustrate the benefits arising from "civil and religious liberty" we publish the following, clipped some time back from an old paper. It will teach contentment, and furnish a theme for the next political speaker.

In England the reward of the laboring man varies. The stocking weavers of Nottingham work from 14 to 16 hours per day and receive four or five shillings sterling per week. Of course they can indulge in no luxuries, and are compelled to subsist almost exclusively on bread and water, or potatoes and salt.

In Ireland, the average wages of a day laborer, ranges from one and a half to eleven cents per day. The food of these oppressed beings principally milk and potatoes, varied occasionally as one of them touchingly remarks, by "potatoes and milk."

In Austria the land is held principally by the aristocracy. The peasants are compelled to labor for the landed proprietors except on the sabbath. Bondage, the most stultifying, is the condition of the poor.

In Hungary the land, as in Austria is owned by the nobles. Laborers are compelled to keep in repair all bridges and highways—are liable at all times to have the soldiers quartered upon them, and compelled to decimate the produce of their scanty tillage to the church and one NINTH to the lord of whom they hold.

In Sweden, the law regulates the dress of the laborer. The food of this class consists of hard bread, dried fish, without gruel and without meat. Truly here

"Hard is the fate of the laboring poor.

The Scotch are comparatively a favored people; yet among them, not to enumerate many other vexations, meat is, except on Sundays an unusual luxury.

In Poland, cabbage and potatoes supply the food of the ordinary workmen. Poverty among this class is universal. Sometimes, though by no means commonly they partake of black bread and soup, or butter or meat. One who had travelled extensively in this country, and was a close observer of things, remarks:

"I have journeyed in every direction, and have never seen a wheaten loaf to the eastward of the Rhine, in any part of Northern Germany, Poland or Denmark."

In Norway, the ordinary food of the laboring classes is bread and gruel. These are prepared from oatmeal, with a mixture of dried fish occasionally. Meat is rarely seen on the tables of the peasantry, and is regarded as a luxury.

In France, it is said that seven and a half millions of the population never eat wheat, or wheaten bread! Their subsistance is chiefly buck wheat, chestnuts, rye, barley, and a few potatoes. The wages paid to a common day laborer in France amount annually to about $37 50 for a male and $18 75 for a female. Yet, with all this, the taxes upon them amount to nearly or quite one fifth the net product of the yearly toil.

In Denmark, the condition of the under classes is that of bondage. Their state is emphatically that of the ancient predial slaves during the feudal ages; and they are bought and sold with the soil on which they labor and pass their lives.

In Russia, the condition of the peasantry or laboring classes is even more complete and humiliating than in Denmark. All the land is in possession of the nobles, and with it are transferred the inhabitants whenever it is sold.

A traveller remarks that a great majority of the laborers "have only cottages one portion of which is occupied by a family, the other appropriated to domestic animals. Few, if any, have beds—but sleep upon bare boards, or upon skins of the immense stoves by which their houses are warmed. Their food consists of black bread cabbage and other vegetables, without the addition of [illegible]—The Southerner.

DISAPPOINTMENT

A sad [illegible] fearful thing
Who has [illegible] disappointment?
Who [illegible] that it is far better [illegible] every wish [illegible]? Do we ever see a child [illegible] gaze with [illegible] of self? [illegible] few reverses [illegible] things appear [illegible] Will your [illegible] that you have been [illegible] most humble, most [illegible] only needed when you were living without disappointment? If so, you are singular.

In what are we most likely to meet disappointment? Does it most frequently cross our track when we are about our Master's business? or is it when we are neglecting religious duty and engrossing ourselves wholly with the world, pursuing things which are forbidden, that our plans are thwarted, and our expectations cut off! Is it likely that when our plans, purposes, and motives of living are what they should be God will defeat such intents? Do we find it so in fact? Every thing does not transpire precisely as we had imagined; but do we not feel satisfied that all would be ordered according to God's better way? Do we, in such circumstances, feel the pressure of disappointment? No. The amiable and obedient disciple scarcely knows what disappointments is. He knows his own frailties. He is aware of his own ignorance. He is assured that it is far better that God should order things for him, than that he should order them for himself. When, therefore, something on which he set his heart is denied, he is satisfied that it is better that he should not have it.

An individual once had an arrangement to meet another at an appointed place for a criminal purpose. Shortly before the hour for meeting arrived, this person opened a hymn book and his eye caught a sentiment which was as a dagger to his heart, and he abandoned the evil purpose. Was not that a merciful disappointment to both persons? A person on a journey was very anxious to arrive at New York in season to pass through the Sound in the Lexington. He arrived in the city a short time after the L. had left. On that night the Lexington was burnt, and all on board of her perished. Was not that a merciful disappointment? Is it not good for us that every selfish purpose of ours should be defeated? And is it not good that every plan that might result to our injury should prove abortive? Can we affirm of one or all the purpose of our lives, which have resulted in disappointment, that it is not better to have experienced disappointment than otherwise? Do we know that evil to ourselves, to others would not, in every instance have followed, had our own wishes been gratified?

We often think, when we experience some remarkable interposition of mercy, that we are very thankful. Perhaps we are so; and possibly it is only a selfish rejoicing. It is not unlikely that of the unnumbered things which claim our gratitude and praise, our disappointments deserve especial regard. But how little have we thought so.—Christian Chronicle.

THE BEAR SPEAKS

BY ALEXANDER DUMAS

I reached the hotel de Martigny towards four o'clock in the afternoon.

"Does Monsieur take dinner?" inquired my host.

"Every day religiously."

Hearing my affirmative answer, he continued.

"Monsieur has arrived in good time, we still have some of the bear."

"Ah! eh!" said I, much pleased at the dainty—"and is your bear good?"

The landlord smiled, and nodded his head up and down, with a movement which might be translated thus—"When you have tasted of it, you will not wish to eat any thing else."

"Very well," I continued, "and what is your dinner hour?"

"Half past five."

I took out my watch, it was only ten minutes past four. I shall have time, I said to myself, to visit the old chateau. In the hope of a good night, I made the tour of the town and its environs in a hour and a half, a space sufficient for viewing whatever is remarkable in the ancient capital of the Pennine Alps.

When I returned, the travellers were at the dinner table. I threw a rapid, uneasy glance towards the guests, all the chairs touched, and all were full—there was no room for me.

I started and turned round in quest of my host. He was behind me. I noticed a roguish expression in his face; he smiled.

"And where shall poor I sit?"

"Hold," said he, pointing with his finger towards a little side table, "behold, there is place."

My little table was indeed admirably served. Four dishes formed the first course, and in the centre was a beef steak of an appearance to put to blush any English beef-steak. My most perceptive faculty engrossed my attention, he bent towards my ear, with a mysterious air, "here is no the like of that for every body," said he to me.

"But what now, is this beef-steak"

"Pardon, it bear's fillet! [illegible]"

I should have been as well pleased if he had left me to suppose that it was part of a calf of beef.

I looked mechanically at this meat so celebrated, which reminded me of those unfortunate animals

I have seen, when quite small, roaring and matted with dirt, having a chain at their noses and a chain at the end of the chain, and clumsily dancing on a horse formed out of a staff, like that of the child of Virgil—I hear the dull sound of the drum which the man was beating, and the shrill notes of the flageolet, which he was blowing and all this gave me no voracious appetite for the much lauded meat which was before my eyes. I still hesitated, and turned the brown edge over and over, when my host who looked at me without comprehending my hesitation in the least, decided me by a last "just taste it for me and tell me what you think of it."

In fact, I cut off a bit of the size of an olive sopping it in as much butter as it could absorb; and opening my mouth, I applied it to my teeth, rather from shame than the expectation of ever coming my repugnance. My host, standing behind me, followed all my movements with the benevolent impatience of a man who enjoys before hand the surprise which is to be experienced. Mine, I confess, was great. However, I did not venture immediately to express any opinion; I feared that I might be mistaken. In silence I cut another morsel, double the size of the first, proceeding with the same precautions, but when it was swallowed, "How! is this bear!" said I.

"It is bear."

"Actually?"

"Upon my honor!"

"Well, it is excellent." At the same instant my worthy host was called to the large table, and quite satisfied that I was about to do honor to his favorite meat, he left me tete-a-tete with my steak. Three quarters of it had already disappeared when he returned, and resuming the conversation where he had been interrupted—

"That animal" said he, "which you're discussing, was a fam ile beast."

Striking Instance of Self Devotedness.

The most striking instance of self-devotedness in the cause of Christ I ever heard, in these days of declension, I was told of last week by an English minister. It has never been printed, and therefore I will relate it to you just as I heard it, to stir up all Christians, that we may give ourselves to the Lord.

The awful disease of leprosy still exists in Africa. Whether it be the same leprosy mentioned in the Bible, I do not know; but it is regarded as perfectly incurable, and no one dares to come near the leper. In the town of Algiers there is a lazar house for lepers. It is an immense space, enclosed by a very high wall, and containing fields which the lepers cultivate. There is only one entrance, which is strictly guarded. Whenever any one is found with the marks of leprosy upon him, he is brought to the guard, obliged to enter in never to come out again. None who enter in by that awful gate, ever return to come out again. Within this dreadful place are multitudes of lepers in all stages of the disease. Dr. Halbeck, a missionary of the United Brethren, from the top of a neighboring house, saw them at work. He noticed two poor lepers working in the field. The one had no hands, and no feet, these members being wasted away by the disease. The one was carrying the other, who mounted upon his back, and he carried in his mouth a bag of seed; and dropped a few here and there, which the other pressed into the ground with his foot and so they managed the work of one man between the two. And now little we know of the misery that is in the world. Sin is this prison house of disease. Oh! you [illegible] souls of the [illegible] Will you refuse to enter in at this dreadful gate; never to return again! Who will [illegible] labour [illegible] and [illegible] to carry the message of Saviour to these lepers? Two Moravian missionaries, inflamed by the love of souls, have chosen the [illegible] field of labor. They entered it never to come out again; and I [illegible] other Moravians quite ready to [illegible] And my dear friends; may we not [illegible] ordained before God, that we, [illegible] the same blood, and taught by the same Spirit, and yet how so unlike these men; I remember [illegible] love to Jesus are the [illegible]—Mr. Cheyne.

Christian Liberality.

There are certain general principles laid down in Scripture in relation to giving, and the use of property generally; respecting which there is much practical skepticism. They are as follows:

1. That which we have, we hold as stewards that must give account.

2. The way to increase is to distribute.—Some are rich because they are liberal.

3. That which is given to the poor is loaned to the Lord.

4. That which is done to Christ's little ones is done to himself.

A hundred fold in this life, and life everlasting in the world to come. Mark 10: 29.—Ibedem.

THE WIDOW BEDOTT

HAVING HEARD THAT ELDER SNIFFLES IS SICK, WRITES TO HIM.

DEAR ELDER:

I don't know but what you'll considder it ruther forrard in me to truble you with this epistol, being as I'me a'most a strainger; but I hope youle overlook my appearent want of judition, and attribit this communication to the oncommon interest I take in your welfare. Sence the first time I heerd you preach, I've had an undescriberble desire to hev some privit conversation with you, in regard to the state of my mind—your discourse was so wonderful sarchin' that I felt to mourn over my backsliddan state of stewpiddity, and my consarn has increased every time I've sot under the droppin's of your sanctuery. Last night when I heerd of your sickness, I felt wonderful overcome; onable to conseal my aggitation, I retired to my chamber, and burst into a flud of tears. I felt for you, elder Sniffles—I felt for you. I was wonderful exercised in vew of your lone condition. O, it's a terrible thing to be a lone in the world! I know all about it by experience, for I've ben pardnerless for nigh twelve year; it's a tryin' thing, but I thought 'twas better to be alone than to run enny resk—for you know it's runnin' a great resk to take a second companion, espeshelly if they aint decidedly pious—and them that's tried to perswade me to change my condition, didn't none on 'em give verry sattisfactry evidence of piety—'taint for me to say how many I've refused, on account of their want of religion. Accordin' to my notions, riches and grander aint to be compared to religion, no how you can fix it, and I allways told 'em so. But I was a tellin how overcome I was when I heerd of your being attackted with influenzy. I felt as if I must go right over and take care of you. I wouldent desire no better intertainment than to nurse you up, and if 'twasn't for the speech of people, I'de fly to your relefe instanter; but I know 'twould make talk, and so I feel necessiated to stay away. But I felt so consarned about you, that I couldent help writin' these few lines to let you know how anxious I be on your account, and to beg of you to take care of yerself. O, elder, do be careful—the influenzy's a dangerous epidemic, if you let it run on without attendin' to it in season. Do be careful—consider what a terrible thing 'twould be for you to be took away in the haight of yer usefulness; and O, elder nobody wouldent feel yer loss with more intensitude than what I should, though mebby I hadent ought to say so. O, elder Sniffles, I feel as if I couldent part with you no how. I'me so interrested in your preachin', and it's had such a wonderful attendency to subdow my prejudices against your denomination, and has sot me a considerin whether or no I wa'nt in the wrong. O, reverend elder, I intreat you to take care of yer preshus helth. I send you herewith a paper of boneset, you must make some good stiff tea out, and drink about a quart to night afore you retire. Molasses and vinegar's a good thing too for a cold or coff: jest take about a pint of molasses and bile it down with a teacup of vineger and a hunk of butter as big as a hen's egg, and stir in about a half a teacup full of peper sass, and eat it down hot jest afore bedtime—and take a strip of flannil, and rub some hog's lard on't, though goose ile's about as good, and pin it round yer throte right off; and I send likewise a bag of hops—you must dip it in bilin' vineger, and lay it on yer chist when you go to bed, and keep a dippin' on't as fast it begin to git cool; and jest afore you go into bed, soke yer feet in bilin' hot water with some red peppers in it; now don't forgit nothing I've prescribed. But I wes a tellin' how exercised I felt last night when I heerd of your sickness. I went immejitly to my chamber, and gin way to my grefe in a violent flood of tears. I retired to my couch of repose, but my aggitation prevented my sleepin'. I felt quite a call to express my feelin's in potry.—I'me very apt to when ennything comes over me—so I riz and lighted my candle, and composed these stanzys, which I hope will be agreeable to you.

O reverend sir, I do declare,
It drives me a'most to frenzy,
To think of you a lyin' there
Down sick with influenzy.
A body'd a thought it was enough
To mourn yer wife's departer,
Without such trubble as this 'ere
To come a follerin' after.
But sickness and affliction is trials sent
By the will of a wise creation,
And all ways ought to be underwent
With fortytude and resignation.
Then mourn not for yer partner's death,
But to submit endeavel;
For spose she hadent a died so soon,
She couldent a lived forever.
O, I could to your bedside fly,
And wipe yer weepin' eyes,
And try my best to cure you up,
If 'twouldent create surprise.
It's a world of trial we tarry in—
But elder, don't dispair,
That you may soon be movin agin,
Is constantly my prayer.
Both sick and well, you may depend
Youle never be forgot,
By your faithful and affectionate friend.
PRISCILLA POOL BEDOTT.

P. S. My nefaw, Jefferson Magwire, will hand you this epistol. I should be wonderful happified to receive a few lines from you when you git able, jest to show wether or no you think me forrard in addressin' you in this manner.

P. P. B.

P. S. Now do be careful of yerself, dear elder—excuse me for callin' you dear, it come out afore I was aware on't—don't fail to foller my directions, espeshelly about the boneset; it's the severinest cure in nature for influenzy—and be shore to soke yer feet in the hot water and peppers—her aint nothing like it to fetch down inflermation—and bind up yer throte in the red flannel—it prevents swellin—and I wouldent have you for git to use the hop-bag, for nothing—jest keep a pan of hot vinegar on top of yer stove, and dip the bag in it about once in ten minutes, all night—it'll give you such a good night's rest—hops is sleepyfyin. Committin' you to the care of creation, and hopin' youle be about agin in a few days, I sine my myself yourn, with consarn,

P. P. BEDOTT.

ELDER SNIFFLES' REPLY.

Most Worthy Mrs. Bedott:

Your communication of yesterday was duly received at the hand of your nephew. At the period of its reception, I was laboring under too great a degree of corporeal prostration to dictate an immediate response. But at present, feeling my physical condition to be, to some extent ameliorated, I hasten to respond. Accept my most unqualified acknowlegments for the interest which you apparently take in my welfare—and for the articles which you so kindly transmitted by your nephew. Permit me, also, to assure you of my abundant gratification at the assurances, that my unpretending discourses have been the feeble instrument of exerting a salutary influence upon your mind. I feel, most deeply do I feel, that I am but a poor unworthy worm of the dust; and it serves but to augment my humiliation to reflect that my labors in this field have been so signally blest. Your remedies, most excellent madam I have applied in accordance with your directions; and it affords me no inconsiderable satisfaction to be able to say that I think I can safely affirm that their effects upon my system have been salubrious; and I can but indulge in the hope that they will tend to my ultimate restoration. I must not, however, omit to mention, that I did not realize, to the full extent, the efficacy of the hop-bag; for after having arisen agreeably to your directions, some five or six times, (it may be seven, I will not venture to speak positively as to the number) and immersed the hop-bag in the boiling vinegar, I regret to say that I unintentionally fell into a state of unconsciousness, from which I probably did not enjoy the refreshing repose which a constant application of the hot hop-bag would have afforded. However, notwithstanding this unintentional neglect, I am happy to state that the virulence of my attack is decidedly abated.

I acknowledge myself deeply indebted for the poem which accompanied your communication. It was truly gratifying to my feelings. Your remark therein embodied, that "we tarry in a world of trial," is a very just one—very, indeed. This is uncontrovertibly a life of trials—of disappointment and fluctuation, sent, undoubtedly, for the fortification of our faith. It will afford me most unmitigated pleasure to converse with you privately, in regard to your mind, and to give you such instructions upon doctrinal points as may be necessary and conducive to your spiritual edification. With that view, I invite you to call at my residence on Friday even next, when, if no unforeseen contingencies intervene to prevent, and my corporeal condition continues to improve, I shall be unoccupied and most happy to attend to your case, and enlighten you in relation to such inquiries as you may be pleased to propound.

With sentiments of unmitigated regard,
I remain your obliged friend,
O. SHADRACK SNIFFLES.

Nazarine Women.—Miss Plumely, in her journal of travels in Palestine, gives this discription of the women in the city of Nazareth. There had been a wedding on the afternoon of her arrival; and in the evening the bride, with a bundle of clothes on her head, was escorted by a troop of girls with music, round the town to the house of her husband, where they remained clapping their hands, and with the aid of a few drums making a great noise until a late hour.

The Syrian Greek women are, beyond comparison, the loveliest in the world; we saw many of these of Nazareth, who came down with their pitchers to the fountain Nahor for water, in whom were visibly united all that painters may endeavor to picture—all that poets dream. Their features combine the perfect proportion of the Greek model, with the character and expression of the daughters of Israel; their figures, the united delicacy and voluptuousness of form, which the finest statue possesses. The costume of those we saw this evening was well suited to their wearers. Their long hair, which was in many instances ornamented with great numbers of gold sequins, and some pearls; in others, flowers of brilliant hues replaced the "pearl and gold," but all wore the full blue trowsers, drawn tight at the ancle, (which not unfrequently was encircled, with silver bracelets) the petticoat reaching only to the knees, and the under vest open at the breast. It is neither bounce, tunic, or jacket, but something between each.—Literary Examiner Fishes Tamed by a Child.—In a quarter of the town of Hingham known as Rockybrook, there is a pond, where a little girl, not six years old, who resides near the bank, has tamed the fishes to a remarkable degree. She began by throwing crumbs into the water. Gradually the fishes learnt to distinguish her footsteps and darted to the edge whenever she approached; and now they will actually feed out of her hand and allow her to touch their scaly sides. A venerable turtle is among her regular pensioners. The control of Van Amburg over his wild beasts is not more susprising than that which this little girl has attained over her finny playmates. Visiters have been attracted from a distance of several miles to witness the spectacle she exhibits. The fishes will have nothing to do with any one but their tried friend. They will trust no one else; let him come with provender ever so tempting. Even fishes are not so cold-blooded but they will recognize the law of kindness, and yield to its all embracing power.—Boston Transcript.

Moral Standards.—While we shall not insist upon perfectibility, we are yet satisfied that it is always best to consider the human heart as capable of the highest policy; as sufficiently comprehensive in its design, and sufficiently strong in its original energies, to become, after a season, all that which the good wish it may become. Human nature not unfrequently suffers from the low, and too little friendly estimate which we place upon it. Its powers are more frequently underrated than overrated; and, which is worse, the course of education obtaining in general, is calculated rather to keep the mind what it has been hitherto, than what, with the daily increasing means of improvement, furnished by its own untiring exertions, it might readily and with moderate diligence, become. The ages should build one above another, as we walk above the heads of our fathers until progress upon progress being considered, without seeking to appear impious, we rise with lifted foreheads above the vallies, and become in the sight thereof as Gods!

KINDNESS.—No man hath measured the power of kindness, for it is boundless; no man hath seen its death, for it is eternal. In all ages of the world in every clime, among every kind, it hath shown out a bright and beautiful star.—a beaming glory.

Were we as eloquent as angels, yet we should please some men, some women, and some children, more by listening than by talking.—Colton.

ANECDOTES OF DOGS.

"But of all the attributes of the dogs, those which seem the most to have claimed attention, are his attachment to man in general, and his fidelity to individuals in particular. The dog very rarely, and never but under peculiar circumstances, seeks to gain his natural liberty. He prefers, to the state of liberty, the protection of man, and lingers near our dwellings, even when he is spurned and disowned by us. When he attaches himself to any one, all his actions indicate that the relation is one which has a foundation in the affections of the animal, and does not vary with the degree of benefits conferred. The dog that shares the lot of the miserable and poor, is no less faithful than another that enjoys all that can gratify the senses. The peasant boy, who rears up his little favorite in his cabin of mud, and shares with it his scanty crust, has a friend as true as he who has ease and abundance to bestow. Release, from the cord of the blind beggar, the dog that leads him from door to door, and will he follow you a step for all with which you can tempt his senses? Confine him in your mansion, and feed him with the waste of plenteous repasts, and let his forlorn campanion approach your door to crave a scrap of food, and the dog will fly to him with fidelity unshaken, and bound with joy to be allowed once more to share his miserable lot. Again and again has the dog of the humblest and poorest remained faithful to the last, and laid himself down to die on the grave of his earliest friend.

"Recently, a poor boy in a manufacturing town had contrived, from his hard earnings, to rear up a little dog. The boy, as he was passing along to his daily work, was struck down, and dreadfully maimed, by the fall of some scaffolding. He was carried on a shutter, mangled and bleeding, to a hospital near, attended by the dog. When he was brought to the door, the dog endeavored to enter along with him; but being shut out, he laid himself down. Being driven beyond the outer gate, he went round and round the walls, searching for any opening by which he could enter. He then lay down at the gate, watching every one who entered with wistful eyes, as if imploring admittance. Though continually repulsed, he never left the precints night or day and even before the wounded boy breathed his last, the faithful dog, struck with total paralysis, had ceased to live. It is well known that the soldiers of the French levies were often mere boys, brought from their country homes, to undergo at once all the rigors of the service. They were often accompanied by their little dogs, who followed them as best they could. Often, after the carnage of a desperate field, these dogs have been found stretched on the mangled bodies of their youthful friends. A French officer, mortally wounded in the field, was found with his dog by his side. An attempt having been made to seize a military decoration on the breast of the fallen officer, the dog, as if conscious how much his master had valued it, sprang fiercely at the assailants. An unfortunate soldier, condemned for some offence to die, stood bandaged before his comrades appointed to give the fatal volley, when his dog, a beautiful spaniel, rushed wildly forward, flew into his arms to lick his face, and for a moment interrupted the sad solemnity. The comrades, with tears in their eyes, gave the volley, and the two friends fell together. A youthful conscript, severely wounded in the terrible battle of Eylau, was carried to the hospital amongst hundreds of his fellows. Many days afterwards, a little dog had found its way, no one knew how, into the place, and amongst the wounded, the dying, and the dead, had tracked out his early friend. The fainting boy was found by the attendants with the dog beside him licking his hands. The youth soon breathed his last, and a kind comrade took charge of the dog; but the animal would take no food, pined away, and shortly died. And a thousand other examples might be given of an affection in this creature unaltered by changes of fortune, and enduring to the last."

Who has not heard of the unforunate pilgrim of Helvellyn, and of his faithful dog—faithful even in death—immortalized alike by the Bard Chivalry and Laurel-honoring Laureate? We entirely concur with Mr. Youatt in his opinion, that while poverty may drive from a cold hearth many a companion of our happier hours, it was never known to diminish the love of one canine attendant.—The Examiner.

ZSCHOKKE.—"Not far from the river Aare on the slope of the hills which shut in the valley of the Aar, stands, amongst other country houses, the villa of a man who, though a native German has now for many years become, by adoption, a Swise, and who is one of the very few who have not only entered thoroughly into the life, spirit, and institutions of their adopted country, but have, by writing, speech, and action done brave battle in her cause, at numerous and trying emergencies. In that vine-covered house upon the hill, surrounded by its beautiful gardens, lives Heinrich Zschokke, whose numerous and well-known writings have excited so much sympathy and admiration in Germany as well as Switzerland. His Swiss History has been a valuable book for the people of Swizerland; and his Autobiography proves how much interest he took, and how various, active, and useful were the parts he played at various times on the political arena. At present he lives in retirement at this villa, with the receipt of his writings. In having attained through literature the means for such outlay he does indeed stand alone among the greater number of German authors; but Zschokke's works are not of an ordinary kind and some of them have brought him a high remuneration, as for example his History of the Bavarian People and their Princes. He is also now known as the author of the Hours of Devotion, which, from its wide circulation, must considerably have improved his pecuniary circumstances. The tall and dignified old man, whose blue eyes still retain their lively and benevolent expression, received me with friendly hospitality into his family circle. He lives like a patriarch, surrounded by sons and grandsons; and walking in his garden beneath the shadow of trees planted and reared by himself, he conversed with me of his former active life. Many of his sons are in the service of the State of Aargau; one of them is married to Zschokke's adopted daughter, the father of whom it was whose fate suggested to Zschokke his tale Alamontade, the Galley-Slave. This beautiful young woman who with her children, was on a visit at the house of Zschokke during my stay, added not a little to the charm of the aged patiarch's family circle. From the recent disturbances of Switzerland Zschokke appears to have held himself entirely aloof, being naturally disinclined at the age of seventy-six, to mingle again with the wild discord and fierce strife of political parties. His deep enthusiasm for the cause of the people, for which he formerly made such active exertions, remains unchanged; yet many of the warmest desires of modern times may excite in him no responsive emotion and even in that for which he formerly labored so assiduously he now works only in words, whose influence is incapable of producing much effect on the rapid course of political affairs. From this valley the old statesman, author, teacher and reformer, looks far over the blooming valley of the Aar, stretched out before him like a garden and little is to be wondered at if he desires no change, but in peaceful enjoyment amid these lovely scenes, surrounded and blessed by his large and happy family, and seeing the canton of which he is a citizen prosperous, enlightened, and independent, and his own house the point of attraction to many a passing traveller, coming to offer his tribute of admiring veneration."—Switzerland in 1847.

THE DIFFERENCE.

The French Revolution of 1798 was in a considerable degree a rising against the corruption of the Church, as well as of the State. A licentious and worldly minded clergy had brought Religeon itself into contempt. Neither philosophers or people made any distinction between the altar and the unworthy priest that ministered at the altar. It was proclaimed and sincerely believed, (as sincerely we mean, as any such falsehood could be believed,) that there was no God, and that the soul was mortal as the body. "Sprinkle me with perfumes, crown me with flowers," said Mirabeau as he lay upon his dying bed, "that I may thus enter upon eternal sleep."

Such was the sentiment of the Revolutionists of '98, the "Age of Reason" had come—superatition, which was to them but another name for religion, was no longer to rest like a heavy darkness upon the earth—man was to be free from all authority, even that of his God.

We do not feel bound to launch out into invectives against the errors of these men. For after all they were men, and their actions are to be accounted for on principles which have a reference to men, and not to fiends alone. The people of France had been ground down to the dust by a profligate nobility, and when they rose with one wild spring of rage, the stains of earth were upon their souls.

The excesses of that period were not a "righteous" retribution, as some have termed them—but they were a natural retribution.

We did not intend, when we begun, however, to go at length into this subject—we merely wished to refer particularly to one single fact, containing in itself the essence of long homilies upon the diference between the French of 1798 and 1848. It is told in the Democratic Pacifique: On taking the Tuileries the people found a magnificent image of Christ in sculpture. The people stopped and saluted it. "My friend," cried a pupil of the Polytechnic School, "this is the Master of us all!" The people took the Christ, and bore it solemnly to the Church of St. Roch. "Citizens, off with your hats. Salute Christ!" said the people; and everybody inclined respectfully towards it. Herein lies one great difference between the two revolutions. In 1793, the people took a young girl and paraded her through the streets of Paris as the Goddess of Reason; in 1848, they bend respectfully in the wild enthusiasm of the moment, before a statue of the great Teacher of the brotherhood of man. May not fifty years have wrought an equally great change in other respects in the French character? Let us hope so, until we can hope no longer. To prophesy evil of those who are contending for liberty, does not become the sons of America.—The Saturday Evening Post.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA, SEPTEMBER 29, 1848.

Slave canoes captured.

On the night of the 9th inst., our Marshall, Col: Hicks, captured two large slave canoes, two casks of rum, fourteen neprunes, and a few other articles of trade. These canoes were manned with Crewmen and were on their way to Little Cape Mount, for the purchase of slaves. It was not the intention of these marauders to land on our beach, but being much wearied, and in want of food, they approached within hailing distance, and requested the Crewmen to bring them something to eat. They were invited to come on shore, to refresh themselves,—take a short rest, and they would be in a good condition to prosecute their journey. After much entreaty, and assurances that no danger was to be apprehended, the canoes were landed, the property received in Crewtown and the slavers made comfortable in a house to themselves. As soon as matters were thus arranged, Johnson, the head Crewman, despatched one of his men to Col: Yates with the intelligence, and an urgent solicitation that immediate measures be taken to capture the slavers. Col: Yates did not hesitate to take the proper course, and very soon afterwards, he was, with the Marshall and five other gentlemen on the path to Crewtown—the canoes and merchandize, were easily secured; but we regret to say, that notwithstanding every precaution was used in approaching the town, the slavers succeeded in making their escape—they broke through the back part of the matted house, and were soon hid in the forest on Cape Messurado.

Canoes are frequently journeying from New Cessters and Trade Town to Little Cape Mount, for the purchase of slaves—and the authorities have made several attempts to capture them, and bring to punishment the chiefs in that neighborhood for commencing the traffick—but have not succeeded in sustaining the charge against any of them.

The Spaniard at New Cessters, tho' he denies having any thing to do with the traffick in slaves, is in suspicion, as deeply engaged in it now, as he ever was. He is very cautious in his movements: and unless spies are kept constantly in the neighborhood of his establishment, the fact will never be established against him. He is living in our territory and introduces into it large quantities of merchandize, which pays no duties—and he should be driven from the country. We hope that the Executive will give this matter his serious consideration, and as soon as the weather will permit, send an expedition into that region.

Last month an officer was despatched by the authorities of Grand Bassa, to the Spaniard's establishment to arrest a couple of dissolute women who have been living there a considerable length of time—the officer made application to the King of the country for a safe conduct, which was immediately granted—and the officer went direct to the Spaniard's house; he was courteously received and entertained, and the persons named in his warrant were arrested. The Spaniard conversed freely with the officer, and told him, that he was in daily expectation of the arrival of the vessel to take him and his effects to Brazil.

VERY little Palm Oil can be purchased. The Africans are busily engaged in gathering their crops of rice. Should there be a cessation of rain, the oil trade will be pretty fair about the latter part of next month.

Vessel Lost.

The sloop "Black Hat," Whitfield master, owned by Mr. Thomas Hunter of this place, while off New Cessters, parted her chain and went on shore. The vessel and cargo entirely lost.

Slavers Captured.

One of H. B. Majesty's cruisers, in the early part of this month, captured three slave vessels, off the river Gallenas, and sent them into Sierra Leone for adjudication. One of these vessels had on board a cargo of four hundred slaves; and sufficient evidence was at hand to warrant the condemnation of the other two.

THE vessel purchased by the Vice President for Government, has been repaired, and is now being rigged, and will soon be ready for service. She passed over the bar in fine style, on the morning of the 15th, inst: under the direction of our fellowtownsman, Captain Reed Cooper. She is a fine vessel, and may prove profitable to the government, if properly managed. Should the monopoly law be carried out, we would suggest, that she be used for the accommodation, instead of chartering foreign vessels for the purpose. It would be a great saving to the government if this plan could be adopted; and we are not aware of any objection to her being thus employed.

Trade Town.

This beautiful country is about to be the theatre of a long and bloody war. Already the torch has been lighted, and many lives destroyed. Flor, a brother of Prince Boyer, the acknowledged sovereign of the country has taken up arms against his king, and is making extensive preparations to dethrone him. Will Buckler, of Grand Corah, a celebrated warrior, and next in succession to his king, has been solicited by Flor, to assist him. Buckler has consented to do so, and will march to his aid as soon as the king's consent is obtained. Prince Boyer is a brave man, and will resist to the last.

According to the official returns of the Collector of Customs, for the County of Grand Bassa, there was exported from that county, in the last quarter, 600 lbs. Ginger, 2266 lbs. arrow-root, and 1372 lbs. coffee,—(the value of these articles is $ 714 66.)

We invite the attention of our readers to the communication from Rev. William H. Payne, missionary of the M. E. Church, residing at Grand Cape Mount. We are under many obligations to Mr. Payne for so kindly acceeding to our request, for a history of the causes which gave rise to the murder of Prince George Cain.

We are confident, that peace will not be of long duration in that country, and that property will be very insecure. The Headmen, may for the present, favor the murdering of George Cain, but when they find that his absence from the administration of the affairs of the country, brings them no material advantage, they will be as ready to prefer charges against Mamorah, the murderer of Cain, as they are now to countenance him.

Elder John Day, Superintendent of the mission, of the Foreign Mission Board of the Southern Baptist Convention, has employed Mr. John T. Richardson to teach a school a New Georgia. The school has been in operation but a few weeks, and numbers now more than sixty scholars. Mr. R. is a licensed preacher in the Providence Baptist Church at this place.

Simon

The schooner "Susannah" arrived on the 25th, inst: bringing the latest intelligence from the County of Simou. We gather from the letters of our correspondents, the following information.

The 26th, of July was celebrated at Greenville, with considerable display. A national salute was fired, the civil officers and citizens marched in procession to the M. E. Church, where a very appropriate and interesting address was delivered by the Rev. Mr. Priest.

A good dinner was served up in fine style, and in the evening a ball was attended by the fashionables to trip the light fantastic.

The immigrants by the "Col: Howard" were doing well, they had had slight attacks of the African fever,—the greater part of them were clearing their lands, and making preparations to build their houses.

A man by the name of Washum, one of the immigrants by the "Col: Howard," had been shot by an African, on the Blue Barre side, about three miles from the town of Greenville—he died ten days afterwards. The murderer was tried at the Superior Court, Judge Murray presiding, and found guilty of murder in the first degree—HE WAS EXECUTED. The murderer to the last declared that he took Washum for a baboon. Washum was hunting and had laid himself in a secluded place, to escape the notice of a flock of partridges. Many of the citizens believe the shooting to have been as the African said.

☞"Aman has just arrived at Madrid, whose body bullets cannot enter. He proposes being publicly shot at by the soldiers of the garrison; and if this be not permitted, he will shoot himself by means of a machine which will let off several muskets at the same time. This strange fellow is said to have invented a garment of a tissue which will resist any bullet."

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Liberia Herald.

Messrs Editors:—Though we must die as inspiration decrees, and as water spilt upon the ground which cannot be gathered, yet it is impossible for a human being to contemplate the rapid extinction of life without concern. To perish in a moment—to be hurried instantaneously and without preparation into the presence of the Supreme Judge, are subjects, the awful consequences of which, the heathen mind has never considered. Indeed to die has something in it inexpressibly awful and solemn. Such were the thoughts which agitated my mind at listening to a recital of the manner in which the late Prince George Cain was murdered. Reclining in a Hammock—reposing from the fatigue of a journey from his town down towards the beach—unconscious of the plan laid to take away his life, suddenly a crowd gathers around him, and instantly (so to speak) a spear and knife put a period to his existence.

The circumstances which led to this act, so appalling to the feelings of humanity, I give, as far as my gathered information in relation to them, will warrant. I am informed by the principle head men of this country, that his assumption of too much power was the cause of his murder, an act which had caused many a king in his country to share a fate similar to that of Prince Cain.

He is said to have entered into an agreement with the English relative to the abolition of the slave trade in the Cape Mount Country, without having previously consulted the Chiefs and Head Men. And that after such an agreement or treaty was effected, and a stipulation entered into on the part of the English, to pay them a certain amount of money annually, the first instalment was embezzled by him.

That such a treaty being effected, they were deprived of the gain arising from selling slaves, and being conscious of no other sources to which they could apply for patronage, but Monrovia and the trading establishments of its citizens here, the only means they could devise to render these supports permanent, would be to redeem the long lost confidence and patronage of the citizens of Monrovia; by encouraging the establishment of their factories in this country, and throwing no obstacles in the way of their traders.

That their purposes in these respects were thwarted and their hopes nearly blasted in that he, without having consulted any of them, enacted a law, laying a prohibition upon any American trading in this country unless he paid the sum of fifty dollars; which sum in two instances, was paid to, and devoted by him to his private use.

These, as far as I can learn, are the principle circumstances which led to his murder. From conversation I have had with some of the principle men of this country, I learn that Prince Cain's murder is, with a few exceptions, generally approved; though every day brings reports relative to war, which will probably occasion. The natives at the present are favorably disposed towards the Americans, and assure them and their property security; yet so uncertain is every thing connected with a residence among natives, and especially in such stirring times as these, when the interior of the country is agitated with broils and confusion. Together with the daily report of war, I, as an individual, could not feel myself secure with any considerable amount of stock or hand. I warrant the death of Prince Cain from the fact, that he relished a taste for civilized life, which, seemingly, could not be wiped away by the customs of his country. He could seldom be seen without being dressed with civilize attire—shoes, pants &c: and his principal conversation with civilized persons would be in relation to the usages and customs of civilized countries. His limited acquaintance with, and taste for civilize life, led him in every instance, to give sanction to any and every measure that had the appearance of civilization. Hence we see his willingness to have a Missionary established in his country to teach the children, and his agreement was to protect such an establishment. It is no more than justice to him to remark that up to the time he was killed, the purposes of the mission enjoyed his highest sanction. He contributed to its operations as much as his various callings would allow, by attending services and using his influence to induce his wives, servants, children and others to attend also. And I am informed that when he was murdered, he had in his possession a large bell, which his interest in the prosperity of the mission had prompted him to make me a present of. I am credibly informed also that previous to his death, Prince Cain had contemplated a visit to Monrovia, to seek an interview with the authorities relative to the formation of an alliance with that government; and it was my purpose to have some conversation with him on the subject after he returned from his town; but unfortunately for him, he never returned!

Since the breaking out of the slave war and the death of Prince Cain, I have heard it intimated by several that they would be glad to have protection from the Americans. Hence I am of opinion that an effort on the part of our government for the acquisition of this interesting portion of country would not be altogether in vain.

Several circumstances are reported to have occured in Prince Cain's journey from his town down to the town at which he was murdered, which circumstances I would relate more for novelty than for the truth of them, had I paper, and fabled as prognostics of the illfate which attended him: by all of which it is said that he would not be warned. And if any credit can be attached to them, it is strange they were not sufficient to alarm any creature subject to apprehension and alarm, unless, as the case might have been, all forebodings laid dormant under the effects of the inebriating draught.

The death of Prince Cain is to be lamented in the next place from the fact, that we are led to believe he was hurried out of time in an unprepared condition. If we can repose faith in the various reports relative to his life, we must conclude that his career was wild and destructive. It is reported that the principle part of his life was that of a warrior—that fire and sword have been his delight, (we may say) from his youth up—his glory consisted in the desolation of towns and the slaughter of human beings; town after town has been laid waste by the depredations of his wars, and the lives of the inhabitants, (old and young,) taken under the most unfortunate and affecting cries for mercy. The innocent have shared the same fate, and their blood mingled with that of the guilty. Mothers of hoary hairs have been beheaded in the presence of their children under the most urgent entreaties to spare their lives, and their motherless children left merely to be spectators of the mournful and horrible scene. He is reported to have beheaded seven chiefs of this country.

During his life he often expressed himself as being decidedly of the opinion, that war was the only duty assigned him in this life—that he never felt better satisfied than when engaged in conducting a war.

Thus it will be seen that, while the christian Missionary is devising means to mitigate the evils and promote the welfare of the heathen, the principal men among them are revolving in their minds, plans of future devastation and ruin. Towns emptied of their inhabitants, and houses desolated, are among their proudest trophies: and if their fame lives after them, it is only in the cry of suffering humanity—in the curse and imprecation of those whom their wars have reduced to despair.

It would seem from the conduct of Prince Cain—from the wild and hurried manner which attended his career, that he arrived at sway by the sceptre over the whole Cape Mount Country, regardless of the persons or influence of the Chiefs and Head men; and was determined to silence by death or some other means, every opponent. It is said when he was murdered he had concocted a plan, and intended putting it in execution before he left the town, to murder the individual by whom he was murdered.

When he was apprehended his last words, under the gashes of knives and spears, were "I have done my part in my country, and you my enemies, are at liberty to do yours; my last request is that I may be borne (only by the hands of freemen) out side of the gate of your town, that I may die there."

The Mission at the present enjoys quiet and every prospect appears pleasing. The children of my school improve much to my satisfaction, and in many instances have exceeded my expectations.

In conclusion I will remark, for the gratification of those who wish to know, that I have seen and conversed with all the Chiefs and Head men of this country on the subject of the mission being established in their country, and as far as I can learn, it meets with their highest sanction.

Yours, &c.

W H. PAYNE.

OBITUARY.

Messrs Editors:—Sirs, permit me to give vent to a subject, which have borne with weight on my mind for many years, through the columns of your erudite paper.

The individual of whom I write, has long since been by the arms of death, confined to the grave, there to remain, until the morning of the general resurrection, when the blast of the Arch-Angel's trumpet shall summons the slumbering tenants of the earth, and congregated worlds to meet the Eternal Judge of all the Earth in the air:—whose ransomed spirit on leaving its cumbersome tenement of clay, quickly winged its way through the trackless air, and gained the Jerusalem of God, to join the raptured and disembodied spirits in praising and adoring that Being who redeemed it from everlasting destruction: if this be the case with all upright spirits, and the reward of all those who, in the course of their days, lead a virtuous life; the spirit will return and reunite with the body, but not to be burdened as before, but as the scripture beautifully asserts; "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality: so when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, death is swallowed up of victory." Then how appropriate the language of Scripture, to those who have a desire to enjoy the rest spoken of: "Israel, prepare to meet your God."

From the fact that I am deeply interested in this subject, which induces me to solicit its publication. Not that there is any thing wonderful in it, but it may be somewhat gratifying to the surviving relatives, friends, and acquaintances of the deceased, who may be fortunate enough to get hold of the paper containing this subject, and who, on reading it, will (perhaps) at once recognize the individual referred to, without pressing of memory to their assistance. From delicacy the individual shall in a great measure be nameless.

The memoir of our subject was born in the State of South Carolina, some time in the year 1812, and was raised up in the city of Charleston. At the age of about twelve years, she was taught by the Gospel of our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, the necessity of seeking her soul's salvation; and she obeyed the heavenly mandate: soon after, she attached herself to the M. E. Church in that city; and it is said by those who were well acquainted with her, that from that time forward, she lived an examplary christian life.

The individual under consideration emigrated to this country from her native land, about the middle or last part of November, 1832, with her husband and two little children, in company with a number of other persons of high respectability, from that city and Savannah, Georgia. They all arrived in the port of Monrovia, in the ship Hercules, about the 12th, of January, 1833. She had not been here long, before she was deprived by the cold and ruthless hand of death, of both her husband and children; and she was brought to the serious reflection, that "Man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets."

Thus the bereaved widow was left; but fortunately for her, she was almost surrounded by a host of her townsmen, to impart to her words of consolation, and to cheer up her drooping spirit. Since that time, many of those who emigrated to this country with her, have been called to quit the stage of action, and go to their long and eternal home:

> To see the Judge with glory crown'd
> With majesty severe; but not a frown.

It was after the scene of those distresses had passed by, that our acquaintance was formed:—and the necessary preparations having been made, the reverential bow was made at the Hymeneal Altar, in the year 1834. With me, all was life, for I had not known trouble, for my heart was young and full of vigour.

We had been enjoying the sweets of conjugal felicity, for about four years and nine months, and had not anticipated that our joys was so soon to have been interrupted by the monster death: but alas! the tale of woe was told; it was so. It is true occasional attacks of sickness had interrupted the health of the family, which is customary among all families: but four fleeting years and some months had hardly been swallowed up in greedy eternity, before the fatal attack was made.

It was on a Monday morning in December (17th) 1838, that Mrs. M——, rose up very early in excellent health, in order to have breakfast over soon; (for it was on the Friday before, that she said that she felt herself to be in better health then, than she had since her arrival in the colony.)

After breakfast she took a walk over to Mrs. C——'s, an intimate and dear friend of hers, (and for whose kindness, grateful recollections will be cherished,) where she remained until about 12 o'clock in the day, when she returned home, and while she was busily engaged about the affairs of home, (Oh! sad to tell, the tide of life had well nigh run out;) she was taken with a severe ague, which lasted till late in the afternoon. The ague having abated, a violent fever followed, which was so terrible in its mad career, that it brought on delirium. Repeated efforts was attempted to afford relief, but it all proved abortive; and it was not until late that night before relief was felt. Hopes of recovery was cheerished: thus the remainder of the night passed away. In the morning still brighter hopes of recovery was entertained, as Mrs. M——, rose up and attempted to attend to some of the affairs of the house. But it appears that the first raging attack of fever had only given place for one of a still more severer nature.

On Tuesday morning, about half an hour after Mrs. M——, had gotten up, she was taken with a violent fever more harsh than the first, which at once reduced her to a state of insensibility. Doctor G. was immediately sent for, he attended as soon as the intelligence reached him. He gave the necessary medicines, with instructions for further proceedings. The fever lasted without the least shaded of mitigation until night, when it raged still higher. The Doctor having attended, he was asked by her husband, "Doctor what do you think of her?" his reply was, with a shrug of the shoulder, "she is very sick indeed sir." He endeavored to do all in his power to arrest the further progress of the maddening fever, but in vain. The countenance of the doctor bespoke the fatality of the patient.

Thus the fever continued with but few symtoms of mitigation until Thursday morning. From Tuesday night until Thursday morning, about thirty hours, the fever kept its victim rolling, tossing and groaning under its powerful influence, with not more than ten minutes respite at any one time, during that period. During the time the doctor frequently asked the patient to tell him where the greatest misery laid, but in vain. The patient could not retain reason enough at any one period to tell any thing about her complaint. Her infant babe was several times presented to her, under the expectation that she would recognize it, and if possible sooth its piteous cries, but all for nought, she looked at the infant on each occasion with a stare of wildness. This was the effect of the severe pains which the patient was wrecked with.

On Thursday morning about 8 o'clock, the fever had abated enough to allow Mrs. M——to remain in her senses about three quarters of an hour. During which time the Doctor asked her to tell him where the most pains and miseries laid. She accordingly told him the Doctor set to work in order, if possible, to stop the further progress of the disease. During the same time she was asked if she was hungry, for she had not eaten any-thing from the time she was first taken sick; "O yes, very hungry," was the reply: some thing was given her directly to eat, of which she ate a few mouth fulls. She called for James Edward, (for that was the name of the child); it was brought to her: she could only express her symnathy for the child. Now it was that our sinking hopes began to be revived, when hopes of recovery began to present itself. But alas! alas!—In a few moments our fondly cherished hopes sunk down in despair. The fever returned with a fiery vengeance, and the patient was reduced to a perfect state of insensibility. She remained so until about 10 o'clock that night, when the fever cooled down, but extreme weakness possessed the frame. The Doctor was again asked what he thought of her; he with a despairing look, shrugged up his shoulders, and said, "she is very sick:" because he knew that the monster death had made his dire appearance. During the short interval of torturing pains, and the soul leaving the body, she only had time to remark to those who stood around her bed, that she had a sure acceptance with God, because she had passed from death unto life,—was washed in the laver of regeneration. The appearance of death was still more visible; but as the dear departed was passing through the gloomy vale of death, with a placid countenance, she looked as though she saw Him who is invisible. A few minutes after 11 o'clock on Thursday evening, the 20th of December, 1838, her ransomed spirit left its clay teneme it for the place of the just made perfect, to dwell whole ages in those realms of bliss,

> "Where congregation ne'er break up,
> Nor Sabbaths ha no end."

Yes, it is over, the scenery is changed, and our friend is gone to join with happy spirits to chant the praises of Him who loved and died, and rose again, leading captivity captive.

Mrs. M——was a faithful member of the M. E. Church in this place: it was on the Wednesday of the week preceeding that of her illness, that she attended her class-meeting; on which occasion she gave full vent to her feelings; she told her class leader that she felt conscious that it would be the last class-meeting capacity she would attend on earth, and as such, she wished to be excused for the length of time she might take to speak satisfactory.

We are instructed in "Holy Writ" not to sorrow for those who falls asleep in Christ, as for those who die out of Christ; knowing that we who have the blood of Christ applied to our hearts, we shall have the blessed reward in life everlasting. For Paul the Apostle, in his eulogy on christian perfection, alluding to the saints in Paradise, says, "God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect:" Heb: xi: chap: 10 verse.

Mrs. M——was one of the founders of the U. S. C. Society in this town. It was her constant wish to please God, and as far as she was able, to aid in benefiting suffering humanity.

Yours very truly,

SURVIVER.

Monrovia, September 23rd, 1848,

Messrs Editors:—Sirs, you will please give publicity to the following lamentable circumstances, that took place a few weeks ago at the leeward.

The brig Ellen Jenkenson, of Liverpool, while at anchor at a short distance to the northward of Sinou River, about the 25th, ultimo, in firing a salute, one of the guns bursted, and mortally injured the clerk of the vessel, a young man who had not been long on the coast—breaking his arms and carrying of the entire under jaw, with a part of the wind pipe. The young man lived about three hours.

The second mate of the vessel had one of his legs shivered to pieces. The Captain immediately got under weigh and ran up to Grand Bassa, to procure medical attendance for the wounded man: soon after his arrival there, the wounded mate was sent on shore, and the broken leg was amputated above the knee joint, mortification having taken place that far up, and probably farther. He died on the evening of the same day that the operation was performed.

Yours, &c.

Popular Fallacies

"The habits of the king of beasts are not of that noble order which naturalists formerly ascribed to him. In the daytime he will almost invariably fly from man, unless attacked, when his courage is that of mingled rage and despair. I have seen the lion, suddenly roused from his lair, run off as timidly as a buck. It is said that even at night they do not like to seize a man from a party, especially if the persons exercise their voices; and that the carcass of an antelope, or other game, may be preserved untouch by hanging some stirrups on a branch near, so that the irons may clash together when blown by the wind: a white handkerchief on the end of a ramrod is another recipt for effecting the same object. The lion is a stealthy, cunning brute, never attacking unless he has the advantage, and relying on his vast strength, feels sure of the victory. The natives tell incredible stories of his sagacity, which would almost make him a reasoning animal. There are well-authenticated cases on record of lions carrying men way at night from the fire-side, but these are quite the exception—they are grégarious, as many as twenty having been seen in a troop."—Methuen's South Africa.

POETRY.

THE MEETING OF THE SPIRITS

BY LYDIA H. SIGOURNEY.

She floated on a silvery cloud,
And to the earth drew near,
Still bending down her angel-glance
On what was once most dear.

On mountain's breast, on forest-shade,
Green in her native air,
And on that temple's hallow'd dome,
Whence rose her Sabbath prayer.

She hover'd round her pleasant home,
In blooming spring-tide gay,
But faded were the flowers she rear'd,
And mute her harp-string lay.

There, sickening on his lonely couch,
Was stretched her bosom's friend,
And stranger forms were bending low,
His helplessness to tend.

He fainted—and though all unseen,
She to his side drew nigh,
And shook fresh perfumes from her wing,
Like breath of Araby.

And deep within his secret soul,
Her spirit eye she turn'd
And saw the shafts that in each vein,
With restless anguish burn'd—

Behold the tear that drains the heart,
In ceaseless fountain pour
And knew the love that cheer'd his life,
Must light its path no more.

And then, before His glorious throne,
Who ruleth earth and sky,
Sigh'd forth, like trembling music's tone—
"Oh, Father! let him die."

A corpse lay on its pillow white,
And grief was mourning low,
But the glad meeting, in the heaven's
High home but seraphs know.

THE BEAR'S STEAK.

BY ALEXANDER DUMAS.

(Concluded.)

I assented with a nod.

"It weighed three hundred and twenty pounds."

"A noble size!"—and I kept on eating.

"It was not easy to catch him, I promise you."

"I can believe it indeed"—and I put the last bit to my mouth.

"The rascal eat up half of the hunter who killed him."

Out sprung the peice from my mouth, as if it had been hurled by an engine.

"What the fury possesses you," cried I, turning towards him, "to jest after this fashion, with a man who is eating his dinner?"

"I am not jesting, Monsieur, I tell you the exact truth."

I felt my stomach turn.

"He was a poor peasant," continued my host, "of the village of Fauly, named William Mona. The bear, of which nothing now remains but the little bit there, which you have on your plate, came every night to steal his pears, for these creatures like every thing. However, he attacked in preference a tree loaded with Crassannes. Who would think of such an animal having the tastes of a man, and going to an orchard to select the very pears which were the most melting? Now, unfortunately, the Fauly peasant, too, preferred these Crassannes to all his other fruits. At first he thought it was children who had been pilaging within his enclosure; consequently he took his gun, charged it with coarse kitchen salt, and placed himself in ambush. Towards eleven o'clock, a roaring resounded from the mountain "Ah!" said he, "there is a bear in the neighborhood." Ten minutes after a second roar was heard, but so potent, so close at hand that William thought he should not have time to reach his house, and threw himself down with his face to the ground; having the single hope that the bear might be coming for his pears, and not for himself. In fact, the animal appeared almost immediately at the corner of the orchard; he advanced in a straight line towards the pear tree in question, passed within ten paces of William, nimbly mounted the tree whose branches cracked beneath the weight of his body, and began to make such thorough work, as left it evident that two visits of the sort would render a third useless. When he had satisfied himself, the bear slowly descended, as if sorry to leave any; and repassed close to our huntsman, whose gun, charged with salt, could be of no use on the occasion, and retired quietly to the mountain. All this had occupied nearly an hour, during which the time had appeared longer to the man than to the bear.

However, the man was courageous, and he had softly said, as he saw the bear departing, "Very well, away with you; but this shall not be the end of the matter, we shall meet again." The next day, one of his neighbors, who came to visit him, found him busy sawing into slugs the prongs of a fork. "What are you doing there?" he said to him. "I am amusing myself," answered William.

The neighbor took up the pieces of iron turning them round in his hand like a man who knew what he was about, and after having reflected a moment, "Hold, William," said he, "if you will be frank, you will confess that these little shreds of iron are designed to pierce through a tougher skin than that of the chamois."

"Perhaps so," answered William.

"You know me to be a good fellow," resumed Francis—for that was the neighbor's name. "Come, now if you will agree, the bear shall belong to both of us; two men are better than one."

"That is as it may chance," said William, who continued to saw his third spike.

"Listen," continued Francis, "I will leave the whole of the skin to you alone, and we will share only the premium* and the meat."

"I prefer all," said William.

"But you cannot prevent my hunting for the track of the bear in the mountain, and putting myself in ambush on his course, if I find it."

"You can do as you please." And William, who had finished sawing his three slugs, proceeded, whistling while he did it, to measure a charge of powder double to what is usually put into a carbine.

"You seem to take a good supply of ammunition," said Francis.

"Pretty good! three iron slugs are more sure than one ball of lead."

"They will spoil the skin."

"They will kill more certainly."

"And when do you propose to have the chase?"

"That I will tell you to-morrow."

"I ask for the last time, will you take me with you?"

"No!"

"I give you warning that I am going to hunt for the track."

"Joy go with you."

"Shall we go shares? speak."

"Each for himself."

"Good bye, William."

"Good luck to you neighbor."

And the neighbor, as he was going away, saw William put a double charge of powder into his hunting piece, slip into it the three slugs, and place the weapon in a corner of his shed. At evening, passing again before the house, he perceived William sitting on a bench which was near the door, and tranquilly smoking his pipe. He went to him once more.

"Listen," said he to him, "I bear no ill-will, I have found the track of our beast, and so I have no further need of you. Still I come to propose to you once more that we should go shares."

"Each for himself," said William.

"It was the neighbor himself who told me this the day before yesterday," continued mine host, "and he said to me, 'Figure to yourself, captain'—for I am captain in the militia—'figure to yourself this poor William. I can see him still on his bench, before his house, his arms crossed, smoking his pipe, just as plain as I see you. And then when I think—"

"What next?" asked I, being deeply interested in the narrative, which awakened all my smypathies as a sportsman.

"What next?"—continued my host, the neighbor could not tell how William employed himself in the evening.

At half past ten, his wife saw him take his gun, roll up a sack of grey cloth under his arm, and go out. She dared not ask him where he was going, for William was not the man to give an account of himself to a wife.

Francis, on his part, had actually found the track of the bear; he had followed it to the point where it entered William's orchard, and having no right to place himself in ambush on his neighbor's ground, he took his station in the pine wood, mid-way between the mountain and William's garden.

As the night was tolerably clear he saw him come out of his back door. William advanced as far as the base of a gray rock which had rolled down from the mountain into the middle of his enclosure, and was, at most, not more than twenty paces, from the pear tree; there he stooped, looked about him to see if any person was spying him, unrolled his sack, walked into it, allowing only his head and two arms to come out at the top, and supporting himself against the rock, he was soon, from the color of his sack and the immobility of his body, so blended with the rock, that even the neighbor who knew him to be there, could not distinguish him. A quarter of an hour thus passed in expectation of the bear. At last, a prolonged roaring announced him; five minutes afterwards Francis perceived him.

But either from cuning or because he had discovered the second huntsman, he did not follow his usual route: on the contrary, he described a circuit, and instead of arriving on William's left hand, as he had the evening before, he passed this time on the right, beyond the reach of Francis' weapon but not more than ten pacesbeyond the end of William's musket.

William never budged. You might have thought that he did not even perceive the savage beast, which he had come to lie in wait for, and which seemed to brave him by passing so near him. The bear, on his part, being on the wrong side of the wind seemed unaware of the presence of an enemy, and nimbly continued his course towards the tree. But at the instant when roaring on his hind legs, he embraced the trunk with his fore paws, laying bare his breast, which was no longer protected by his thick shoulders, a rapid flash of light sudenly gleamed against the rock, and the whole valley re-echoed with the report of the double-loaded musket, and the roar uttered by the animal, which was mortally wounded.

There was not, perhaps, a single person in the whole village who did not hear the report of William's gun, and the roar of the bear.

The bear took to flight, repassing without perceiving him, within ten paces of William, who had drawn back his arm and head into the sack, and was confounded afresh with the rock.

The neighbor beheld this scene, supported on his knees and left hand and clasping his carbine with his right, pale and holding his breath—and yet he is an unflinching huntsman. However, he acknowledged to me that at that moment he should have preferred laying in his bed to lying in ambush.

The matter grew much worse when he saw the wounded bear, after having made a circuit, trying to recover his track of the preceding evening, which led straight up to himself. He made the sign of the cross, for our huntsman are devout, commended his soul to God, and satisfied himself that his carbine was in order. The bear was now only fifty paces from him, roaring with pain, stopping to roll himself and bite his side in the spot where it was wounded, and then resuming his course.

Still he drew nearer. He was now only twenty paces distant. In two seconds more he must have dashed against the neighbor's carbine, when he suddenly paused, eagerly snuffed up the wind which blew in the direction of the village, uttered a tremendous roar, and returned to the orchard.

"Take care of yourself, William, take care," cried Francis forward in pursuit of the bear, and forgetting all to think only of his friend; for he plainly saw that if William had not had time to re-load his gun, he was lost; the bear had scented him.

He had not gone ten paces when he heard a cry. This time, it was a human cry, a cry at once of anguish and terror; a cry wherein he who had uttered it had summoned up all the strength of his lungs all his prayers to God, all his demands on men, for succour.

Help—help!!!"

All then was hushed, not even a sigh followed the cry of William.

Francis did not run, he flew. The descent of the ground accelerated his speed The nearer he drew the more distinctly he perceived the monstrous beast moving in the shade, trampling on William's body and tearing it piece-meal.

Francis was not four paces from them, yet the bear was so desperately bent on his prey that he seemed not to have perceived him. Francis dare not fire from the fear of killing William, if he were not already dead, and he trembled so that he could not be sure of his aim He picked up a stone and threw it at the bear.

The animal turned round in fury against his new enemy; they were so close to one another that the bear reared up on his hind legs to crush him in his hug; Francis felt the rubbing of his breast against the stock of his carbine. Mechanically he applied his finger to the trigger, the gun went off.

The bear fell backwards; the ball had pierced his breast and broke the spinal bone. Francis left him to drag himself on his fore-legs, howling and ran to William. He was no longer a man, no longer even a corpse. There were only bones and mangled flesh; the head had been almost entirely devoured.

Seeing then by the movement of lights passing behind the windows that many of the inhabitans of the village were awake, he called, repeatedly, designating the spot where he was. Some of the peasants hastened with their arms, for they heard the cries and the musket-shots. Soon the whole village had assembled in William's orchard.

His wife came with the rest. The scene was horrible. All who were present at it were like infants.

A contribution was raised for her through the valley of the Rhone, which amounted to seven hundred francs. Francis abandoned his premium to her, and sold the skin and flesh of the bear for her benefit. Every one, in short, was eager to succor and befriend her. All the inn keepers likewise agreed to open a subscription list, and if Monsieur would like to set his name to it ——"

"By all means! quick, bring it."

I immediately subscribed my name and added my offering.

*Government bestows a reward of eighty francs for every bear that is killed.

SUMMARY.

REPUTATION.

WHATEVER indifference we affect to show for the good of mankind, every one seeks for esteem, and believes himself more worthy of it, in proportion as he finds himself generally esteemed: he considers the public suffrage as a surety for the high opinion he has of himself. The pretended contempt, therefore, for reputation; and sacrifice said to be made of it to fortune and reflection, is always inspired by the despair of rendering ourselves illustrious; we boast of what we have, and despise what we have not. This is the necessary effect of pride; and we should rebel against it were we not its dupes.—Helvetius.

Diversity of judgment is a natural consequence from human imperfections, which cleave to believers as well as others, and since our capacities, means of information, and diligence, besides many other things, which have an influence on the understanding, are so unequal, is it ever to be expected we shall perfectly agree in our opinions?—Rev. J. Abernethy.

Nothing can be more unphilosophical than to be positive or dogmatical on any subject; and even if excessive skepticism could be maintained, it would not be more destructive to all just reasoning and inquiry. When men are most sure and arrogant, they are commonly the most mistaken, and have thus given reins to passion, without that proper deliberation and suspense which can alone secure them form the grossest absurdities.—Hume.

Character.—How different is the human mind according to the difference of place. In our passions, as in our creeds, we are the mere dependants of geographical situation. Nay, the trifling variation of a single mile will revolutionize the whole tides and torrents of our hearts. The man who is meek, generous, benevolent, and kind, in the country, enters the scene of contest, and becomes forthwith fiery or mean, selfish or stern, just as if the virtuous were only for solitude, and the vices for a city.—Bulwer.

A Secret.—It is a secret known but to few, yet of no small use in the conduct of life, that when you fall into a man's conversation, the first thing you should consider is, whether he has a greater inclination to hear you, or that you should hear him.—Steele.

ONTWA—AN INDIAN STORY.

BY I. M'LELLAN, JR.

Every thing relating to Indian history and traditions, has an increasing interest with us, as we perceive the race of the red-man fast disappearing from the land. As we pass into the depths of our immense Western woods, as we linger by each lonely shore, as we glide across the wide bay in the rocking skiff, it is natural and it is pleasing, to recur to those days when their barbaric tribes, people the land around. The spirit of the departed savage walks around and about us. It haunts the wood and peoples the valley. As we urge onward the gliding shallop, we fancy we again descry the canoe of the Indian, and as we traverse the glades of the forest, we almost expect to see the apparition of the savage warrior start from the leafy thicket—

> And then to mark the lord of all,
> The forest-born, trained to wars,
> Quivered and plumed, and mighty and tall,
> And seamed with glorious scars,
> Walk forth amid his reign to dare
> The wind, and grapple with the bear.

But a few years since, and their calumet of peace was lit, the council-fire shot up its flame in the silence of the woods, or the war-hatchet was dug from the ground, and the grand war-dance caused the hills to resound with the tramp of a thousand warriors, and the war-slogan was sent forth from a thousand martial bosoms. But yesterday, as it were, and the now cultivated hill was overshadowed by their pathless woods, and the plain, whose fertile glebe is now made fruitful by the toil of the husbandman, or is occupied by the rural village, or the great city, was a silent wilderness, disturbed only by the cry of the wild hunter, or the blast of the Indian horn. From the recesses of every forest the Indian lodge sent up its curling smoke; on the green slopes the sound of childish sport was heard; and beneath the sacred tree, the bones of the old forefathers of the hamlet, were long ago committed to their last repose. We are constantly reminded of them by a thousand objects around. With every wild stream is connected associations which awaken in the memory the glory of other days, renewing the deed of the departed warrior, and the freedom of the wild hunter. We often meet with relics of that departed race in our solitary rambles—we discover the lonely cairn where the ashes of distinguished chieftains repose; we meet with little heap of stones which savage affection has erected over the bones of some beloved object; we often find relics of the crumbling lodge or decayed canoe, the huge wooden bowl, the rude pottery, the stone hatchet, the clumsy knife, the flint-pointed arrow, the shell covered shield, the ornamented pouch or moccasin, the bow or battle-axe of tough wood or polished bone, and various similar curiosities which serve to remind us of that untutored people, whose hand so long ago fashioned them.

There is also a great interest thrown around the tales of Indian life and superstition, as they, from time to time reach us. It is well to preserve them, for they will soon be all that remains to us of their departed race. The following wild sketch embodies one of their many superstitions, some of which are still related around the watchfires in the camp of the western hunter.

Ontwa was a youthful 'brave' of the warlike tribe of the Pawnees. This wild and predatory band still spreads terror and desolation over the western prairie, and all who pass among the regions they frequent, whether wild Indian or the little less wild frontier-man and hunter, would do well to avoid the trail of that tribe. They are like the Arab of the desert, a wandering and warlike race, moving their camp from region to region, wherever they may best succeed with their game. The morning sun that shines upon their camp, will, at its setting, see them on their evening march, far removed on their way. There is little fellowship on their part with other tribes. They seem to prefer to be at war and enmity with all men. They go forth to their grand hunting expeditions as to battle, and are always equally well prepared for a foray against the wild herds or the wild Indian.

Ontwa, though young in years, was distinguished for his daring, even among his own heroic people. He was a young chief, whom many of the tribe looked upon as the future head of their race, the one destined to lead them forth to warlike renown and sport, as well as to the successful hunting exploit. He was tall, erect, and of a manly presence, and the maidens of his tribe looked with unfeigned admiration upon their favorite warrior. His dress was as becoming as his form was elegant. A high plume from the wing of the mountain eagle danced on his head, and a crimson tassel of the wild sumach drooped on his brow. He wore a scarlet frock of the skin of the roebuck, embroidered with gay colored silk, and gaudy fringe of stained quills and beads. A bright colored sash, bound firmly around his waist, and highly ornamented leggins and moccasins of the soft hide of the deer, completed his apparel. A crooked knife glittered in his belt. A short rifle, suspended by a bandaleer, swung at his back; and he always bore the fatal bow and arrows of the Pawnee in his hand. It is said by the half breeds and hunters of the west, that the Pawnee can shoot down the buffalo with this formidable weapon, at the distance of three hundred yards, and often drive, at a short distance, the shaft entirely through its body.

It was a bright October evening, and the moon of autumn rode high in the clear sky, shedding down her liquid lustre over all the prairie, and the dim forests that waved around. The camp of the Pawnee had settled in slumber, and the last group around the camp-fires had forsaken the clear cool air that blew over the waste, for the more comfortable shelter of the wigwam. But Ontwa alone was restless and sleepless. He stept forth from the little circle of tents into the bright moonlight, taking his course leisurely along the prairie that skirted the borders of the swift-rolling Arkansas, on whose brink the tribe were encamped. The Indian looked upward at the bending sky above, and gazed intently on the bright luminary that was rolling serenely on her way, amid the white clouds, shifting and flitting around her like billows of foam tossing around the sailing ship. Then turned he to the twinkling stars, shedding down their faint lustre on the landscape, like so many gentle spirits of the benificent air.

"Bright beings," exclaimed the savage, "through how many ages have not your all-seeing eyes looked down upon these haunts of our race, and beheld all the glory and power, when our warriors outnumbered in battle, even your uncounted array. After ye have circled a few more revolutions in your golden orbits, eye will see the last of our race hurried to their grave, and the race of the pale face trampling the dust and ashes of all our perished tribe."

The prairie gleamed whitely in the pure moonbeams, save where a scattered clump of the pine, oak, or the towering cottonwood, cast down their leafy shadows, and mourned as the sighing breeze of the night passed over them. And the blue winding river of the prairie, murmured with a hollow roar in the ear, as it gushed with its steady lapse to its ocean-ward end. But, suddenly, a darkness overspread the face of the sky, and a sob, as of a coming storm, pressed across the prairie, and the river began to lash its shores heavily, and anon the sheeted lightning gleamed like the angry glance from the eye of the spirit, across the gloom, and the deep thunder spoke in the heavens, like the voice of the spirit in his wrath. The old woods rocked and groaned in the blast, and many a tall monarch of the grove was scorched and shivered by the stroke of the ingathering. But Ontwa's stout heart was undismayed, as he stood with folded arms contemplating the sublime scene. But suddenly, a deafening burst of thunder pealed along the sky, and the warrior was struck down senseless to the earth by the descent of the forked lightning.

When he again recovered his consciousness, the tempest had vanished, the muttering thunder was silent, the faint October breeze sighed quietly and mournfully in the faded grass of the prairie, and the rain-drops glistened like diamonds on the dripping foliage, as the round moon once more smiled down upon the scene. He started hastily to his feet, and to his surprize, beheld the unextinguished thunderbolt lying beside him, and near it, a noble steed of the desert, unbridled and unsadled, pawing the earth and tossing the foam from his mouth and flashing his fiery eyes, as if impatient to start forth on its career. He tosed his head proudly to the air, he curved his dark neck and lashed his coal-black sides with his flowing tail, and neighed like the eager war-horse when he hears the sounds of the battle from afar off. The warrior hesitated not to snatch up the deadly bolt, and with one active bound mounted the unsaddled courser. In an instant the desert-born steed was away like a shaft discharged from the Indian's bow. Away to the desert, away to the wilderness with the speed of light, went horse and rider. In a moment the humble roofs of his tribe, the rolling river, and the dark, far extended forest had disappeared from his sight. Over the wide prairie where he had lately hunted the buffalo and the elk and the bear, his fiery steed careered, passing many a bleaching skeleton mouldering on the waste, without fear, or ever swerving from his course. So rapid was their flight, that the seemingly motionless air, disturbed by their onward career, seemed by its resistance to be dashing against them with the force of a whirlwind. The clouds that sailed lazily in the blue vault above them, seemed to be moving towards them on the wings of a tempest. The wild deer, thus suddenly aroused from his couch in the herbage, started before them in affright, believing the spear of the hunter was again at his flanks. But soon the flying elk was overtaken and lost in the distance. The unwieldy buffalo also started from his lair, and his burning eyes flashed with terror and surprize beneath his shaggy brow, as the apparition of the dark steed and his rider, passed by him. The grizzly bear hurried still further into the recesses of the tangled forest as the sound of the passing hoofs disturbed him from his slumber.

The night was now far spent, and still the dizzy speed of his wild steed did not in the least begin to slacken. Miles and miles of the limitless prairie had been left behind, and still he was irresistibly hurried forward. The hot steam poured from the coursers' nostrils like the smoke of a furnace, but no other evidence was there of their long and ardent race. Not a fleck of foam whitened his dark flanks, or swelling chest. Though without saddle or stirrup, the bold rider, accustomed to the chase from childhood, still kept in his seat manfully, but his bow and sheaf had slipped from his hands, and his gun had been lost from his shoulder. With each strong hand firmly grasped in the flowing mane, he still hoped to tame and conquer the wild animal he bestrode.

THE DESERT HORSE AND HIS RIDER.

> Swift, swift they pass!
> O'er the prairie's trampled grass,
> Like a buck upon the sea
> When the wind is fresh and free,
> And the full-distended sail
> Straineth to the rising gale—
> Swifter than the swiftest flight
> Of the sea-bird, when the light
> Of the rosy morning breaks,
> On the Northern isles and lakes,
> Swift, swift they pass!
> Fast, fast, they go!
> Faster than the driving snow,
> When the stormy night sets in,
> And the tempest's mingled din
> Rests on the shepherd's ear,
> Fills his startled dreams with dread
> Faster than the clouds they fly,
> Coursing the tempestuous sky,
> Faster than the waterfall,
> Pouring o'er its rocky wall;
> Faster than the morning beam,
> Than the lightning's livid gleam,
> Fast, fast, they go!
> Swift, swift, they fly!
> Who may watch the fiery speed
> Of that desert-nurtured steed!
> Without bit, and without rein,
> Scouring the unbounded plain!
> Without spur and without whip,
> Who may that fleet race outstrip?
> Not the faintest foaming speck
> Falls upon his outstretched neck
> Not a crimson drop hath dyed
> His unspotted, glistening side;
> Spends his hoof, and flames his eye!
> Swift, swift, they fly!
> Swift, swift they sweep!
> Past they follow deer and roe,
> Past the nimble footed doe,
> Past the branching stag and hart
> From their leafy covert start.
> And the grey wolf's dismal howl,
> And the black bear's sullen growl,
> And the panther's savage yell
> Round the Indian's courser swell.
> But no terror may impede
> That dark courser's headlong speed!

Coldly and slowly broke the ruddy glow of morning in the grey east. The moon and stars had paled their fires on the eye of Ontwa, and he now looked with anxiety for the coming light of the dawn to guide him on his way. During the darkness, his steed had suddenly come upon the lonely banks of a bend in the broad and turbid Arkansas, and the rider hoped that this watery barrier would prove a friendly limit to his career. But the steed paused not a moment on its sandy edge, but boldly plunged in the foaming tide, and stemming gallantly the torrent, soon reached its opposite bank, and held on its way, as before. Many a tangled thicket, interlaced with the twisting vine and the sharp bramble and many a creeping plant, did they toil through. Through many a swamp choked up with rank grass and brittle reeds did they penetrate. Many a broad belt of woodland, where the tall cotton-wood, the branching elm, and the rough oak, intermingled their leafy tops, did they traverse; and often as they dashed madly under their branches, through whose almost impervious screen the moonbeam entered not, save through an occasional gap in the verdant roof, the rider was placed in imminent peril. Often did the wet and heavy foliage that draped their lower limbs brush rudely across his face, and well nigh dash him to the earth. But he seemed to wear a charmed life, for no harm from flood or forest at any time befel him. He would gladly have relinquished his perilous seat, but so swiftly was he hurried along, that he felt it to be impossible so to do. He was fully conscious, when too late, that the steed he bestrode, was the winged Lightning of the Desert, and he knew that no effort of his own could extricate him from its mystic power. He felt that he must submit himself to his fate.

Hour after hour of daylight rolled away, and still the untiring steed and his panting rider pursued their course. The vast tract of the Missouri territory had been traversed, had sunk deeply through many a league of its prairie, and forest, and woodland. The Canadian and the South Fork had been forded by the daring animal, without a moment's hesitation or delay. Many an Indian village had been passed, and many a group of warriors and women had hurried forth from their tents to view in astonishment their flight. The Creek, the Choctaw, and the Cherokee had never before looked on so gallant a race, though themselves daring riders and brave hunters. The hunter in the far-off wilderness, leaned on his rifle or his bow to gaze with unfeigned surprize and admiration on them, as they whirled by him, like a passing shadow. And the fisher, tossing in his birchen bark on the steam, rested on his paddle, while the Lightning-Steed hastened by. Then their path led directly across the great Mexican desert—and the swift waters of the Red River, the Colorados, and the Braxos, were forded in succession. The rider had, at length, won the sun rode high and hot at noon-day, become entirely exhausted and he knew by the faintness that was creeping over his languid frame that he must soon drop from his seat. He was overcome also, with a parching thirst, for he had been unable to moisten his feverish tongue, though he had passed though so many torrents and streams. He never dared loosen his grasp, even for a moment, on the tangled mane of his charger. His gay dress now hung in tatters from his person, torn by many a sharp thorn and briar, and his flesh was bleeding and bruised from its many rude encounterings with tree and thicket. At length they reach the foot of the rugged Rocky Mountains—and the steed still continued his progress—leaping its chasms and and scaling its cliffs. But the strength of the rider failed, and he fell senseless to the earth, in helpless exhaustion. But he soon recovered strength to commence his journey homeward, to the camp of his tribe, which he did not reach until several moons had waxed and waned

THE GROWLER.

Extract of a letter received from a Correspondent at Bermuda, dated January 1st, 1848:

"H. M. Steam-sloop Growler arrived at this place on the 24th December last, from the West Indies in a sickly condition. It appears this vessel left England in July last, on particular service, fitted for carrying liberated Africans from the Coast of Africa to the colonies of British Guiana, and the Island of Trinidad in the West Indies, as free emigrants. She left the colony of Sierra Leone in August, with 470 of those persons on board, bound for Demerara, and having landed them, after some delay, received on board a number of returning emigrants and delegates, and proceeded to Trinidad, where more of a similar description embarked for the Coast of Africa. She touched at Grenada for fuel and water, and went on to Barbadoes for victualling stores, which being completed, started with the intention of making the coast of Africa, but a few days afterwards an accident happening to her machinery, she again tried for the African Coast, arriving at Sierra Leone, with about 150 of the persons above alluded to, on the 23d October. These people having a little civilization, from their residence amongst Europeans, proved very troublesome on board, requiring on some occasions, restraint and coercion; and after landing, a formal complaint was made, through the Emigration Agent, to the Governor, of their treatment by the Commander while on board the Growler, which charges were fully, patiently, and most impartially inquired into by a bench of magistrates in Freetown, Sierra Leone, and pronounced by them to be frivolous, and the punishments resorted to very lenient, considering the gross insubordination exhibited by them, complimenting Captain Pasbury in having been able to support discipline among such an unruly collection, by measures so mild, and censuring the Emigration Agent severely for having occupied their time for three days so unnecessarily, without first ascertaining the nature and correctness of the allegations of the Africans. This inquiry momentarily retarded the refitting and victualling of the ship, and it was not till after a stay of three weeks, lying off Freetown, Sierra Leone, at a most unhealthy season, that she was ready, and received on board the 450 Africans, chiefly newly captured, and proceeded to Cape Palmas, on the Kroo Coast, and an Emigration Agent with his effects, on the 17th November, in the finely decked from the coast she carried such her passengers for the Island of Trinidad, which she reached on the 5th December, and disembarked the ebony freights on the following Soon after the Growler left the Coast of Africa her Captain became unwell, and after having left the 1st December, died with unquenchable black vomit. A certificate Medical Officer, dated the evening, of fever. On arrival at Trinidad about a fourth of the ship's company had been seized with African fever, and new cases occurred daily. The condition of the ship became so alarming as to require the medical officers, Drs. Robert M'Crae, and Gilmore, to make a requisition to the Captain to proceed as speedily as possible to a more northern climate, which was immediately approved of by the Captain of the Vesuvius, the senior officer, and the medical officers, and she left Port of Spain on the 8th December, touching at Barbadoes on the 15th, and arrived at the former place on the 24th. Before this time another fatal disease had occurred, and nearly 60 officers and ship's crew had been attacked, many of whom died, the number. In this helpless condition, the Growler arrived in Grassy Bay, off Ireland Island, and was communicated with by Dr. Gunn, of the Royal Naval Hospital, who reported her condition to the Admiral Sir Francis W. Austin, K.C.B., Commander-in-chief on the North American and West Indian station, when she was placed under quarantine, and ordered round to the dockyard, and proceed to Port Island, one of the Bermudas not inhabited, but having buildings in connection with the Government Hospital, for the purpose of accommodating the crews of her Majesty's vessels under similar circumstances. On the island the crew were landed and lodged in the houses appropriated for them, and in a few days afterwards the fever ceased to rage. The safe arrival of the Growler at this place must be a cause of unfeigned thankfulness to Him, Providence was on board, and a subject for congratulation by every humane person who learns that on her arrival here three out of the four engineers were on the sick list, the duty being performed by the junior, a youth of 20 years of age, himself convalescing, and the day afterwards incapacitated for duty, and still continues so. Mr M'Ausland, the master, and Mr Imrie, the second master, were the only commissioned officers doing duty and the former was attacked after feeling unwell for several days, the following morning, and unable to superintend the mooring of the vessel; which duty devolved on Mr. Imrie, second master who, with two master's assistants, one of them only six months at sea, were the only executives off the sick list, and Mr. Imrie and the senior master's assistant have themselves recently recovered from the disease— the acting commander, boatswain, and carpenter still unfit for duty. The decision and judgment displayed on this very trying occasion by the medical officers of the ship, in so promptly recommending an immediate removal from the tropics, and thereby averting a fearful loss of life, entitles them to much credit and will no doubt meet the ready approbation of all who know the recent melancholy history of H. M. steam sloop Eclair, and other ships in similar circumstances. The duties of these officers in the particular service on which the Growler has been employed especially in connection with the negro passengers, are reported to have been of a most harassing, difficult, and disgusting nature, much sickness always prevailing among them, arising out of the privation and cruelty experienced by the poor creatures previous to their capture by her Majesty's cruisers on the coast of Africa, and from which they have not had time to recover before again embarking for the West Indies; great numbers having confirmed disease quite beyond the power of remedial means, are still to them objects of painful interest and professional exertions. On the recent voyage to the West Indies with emigrants, their services are reported to have been of a remarkably onerous and unpleasant description, nearly 300 of the passengers having been under treatment for bowel complaints, to which, it seems, they are very much disposed, and are a frequent cause of mortality among them. While, with unremitting attention, they were endeavouring to alleviate the condition of these helpless wretches, labouring under this offensive affection, imagine their unenviable and truly responsible position to find their captain, brother officers, and ship mates prostrated before them, the victims to that fatal scourge to Europeans—African fever. This new calamity stimulated to greater exertion, tremendously much extended, and we are informed that some days before their arrival at this place, they were [illegible] to relieve each other [illegible] and mustering in the waist [illegible] themselves being [illegible] the subjects of indisposition [illegible] sick, there were [illegible] to the consoling flow [illegible] enabled under such [illegible] from tremendous impositions [illegible] them, [illegible] fitting themselves [illegible] fever-fit [illegible] many of the officers. Many may not forget a grateful acknowledgement to Him unseen Power who gives strength in time of need, and may their arduous services, blessed by kind Providence, not be overlooked or forgotten by those under whose immediate direction they are serving and who have the means of giving merit its due consideration.

"To the friends and relations of those belonging to that unfortunate ship, it will be some satisfaction to know that the fever had ceased to spread among the few remaining staff-officers in her since landing on the shore, and hopes were entertained that no other case would occur. The Commander-in-Chief has appointed the acting order, as commander which I [illegible] Coull has given home for the passage of Captain Pasbury and Lieutenant W. K. Hall, of H.M.S. Vindictive, had been appointed in his place, and had joined her on the 29 December. The officer acted as commander of the flag ship on the West India station for several months lately, and is highly spoken of for zeal, activity, and professional attainment, and under his judicious and considerate superintendence and direction the ship is [illegible] to be cleaned and purified previous to again going to sea, a duty by no means free from danger, and requiring great discretion in the present condition of the ship's company, and which, no doubt, will receive that promotion his merits and long service are well known to deserve. Soon after Lieutenant Coull had assumed the command of the ship, he was unfortunately seized with illness, which had confined him to bed since, and was expect would ultimately require his removal from active service for a time. During this interval, and when the disease was at its worst, the responsible duties of the ship rested on Mr. M'Ausland, acting master whose [illegible] zeal, it is stated, was above all praise, and who is before mentioned, ultimately, [illegible] of was relieved from the disease, when Mr. Imrie second master, became commander. M. M'Ausland's conduct as an officer, and as navigator, has been [illegible] has acted as master of a frigate to the service, and is considered highly deserving of confirmation in the rank. The Growler was commissioned in April last, at Woolwich, for negro emigration service, and was reported only to be an experimental trial of steam in that service for a year. Some of the press in England, I believe, at the time prognosticated its failure, which it must be allowed, is too correctly realised, she having arrived on the Coast six months ago, and has not yet performed two voyages from that place and back again; in fact, from the numerous accidents to which a steamer is subject, and the difficulty sometimes of procuring fuel and other necessary delays, make it highly problematical if any advantage is derived as regards the number of voyages performed, and there can be no comparison as to expense. The West Indian colonists will therefore most probably find, on the termination of the experiment, that it has been rather an expensive and by no means a very successful one, as far as it has hitherto been carried, and should the scheme of emigration be persevered in, which it is essential to the West Indian interest to do, sailing vessels must be employed.

Murderers of Wm Dedrick.

It has been ascertained who the murderers of the late Wm. Dedrick are. He was cruelly butchered on Factory Island last year, and until now, the murderers have escaped suspicion. The chief who was accused of the murder, and who has been in custody in Bassa for some time, divulges the whole affair of the murder, and gives the names of the murderers and of their chief. Many circumstances have transpired, which abundantly confirm the testimony of the imprisoned chief. Gillo Pro, is the name of the chief—his town is about eight miles from Bassa Cove—he mournfully confessed the murder of his boys to the officer who went to apprehend them, but refused to deliver them up; and proposed to talk over the matter in the country at some convenient town. The officer insisted on arresting the murderers, and attempted to seize them, when Gillo threatened to shoot him, the moment he put his hand on them. The officer did not arrest them.

The surrounding chiefs are disgusted at the audacity of Gillo, and are persuading him to submit and beg, the authorities have given him to understand, that the murderers must be delivered up.

It is now more than two months since we have seen an American cruiser in our waters. We believe there are several vessels under the American flag, fully equipped for the slave trade, and unless very closely watched, will succeed in taking off from the Gallenas, large cargoes of slaves.

The officers in Marshall, took, a few days ago, a large canoe, and six slaves, which had landed at Cape Mount. The owners of the canoe and slaves, succeeded in making their escape.

In our last number we gave an interesting communication of the Rev. W. H. Payne, of the Border of Prince George Coin, of Grand Cape Mount. In that communication, it will be remembered that Mr. P. mentioned that several circumstances had been reported, as having transpired on the journey of the Prince to the town, where he was murdered, and which, according to the belief of his friends, bodes him no good. We have, for the gratification of our readers, obtained a history of the circumstances referred to, and now give them in the words of our intelligent correspondent.

"It is said that Prince Coin left his town for the beach by the way of the river. In making his way from his town to the river side, he met two females with a live animal, which they said had fallen from the top of a tree, into the arms of one of them. At his request, they turned the animal loose."

"In his journeying down the river, the surface of the water on one side of the canoe, at one time was covered with blood, while on the other side, not a particle of blood was to be seen. A fish was seen floating on the surface of the water with all of the entrails out, and the body not injured."

"An Alligator, it is said, caught the end of one of the paddles in his mouth, and would not loose his hold until a bottle of spirits was thrown into the water as a present to him. When they had gotten within sight of the town at which he was expected it is said he canoe stood still for some considerable time, notwithstanding the application of paddles &c. to get her ahead."

"These circumstances, I am informed, were considered by those who accompanied him, as the forerunners of the misfortune which befel him. They, however, refrained from admonishing him until the last moment, when it was witnessed, when they began to beg and beseech him to return to his town, but he refused and hurried on to his end, and to the winding up of his career which has made many a son and daughter of distress."

We learn that the British Parliament have made a munificent grant to the Hon. Captain Denman, and others who were present at the destruction of the barracoons at the Gallenas in 1840, for the liberation of the slaves on that occasion.

Peter Harris, one of the principal chiefs in Grand Bassa, is now engaged in having a convocation of the chiefs, to consult on the best plan for compelling Gillo Pro to deliver up the murderers of the late William Dedrick. The chiefs are aware of the importance of living on the most amicable terms with the government, and we feel quite certain that they will do all in their power to have the murderers delivered up to the authorities.

Barque Nehemiah Rich.

On the 19th, inst. this fine vessel, anchored in our harbor. She had a passage of six weeks from Boston. Rev. A. F. Russel came passenger in her. The N. Rich left this port on the 4th, April last, for the U. S. via, West Indies, with a number of our distinguished citizens as passengers, among whom, was President Roberts. We learn by her that the Liberia Packet made her passage to the U. S. in 26 days.

AM: COL: SOCIETY V. S. REP: OF LIBERIA.

We are informed that the President Commissioned Messrs B. R Wilson and James S. Payne, Commissioners, to arrange the relations between the American Colonization Society and the Republic of Liberia—and that they have conferred with the commissioners on the part of the Society. The result of the conference, we learn, is highly honorable to both parties.

President Roberts.

The "New York Tribune," July 11th, says that" President Roberts of the Republic of Liberia, being in the city; at the suggestion of his Honor the Mayor, a committee was last night appointed, from the Board of Aldermen, to confer with the distinguished visitor, and afford him such assistance in the knowledge of our institutions as may be required."

What Next.

The "True American" says "That a young man in Boston, born with a hair lip, and without palate, has been fitted by a dentist of that city, with an artificial roof of the mouth, palate and front teeth, not only hiding the deformity but restoring, or rather creating a faculty of articulating."

MISCELLANEOUS.

An Irishman, who had often expressed his wife's ill-humor, opposed her with no other weapon but silence: whereupon a friend told him "it was easily seen that you are afraid of your wife." "It not she that I am afraid of," replied the husband, it is the noise."

A very talkative lady received a visit from a gentleman, who was introduced to her as a man of great taste and learning. She, in order to compliment him, displayed her knowledge and wit, with an increasing rapidity. Being asked her opinion of her new acquaintance, she said she never was more charmed with the company of any man. A general laugh ensued; the gentleman was dumb, and had kept up the conversation only with nods and smiles.

Moderation.—A Scotch parson once preached a long sermon against dram drinking, a vice very prevalent in his parish, and from report, said he was not himself wholly exempt.

"Whatever ye do, brethren, do it with moderation, and, above all, be moderate in dram-drinking. When you get up, indeed, you may take a dram, and another just before breakfast, and, perhaps on the after but dinna be always dram-drinking. If you are out in the morn, you may just brace yourself up with another dram, and perhaps take another before luncheon, and some, I fear, take one after, which is no so very blameable, but dinna be always dram—dram-dramming away. Naebody can scruple for one afore dinner; and when the desert is brought in, and after it's ta'en away: one perhaps, one or it may be two, in the course of the afternoon, just to keep ye fra drousying and snozzling: but dinna be always dram dram-dramming. Afore tea and after tea, and between tea and supper, and before and after supper, it is no more than right and good, but let me caution ye brethren do no be always be dram-dreaming.

And when ye start for bed, and ween ye'er ready to pop into it, and perhaps when you wake in the night, to take a dram twa is no more than a christian may lawfully do; but, brethren, let me caution you not to drink more than I have mentioned, or may be ye may pass the bounds of moderation!"

Helm a-Lee.—A sailor taking a walk in the fields, perceiving a mad bull, rapidly advancing towards him, evidently with no good intentions as to his person. "Helm-a lee, messmate," he cried out at the very top of his voice, "helm a-lee." The mad bull, however, probably not comprehending his injunction, did not pay it implicit obedience, but speedily levelled his worthy adviser with the grass. "There you stupid," said the tar, as he raised himself, more in sorrow than in anger on his elbow, "Did'nt I tell you, you'd run a foul o'me.

H. Majesty's Brig "Ranger," while on her passage from England to the Coast of Africa, for the suppression of the slave trade, touched at St Nicholas, one of the Cape de Verd Islands, with mails for that place, but unfortunately struck on a rock and was compelled to land every thing on the island. While in that condition, H. M. Brig "Pantaloon" on a similar passage from England, touched at the same place, and found the "Ranger" with a hold in her bottom. The Commanders of both vessels thought it advisable to heave the "Ranger" down and repair her damages: but while heaving her down, she filled and sunk in 13 fathoms water.

The Pantaloon immediately left for Sierra Leone via. Cape Mount to communicate the disaster to Commander W. B. Moneypenny, of H. M. S Sea-Lark, and senior officer of the Sierra Leone division.

It is hoped that Sir Charles Hotham, K. C. B will endeavor to extricate the "Ranger" from her present position, as he is an officer that is fully competent to undertake such an enterprise.

Slavers Captured!—There have been captured by H. B. M. cruisers, nine slave vessels off Gallenas Sea-Bar and Gallabah.

Her Majesty's Frigate "Amphitrite" captured, during her stay in the Bight of Benin, six slavers, three of which contained nine hundred and seventy-three slaves.

The "Dolphin"—Brigantine in the Bight of Benin, captured in a few months five slavers—two of which had on board eight hundred and seventy six slaves.

H. M. Steam frigate "Penelope," Commodore Sir Charles Hotham, K. C. B. captured a large Brazilian steamer, on the south coast, fully equipped for the slave trade.

An authentic account of the desperate capture of a Brazilian Felutcha which showed fight to the boats' crew of Her M Sloop Philomel, while off Cape Mount—West Coast of Africa, 14th, January, 1848

On the fourteenth day of January Eighteen hundred and Forty Eight,
While we were cruising off Cape Mount a sail appeared in sight;
Immediately our boats were manned and sent away in chase;
With jolly tars and Royal Marines the stranger for to face.

Our noble tars, they pulled away with courage bold and brave;
The boats dash'd o'er the foaming sea and over every wave,
And when they got within the wake, she fired at them a gun;
Thinking to make our gallant tars away from them to run.

Our lads, they gave three hearty cheers and rallied up long side,
And boarded the felucca well, and soon brought down their pride
Our musket and cutlasses too were used not in vain,
For many of the savage crew on their own decks were slain.

Mercy by some was soon implored, while others cool were shot,
Who tried to massacre our lads upon the Felucca.
Our gallant boys soon made them yield; their arms they took away,
And the dead that lay upon their decks, they cast into the sea.

The "Philomel," she was becalmed, distant two leagues or more,
Yet we could see the flash of guns, their cannons loud did roar,
Our Ensign soon was to her Peak all waving in the air;
When we on board saw this, we gave three hearty cheers hurrah

Success to the little "Philomel," likewise her gallant crew,
When we our enemies engage, we'll fight like Britons true,
We will not flinch no not an inch, tho' cannons loud should roar,
And musket balls or pistol shot should on our heads then pour.

And now to wives, sweethearts and friends we'll drink a health a piece,
Trusting if spared, one day to speak with thee some happiness,
And when our money's all done, we'll go to sea for more,
Perchance it may be some one's lot on Africs bold shore.

There's one thing more I have to say before I close my tale,
One of our Tars a gallant youth in the fray a victim fell,
The truth of this each can assert which makes me thus so bold.
It is a task I've done my best the truth to you I've told.

OBITUARY.

Messrs Editors:—Sirs, allow me to announce, by request, for insertion in your catalogue of obituaries, the melancholy information of the demise of Mrs. Florah Davis, late consort of the Rev. Aaron P. Davis, of Bassa Cove, Grand Bassa County.

Mrs. D's. health has been on the decline for about four years; and oft, ere the fatal moment which announced her eternal exit from time, had awful forbordings of the dread catastrophe, seized upon the partner of her mortal life, as her disease would vacillate from apparent improvement to increased retrogade, which threatened quick dissolution.

He was ever apprehensive of the sundering of the silken cord which bound the transitory things of time close about his heart, and made him anxious for a protraction of life's joys. Thus did the bereaved long hover around that clay tenement which contained his all of earthly good, with fevered anxiety, to retain if possible the fluttering spirit yet longer in its visible cage, until the morning of the ninth, inst., about 8 A. M. when the sanctified soul, like an anxious bird, fluttered forth eluding the most anxious grasps of her heart-stricken partner; and winged its celestial flight to the realms of eternal day. There to await that re-union of beatified spirits, which knows no bounds; leaving behind a large circle of friends and acquaintances to mourn their loss.

"Happy soul thy days are ended,
All thy mourning days below,
Go by angelic guards attended,
To thy blessed redeemer go."

Yours,

ENGLAND AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

To an enlightened spectator, removed from the influence of party prejudices, and untainted by the nostrums of political doctors, the present policy of England, with regard to the slave-trade, must appear highly inconsistent, if not totally irreconcilable. Aware of the exalted philanthropy which prompted her to denounce the slave trade as an abomination and slavery itself as a foul blot in the political system of any civilize community, he will regard with unmixed admiration the disinterested sacrifices she has made in proof of her sincerity. Glancing back to the commencement of the present century he will remark the efforts England made, during a crisis in which her own existence as a nation was at stake, to shield the negro race from the most revolving of all persecutions, and to prepare for it a happier destiny. Throughout the whole of that eventful period, and at times when self-preservation might well have excused her of exoteric liberality, he will observe that the generous design was never forgotten nor relinquished. She clung to it, and whilst even a portentous foe was hovering in sight of her shores, still found opportunity to consult the interests of a people as distinct from her political cares as they were alien to her in blood. When peace came, and the success of her arms, conferred on her the power to dictate its conditions the claims of the Africans were prominently brought forward, and through her instrumentality the revolving opression under which they had so long groaned, was placed under the ban of assembled Europe. Nor was this all: not content with a general anathema, she hastened to support it by the arm which had hitherto protected her from every assault, and carried her triumphantly through every efficacy. A blockade of the African coast was formed, money was lavished, and lives sacrificed in the hot warfare against the enemies of our common humanity. And if the spectator, contemplating these efforts, begins to think how unavailing they seem to be, will nevertheless, respect the singleness of purpose, and the ultra-perseverance which sometimes to employ them up to the present point.

But if not too much absorbed in tracing this long series of executive efforts, the spectator turns to examine the collaterally measures which he naturally supposes will be so shaped as to afford support to the main object in view, he cannot fail to be struck with amazement and concern. Disturbing forces which he had never reckoned upon will now be seen to develope themselves, and, re-acting upon career which was previously straightforward and palpable will be found to give it an intricacy and devoutness beyound his powers to comprehend. Free Trade; the great panacea of the day; and which in its proper spirit, we could not be understood to underrate, steps in at the eleventh hour, and by a curious contradiction proclaims freedom of interchange to the materials which slavery has produced. At first sight this may appear a venial error but it requires comparatively little reflection to discover how deleterious it will prove in its effects. For, setting aside the questionable morality of such a measure, there is not another which could have been chosen so admirably fitted to neutralise all England has done for the slave trade, or to stultify whatever she may yet be inclined to do.

It is somewhat remarkable that at a time when the laws which regulate commerce are so freely canvassed, and when they are professed to be so clearly understood, that the very obvious one which is said to regulate the supply by the demand, should have been so unaccountably overlooked. When the sugar bill was passed, did the supporters of that measure flatter themselves that the slave-holders of Cuba and the Brazils would manumit their bondsmen, and abandon their plantations when it was announced to them that hence-forth they were to meet on equal terms with the free grower in the markets of Great Britain? Did they suppose that a system of slavery which existed in spite of fiscal prohibitions, was to languish so soon as those prohibitions were removed? It is much to be feared that their sagacity prevented them from committing any such folly, and that the equalizing of the products of slavery with those of free labour was nothing else than an offering at the altar of that Moloch—Free Trade. There is a degree of absurdity in the whole proceedings connected with the slave question, at which one is at once inclined to smile, and yet feel provoked. First we have the enlarged view of economical legislation which scorns all exceptions, breaks down every distinction, and brings all to the same commercial level. While this is being enacted, our approbation is courted by dazzling prospects of mercantile prosperity, and our opposition silenced by being placed in invidious antagonism with the interests of the poor. Now, the cottage supersedes the cabana and the stripes and groans of the negro are forgotten in anticipating the smile of the frugal housewife at home. Presently the scene changes, but the actors remain, and, with a versatility which does their ingenuity credit, they enter upon the question of the slave trade. Another million of money is demanded, and another hecatomb of lives prepared; the irresistible impulse given to the slave trade by the indulgence vouchsafed to slave-grown produce, is sedulously avoided, and the gaping nation is cozened into compliance by the apocryphal reports of interested underlings and by the grotesque mummeries of treaties solemnly ratified by native potentates, whose obsequiousness may be bough at any time by a box of Birmingham trinkets, and whose ideas of moral obligation are as clear, perhaps, as their notions of the steamengine.

The result of this double-dealing cannot long be concealed. Already its effects are beginning to show in the increased briskness of the slave trade. Within the last ten months of which we have inteligence, no less than twenty-three slavers have been captured, and all accounts tend to confirm the fact, that the harvest for the British cruisers is just commencing. But rich as their harvest may be, it will be as nothing, compared with that of the planters of Cuba and Brazil; the languishing condition of the latter country more especially, will receive an impulse which will fill the pockets of its planters with gold, and populate its present vast solitudes with slaves. The future political economist, reflecting on the Janus-like policy which has of late been evinced by English statemen, regarding the slave question may think it worth his while to weigh how much the useless sacrifice of life and treasure on the coast of Africa was counterbalanced by the equivalent of cheap sugar, and an increased demand for coloured calicos and slave-irons from Brazil.

POETRY.

From the New York Weekly Tribune.

TO A LITTLE GIRL AT HER MUSIC LESSON.

BY G. G. FOSTER.

"I CAN'T keep time!" ah, silly elf!
That lesson thou wilt learn
In sadness and despair ere Time
Keeps thee within his urn.

"I can't keep time!" Nor can the gay
And laughing sons of earth,
Who light their passage to the tomb
With song and joyous mirth.

The great—the wise—the proud—could they "Keep time," right glad were they:
But fleeting years have taught how swift
Time flies away, away!

And thou, thy little fingers plying,
Can'st not "keep time," forsooth!
Nay, little one, he runneth fast,
As fleeteth by thy youth.

Keep time thou can'st not—yet observe
This easier lesson well:
Mark time thou may'st and if thou dost
A pleasant tale 'twill tell;

For thou hast in thy young heart stored
A wilderness of dreams
Which, if thou mark'st him, Time will shower
Round thee in golden beams.

Each note thou wanderest o'er but rings
The alarum of some hope,
Which lieth hidden unto thee
In Time's Kaleidoscope.

Then mark time well, and from thy brow
The shade of sadness fling,
And each unskillful note of thine
In time with joy shall ring.

MISCELLANEOUS.

AN EXECUTION.

In Blackwood's Magazine, is an article, entitled Le Revenant, purporting to be written by a man who has been hanged and is now alive The writer confesses that he was guilty of the act for which he suffered—forgery, and states the particulars of his arrest, committal to Newgate for trial, and his conviction of the crime at the Old Bailey Sessions for 1826. He then proceeds to describe what were his sensations after receiving the awful sentence of death After painting, in touching colors, the interview he had with Elizabeth C——, to whom he was strongly attached, he thus proceeds with his narrative:

"It was four o'clock in the afternoon when Elizabeth left me; and when she departed, it seemed as if my business in this world was at an end. I could have wished, then and there, to have died on the spot; I had done my last act, and drank my last draught in life. But, as the twilight drew in, my cell was cold and damp, and the evening was dark and gloomy; and I had no fire, nor any candle, although it was in the month of January, nor much covering to warm me, and by degrees my spirits weakened, and my heart sunk at the desolate wretchedness of everything around me; and gradually—for what I write now shall be the truth—the thoughts of Elizabeth, and what would be her fate, began to give way before a sense of my own situation This was the first time—I cannot tell the reason why—that my mind had ever fixed itself upon the trial that I had, within a few hours, to go through; and, as I reflected on it, a terror spread over me almost in an instant, as though it were that my sentence was just pronounced, and that I had not known, really and seriously, that I was to die before; I had eaten nothing for twenty-four hours There was food, which a religious gentleman who visited me had sent from his own table, but I could not taste it, and when I looked at it, strange fancies came over me It was dainty food, not such as was served to the prisoners in the jail. It was sent to me because I was to die to-morrow! and I thought of the beasts of the field, and the fowls of the air, that were pampered for slaughter. I felt that my own sensation were not as they ought to be at this time; and I believed that, for awhile, I was insane. A sort of dull, humming noise, that I could not get rid of, like the buzzing of bees, sounded in my ears. And though it was dark, sparks of light seemed to dance before my eyes; and I could recollect nothing. I tried to say my prayers, but could only recollect a word here and there, and then it seemed to me as if these were blasphemies that I was uttering; I don't know what they were—I cannot tell what I said; and then on a sudden, I felt as though all this terror was useless, and that I would not stay there to die; and I jumped up, and wrenched at the bars of my cell window with a force that bent them, for I felt as if I had the strength of a lion. And I felt all over the lock of my door, and tried the door with my shoulder—though I knew it was plated with iron, and heavier than that of a church; and I groped about the very walls, and into the corners of my dungeon—though I knew very well, if I had my senses, that it was all of solid stone; three feet thick; and that, if I could have passed through a crevice smaller than the eye of a needle, I had no chance of escaping. And, in the midst of all this exertion, a faintness came over me as though I had swallowed poison; and I had just power to reel to the bed-place, where I sank down, as I think, in a swoon; but this did not last—for my head swam round, and the cell seemed to turn with me, and I dreamed—between sleeping and waking—that it was midnight, and that Elizabeth had come back as she promised, and that they refused to admit her. And I thought it snowed heavily, and that the streets were all covered with it; as if with a white sheet, and that I saw her dead—lying in the fallen snow—and in the darkness—at the prison gate! When I came to myself, I was struggling and breathless In a minute or two, I heard St. Sepulchre's clock go ten; and knew it was a dream that I had had. The chaplain of the prison came without my sending. He exhorted me solemnly "to think no more of cares or troubles in this world, but to bend my thoughts upon that to come, and to try to reconcile my soul to Heaven; trusting that my sins, though they were heavy, under repentance, might have hope of mercy". When he was gone, I "do find myself, for a little while, more collected; and I sat down again on the bed, and tried seriously to commune with myself, and prepare myself for my fate. I recalled to my mind that I had but a few hours more, at all events, to live—that there was no more hope on earth of escaping—and that it was at least better that I should die decently like a man. Then I tried to recollect all the tales that I had ever heard about death by hanging—that it was said to be the sensation of a moment—to give no pain—to cause the extinction of life instantaneously—and so on, to twenty other strange ideas. By degrees, my head began to wander and grow unmanageable. I put my hands tightly to my throat, as though to try the sensation of strangling—I felt my arms at the place where the cord would be tied. I went through the fastenings of the rope—the tying of the hands together; the thing that I felt most averse to, was the white cap muffled over my eyes and face. If I could avoid that, the rest was not so very horrible! in the midst of these fancies, a numbness seemed to creep over my senses. The giddiness that I had felt gave way to a dull stupor, which lessened the pain that my thoughts gave me, though I still went on thinking. The church clock rang midnight; I was sensible of the sound, but it reached me indistinctly—as though coming through many close doors, or from a far distance. By and by, I saw the objects before my mind less and less clearly—then only partially—then they were gone together. I fell asleep.

"I slept until the hour of execution. I was seven o'clock on the next morning when a knocking at the door of my cell awoke me. I heard the sound as though in my dreams, for some moments before I was fully awake; and my first sensation was only the dislike which a weary man feels at being roused; I was tired, and I wished to doze on. In a minute after, the bolts on the outside of my dungeon was drawn; a turnkey, carrying a small lamp, and followed by the master of the jail and the chaplain, entered; I looked up; a shudder like the shock of electricity—like a plunge into a bath of ice—ran through me; one glance was sufficient. Sleep was gone as though I had never slept—even as I never was to sleep again—I was conscious of my situation! 'R——,' said the master to me, in a subdued but steady tone, 'it is time for you to rise." The chaplain asked me how I had passed the night, and proposed that we should join in prayer. I gathered myself up, and remained seated on the side of my bed-place. My teeth chattered, and my knees knocked together, in despite of myself. It was barely day-light yet; and, as the cell door stood open, I could see into the small paved court beyond; the morning was thick and gloomy, and a slow but settled rain was coming down. 'It is half past 7 o'clock, R——!' said the master. I just muttered an entreaty to be left alone till the last moment I had thirty minutes to live.

"I tried to make another observation when the master was leaving the cell; but this time I could not get the words out; my tongue stuck to the roof of my mouth, and my speech seemed gone; I made two desperate efforts, but it would not do—I could not utter. When they left me, I never stirred from my place on the bed I was benumbed with the cold, probably from the sleep, and at the unaccustomed exposure, and I sat crouched together, as it were, to keep myself warmer, with my arms folded across my breast, and my head hanging down, shivering; and my body felt as if it were such a weight to me, that I was unable to move it, or stir. The day now was breaking, yellow and heavily; and the light stole by degrees into my dungeon, showing me the damp stone walls, and desolate, dark paved floor; and strange as it was, with all that I could do, I could not keep myself from noticing these trifling things, though perdition was coming upon me the very next moment I noticed the lamp which the turnkey had left on the floor, and which was burning dimly, with a long wick, being clogged with the chill and bad air, and I thought to myself—even at that moment—that it had not been trimmed since the night before. And I looked at the bare, naked, iron bed-frame that I sat on; and the heavy studs on the door of the dungeon; and at the scrawls and writing upon the wall, that had been drawn by former prisoners; and I put my hand to my own pulse, and it was so low that I could hardly count it. I could not feel—though I tried to make myself feel it—that I was going to die. In the midst of this, I heard the chimes of the chapel clock begin to strike; and I thought—Lord take pity on me, a wretch!—it could not be three-quarters after seven yet! The clock went over the three-quarters; it chimed the fourth quarter, and struck eight They were in my cell before I perceived them They found me in the place, and in the posture, as they had left me

"What I have further to tell will lie in a very small compass; my recollections are very minute up to this point, but not at all so close as to what occurred afterwards. I scarcely recollect very clearly how I got from my cell to the press-room. I think two little withered men, dressed in black, supported me. I know I tried to raise when I saw the master and his people come into my dungeon; but I could not.

"In the press-room were two miserable wretches that were to suffer with me; they were bound with their arms behind them, and their hands together and were lying upon a bench, hard by, until I was ready A meagre-looking old man, with thin white hair, who was reading to one of them came up, and said something—'That we would embrace'—I did not distinctly hear what it was "The great difficulty that I had was to keep from falling I had thought that these moments would have been all of fury and horror, but I felt nothing of this; but only a weakness, as though my heart—and the very floor on which I stood—was sinking under me. I could just make a motion, that the old white haired man should leave me; and some one interfered and sent him away. The pinioning of my hands and arms was then finished; and I heard an officer whisper to the chaplain that 'all was ready.' As we passed out, one of the men in black held a glass of water to my lips; but I could not swallow.

"This was the last moment—but one—of full perception, that I had in life. I remember our beginning to move forward through the long arched passages which led from the press-room to the scaffold. I saw the lamps that were still burning, for the daylight never entered there; I heard the quick tolling of the bell, and the deep voice of the chaplain, reading as he walked before us:

"I am the resurrection and the life, saith the Lord; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, shall live. And though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God!"

"It was the funeral service—the order for the grave—the office for those that were senseless and dead—over us, the quick and the living.

"I felt once more—and saw! I felt the transition from these dim, close, hot, lamp-lighted subterraneous passages to the open platform, and steps at the foot of the scaffold, and to-day, I saw the immense crowd blackening the whole area of the street below me. The windows of the shops and house opposite, to the fourth story, choked with gazers. I saw St Sepulchre's church through the yellow fog in the distance; had heard the pealing of its bell. I recollect the cloudy, misty morning; the wet that lay upon the scaffold—the huge dark mass of buildings, the prison itself, that rose beside, and seemed to cast a shadow over us—the bold, fresh breeze that, as I emerged from it, broke upon my face. I see it all now—the whole horrible landscape is before me. The scaffold—the rain—the faces of the multitude—the people clinging to house tops—the smoke that beat heavily downwards from the chimneys—the waggons filled with women, staring at the inn-yard opposite—the hoarse low roar that ran through the gathering crowd as we appeared. I never saw so many objects at once, so plainly and distinctly in all my life, as at that one glance; but it lasted only for an instant.

"From that look, and from that instant, all that followed is a blank. Of the prayers of the chaplain—of the fastening of the fatal noose—of the putting on of the cap which I had so much disliked—of my actual execution and death, I have not the slightest atom of recollection. But that I know such occurrences must have taken place, I should not have the smallest consciousness that they ever did so. I read in the daily newspapers an account of my behavior at the scaffold—that I conducted myself decently, but with firmness; of my death—that I seemed to die almost without a struggle. Of any of these events I have not been able, by any exertion, to recal the most distant remembrance. With the first view of the scaffold, all my recollection ceases. The next circumstance which—to my perception—seems to follow, is the having awoke, as it from sleep, and found myself in a bed, in a handsome chamber, with a gentleman (as I first opened my eyes) looking attentively at me. I had my senses perfectly, though I did not speak at once. I thought directly, that I had been reprieved at the scaffold, and had fainted. After I knew the truth, I thought that I had a confused recollection, of having heard, or fancied, myself—as in a dream—in some strange place, lying naked, and with a mass of figures floating about before me; this idea certainly never presented itself to me until I was informed of the fact that it had occurred.

"The accident to which I owe my existence will have been divined! My condition is a strange one! I am a living man; and I possess certificates both of death and burial. I know that a coffin filled with stones, and with my own name upon the plate, lies buried in the church-yard of St Andrew's, Holborn; I saw from a window, the undressed hearse that carried it; I was witness to my own funeral. These are strange things to see. My dangers, however, and I trust, my crime, are over forever. Thanks to the bounty of the excellent individual, whose benevolence has recognised the service which he did me for a claim upon him. I am married to the woman, whose happiness and safety proved my last thought—so long as reason remained with me in dying. And I am about to sail on a fair voyage, which is only a sorrowful one—that it parts me forever from my benefactor." —Cummings, Evening Telegraphic Bulletin

JEFFERSON'S "BOOK OF KINGS."

"Louis XVI. was a fool of my own knowledge, and in despite of the answers made for him on his trial. The King of Spain was a fool; and of Naples the same. They passed their lives hunting, and despatched two couriers a week a thousand miles, to let each other know what game they had killed the last preceding day. The King of Sardinia was a fool. All these were Bourbons. The Queen of Portugal, a Braganza, was an idiot by nature. And so was the King of Denmark.... Their sons, as Regents, exercised the powers of government. The King of Prussia, the successor of the great Frederick, was a mere hog in body as well as in mind. Gustavus of Sweden, and Joseph of Austria, were really crazy and George of England was in a straight waistcoat. There remained then none but old Catharine, of Russia, who had been too lately picked up to have lost her common sense. In this state Bonaparte found Europe, and it was this state of its rulers which lost it with scarce a struggle. The animals had become without mind and powerless, and so will every hereditary monarch be after a few generations.

"And so endeth the Book of Kings from all of whom the Lord deliver us."

The Privileges of Leap Year.—A widow lady of the town of Brighton a short time since made an agreement with a neighbor to sell a farm on which herself and husband resided; and, after the arrangements were all made, she insisted that her worthy liege lord was legally bound to sign the deed, and could not be convinced but that she had a perfect right to control not only this matter, but to make whatever bargains she pleased during the present year, by virtue of the privileges of her sex. The last we heard of the matter the paper had not been signed, but the old lady insisted that she was right.—Rochester Adv.

☞ Hydrophobia is said to be cured in Germany by the cold water remedy. The douche was applied to the head of a patient, who was entirely cured. The warm bath, wet sheet, douche, &c., are the usual method with the disease, and remarkable success is reported.

A MOTHER'S LOVE.

HAPPY is he who knows a mother's love. What is so pure? The patriot expects fame, the friend sympathy, and the lover pleasure. Even religion, while she water her faith with tears, looks forward to the best fruit of her labors and her love. But maternal affection springs from the breast, uninvoked by the wand of hope, unadulterated by the touch of interest. Its object are the weak and woeful. It haunts the cradle of infantile pain, or hovers near the couch of the faint and the forsaken. Its sweetest smiles break through the clouds of misfortune, and its gentlest tones rise amid the sighs of suffering and of sorrow. It is a limpid and lovely flow of feeling, which gushes from the fountain head of purity; and courses the heart, through selfish designs and sordid passions, immingling and unsullied. What is so firm? Time and misfortune, penury and persecution, hatred and infamy, may roll their dark waves successively over it—and still it smiles unchanged; or the more potent allurements of fortune, opulence and pride, power and splendor, may woo her—and yet she is unmoved;.... a mother loves and loves forever!"

Harmony of Revelation with Nature and Science.

It is not surprising to come from heaven, compared with earth, and naturally a perfect system of morals, or, gathering up all the obscure voices of nature utterly, teaching of the multitudinous which the Bible writes; if its precepts are found in opposition to the common judgment and the strong leanings of men, but yet when tested by readiness and results, are universally found to be sustained by these sanctions of natural religion; if it originated among a people who had manifested no tendency to philosophical studies, and to men without education, then we may well enquire "Whence had these men this wisdom?" The more we consider the extreme difficulty of bringing out these tendencies that make a full comprehensive knowledge both of man and of nature, which it must require to do it perfectly, together with the binding influence of selfishness and passion in such imperfect, the more mighty stan we estimate the morals, the sagacity that could gather up and embody every utterance and law of nature as declared by results.

But this Christianity has actually done. Here we feel that we stand on firm ground. At this point we challenge the scrutiny of the infidel. We defy him to point out a single duty even whispered by nature, which is not also inculcated in the New Testament; we defy him to point out a single precept of Christianity, a single course of action inculcated by it which does not, in proportion as it is followed, receive the sanction of natural religion as decidedly beneficial consequences. In fact, moral philosophy, and political economy, and the sciences, the sciences which teach even the rules of well-being, whether as individuals or as communities, are, as far as they are sound, but experience and the structure of organized nature echoing back the teachings of Christianity. What principle of Christian ethics does moral philosophy now presume to call in question?" —What are the general priciples of political economy, but an imperfect application, of those rules of good neighborhood, and of that spirit of kindness which Christianity inculcates? What is the larger part of political science but a laborious and imperfect mode of realizing those results in society which would flow spontaneously from the universal prevalence of Christian morals and of a Christian spirit? Does Christianity command us to be temperate? Science some eighteen hundred years afterward, discovers that temperance alone is in accordance with what it calls the natual laws:—and political economy reckons up the loss of labor and of wealth resulting from intemperance, and then, after an untold amount of suffering, what do they do but echo back the injunction, —"Add to knowledg temperance." Does the Bible command men to do no work on the seventh day, and so let their cattle rest? It is now beginning to be discovered that this is in accordance with an organic law; and that, the thing, both men and animals will do health will do more work and so, in regard to course that would lead men to happiness, Christianity has stood from the first at the entrance of the paths, and uttered its warning cry.

The nations have not heard it, but have passed by, and rushed on, till they have reaped the fruit of their own devices in the corruption of morrals, in the confusion of society through oppresion and misrule; and then philosophy has condescended to discover these evils, and if it has done any thing for the permanent relief of society, it has brought it back to the letter or spirit of the gospel. The stern teachings of experience are making it manifest, that it will continue to do it more and more, that there is God's statute-book for the regulation of his moral creatures, and that the laws of it cannot more be violated with impunity than the natural laws of God.—President Hopkins

Adaptive powers of Nature.

Wherever a seed can lodge, we find vegetables growing; and whenever we find animal matter there are animals to live upon it, the kind of food determines the organization of the creature, not resulting from it, but producing it. The class of ruminants feed on the herbage where the vegetable is in abundance, but the actual nutritious matter is small in quantity compared with the mass. There is therefore an obvious necessity for a more complex apparatus for extracting the smaller proportion of matters capable of being assimilated; hence the maceration of the first stomach, and the regurgitation and rumination, and the passion into the second and third stomach, preparation for the proper digestion of it. When the mass is digested, the nutrient is still very small in proportion to the whole, and to permit that smaller portion to be absorbed and carried into the circulation, the intestinal canal must be long, thus offering resistance to the progress of the food; and giving it longer contact with the absorbents. There is always a correspondence between the length of the stomach and the intestines, and between both of these and the food. It is further very remarkable that when animals of the same species inhabit different climates, where there is more or less abundance of vegatable food, there is a modification of their digestive organs. Where food is abundant, the configuration of the stomach, which is intended to delay its passage, is less complex. Where the food is more scanty, the intestine is longer, and the spiral obstruction greater. This has been observed by Sir E. Home in comparing the anatomy of Java with the discovery of New South Wales, and the American ostrich with the bird inhabiting the deserts of Africa. The same comparison has been made between the Leicestershire sheep and the mountain sheep of Scotland.

We have said that it is the object of nature to support animal life, and to give the enjoyment of existance: and this whenever the means are afforded of converting a material under the processes of digestion and assimilation there animals will be found with an apparatus of digestion and assimilation, there animals will be found with an aparatus of digestion adapted to the food. Nothing certainly can be more curious than the various action of the stomach and mouth. We see, for example, that where the bill precludes mastication in the mouth, it is performed in the stomach, and then, muscle are found in the stomach as powerful as those of the jaws and teeth; but as to the teeth; or what is equivalent to them, we may say that they are continually renewed. In fact, no mechanical structure of jaws and teeth could answer the purpose of nature here: no union of bone and enamel in the teeth could have withstood the attrition of the gizzard; and one of the beautiful and interesting appliances of nature is the substitution, through the intestine of the animal, of small stone of hard texture, generally consisting of silex, introduced within the grasp and action of this organ. It is a further proof that the mastication, if we may use the term, is more perfect in the gizzard than where there is the most complex structure of teeth, and therefore it is the means of extracting the greater quantity of nutritious matter. Accordingly, there are gizzards in most classes of animals. They are not only found in birds, but in reptiles. The sea-turtle has what is termed a muscular stomach. Among fishes, the mullet and the gallaroo trout have muscular stomachs. The cuttle fishes, the nautilus and even the earth-worm, have a crop and gizzard; and insects, according as they live on a leaf or suck the blood, have the same difference in the internal arrangement of the structure for assimilation, as that which distinguish the ox from the lion.

Marriage of Vulcan and Venus.

[illegible] meeting, held in Sheffield, Eng- [illegible] connection with the laying of the first [illegible] new building for the Sheffield A- [illegible] Mechanic's Institution, Lord [illegible] made an admirable speech, in the [illegible] which he thus dealt with the fabulous [illegible] of Vulcan and Venus: "Those of you [illegible] had the opportunity of consulting the [illegible] and classical mythology, are aware [illegible] the fancied deities with which they [illegible] world, one more specially was [illegible] the god of labor and of handicraft [illegible] who was always represented [illegible] huge smithies and workshops, [illegible] anvils, blowing huge bel- [illegible] furnaces, and begrimed with [illegible] and gentlemen, for [illegible] swarthy-looking divinity, [illegible] to pick out a wife, (loud laughtar) [illegible] did not select for him a mere drab—[illegible] taken from the scullery or kitchen [illegible] but they chose for him Venus, the goddess [illegible] love and beauty. Now, ladies and gentlemen, pick out for me the moral of this tale, for I believe that nothing ever was invented—certainly nothing by the polished and brilliant imagination of the Grecian intellect—which has not its meaning and its moral. I have no doubt that all the legends of our own country—that the [illegible] town of your own neighborhood, the Dragon of Wantley, itself, has some appropriate allegory and meaning, if we only knew how to find them out. But what is the special meaning of the marriage of Vulcan with Venus—of the hard-working artificer with his laughter loving queen—of labor with beauty? Why does it, ladies and gentlemen, but this: That even in a busy hive of industry and toil like this, even here, upon a spot which is in many respects no inapt representation of the fable workshop of Vulcan, even here, amid the clang of anvils, the noise of furnaces, and the sputtering sounds and sooty blackness, the mind—the untrammeled mind—may go forth, may pierce the dim amosphere which is poised around us, moving its way to the freer air and purer light which are beyond, and may ally itself with all that is most fair, genial, and lovely in creation. (applause.) So, gentlemen, I say, your labor, your downright, hard, swarthy labor, may make itself the companion, the helpmate, and the husband of beauty—of physical beauty. I do say and have reason to believe, from the inspection which I am able even to [illegible] and I have no doubt a more intimate acquaintance with your wives, sisters and daughters would enable me to prove that I was not wrong in my illustration. But above this beauty I say your labor may ally itself with intellectual beauty—the beauty connected with the play of fancy, with the achievements of art, and with the creations of genius—beauty, such as painting fixes upon the glowing canvass—such as the sculptor embodies in the breathing marble—such as architecture developes in her symmetry and harmonious proportions, such as music clothes with the enchantments of sound. But there is a beauty of a still higher order, with which I feel more assured it is still open to it to unite itself. I mean with moral beauty—beauty connected with the affections, the conscience, the heart, and the life. (loud cheers.) It is most true that in the busiest and blackest of your workshops—in the most wearing and monotonous taks of daily drudgery, as also in the very humblest of your own dwellings—by the smallest of your firesides, you may, one and each of you, in the zealous and careful discharge of the daily duty, in respect for the just rights, and in consideration for the feelings of others—in a meekness and sobriety of spirit, and in the thousand charities and kindnesses of social and domestic intercourse—even thus you may attain to, and exhibit the moral beauty beyond all others in degree and excellence, because in proportion as it can be reached, it makes up the perfection of man's nature here below, and is the most faithful reflection of the will of his Creator, (applause;) and thus I close my explanation of the marriage of Vulcan with Venus, of labor with beauty."

From the Reflector and Workman,

ADDITION TO GRAY'S ELEGY.

A late number of the New York Observer, quoting from a Buffalo paper, says that "the following lines were published many years ago, anonymously, in a Rhode Island paper. The author believed that Gray had not given to the subjects of his muse enough of religious character to make the charm complete; hence he wrote these verses, to follow the stanza in the Elegy, beginning with the words,

Far from the mad'ning crod's ignoble strife'

These additional stanzas were written by the late lamented James D. Knowles, and published in the Rhode Island American, of which he was for a short time, joint editor with the late Professor Goddard. Mr. Knowles had a taste for poetry, of which he was by no means ignorant, but which he neglected to cultivate, because of a conviction that he was called, in other ways, to serve his God and his generation. He was an earnest admirer of the productions of Thomas Gray. S.

No airy dreams their simple fancies fired,
No thirst for wealth, nor panting after fame:
But truth divine sublimer hopes inspired,
And urged them onward to a nobler aim.

From every cottage, with the day, arose
The hallowed voice of spirit-breathing prayer;
And artless anthems, at the peaceful close,
Like holy incence charmed the evening air.

Though they, each tome of human lore unknown,
The brilliant path of Science never trod,
The sacred Volume claimed their hearts alone,
Which taught the way to glory and to God.

Here they from Truth's eternal fountain drew
The pure and gladdened waters day by day;
Learned; since our days are evil, few, and few,
To walk in wisdom's bright and peaceful way.

In yon lone pile, o'er which hath sternly passed
The heavy hand of all destroying Time,
Through whose low mouldering aisle now sighs the blast,
And, round whose alters, grass and ivy climb;

They gladly thronged their grateful hymns to raise.
Oft as the calm and holy Sabbath shone;
The mingled tribute of their prayers and praise
In sweet communion rose before the throne.

Here, from those honored lips which seered fire
From Heaven's high chancery hath touched, they hear
Truths which their zeal inflame, their hopes inspire,
Give wings to faith, and check affliction's tear.

When life flowed by, and like an angel Death
Came to release them to the worlds on high,
Praise trembled still on each expiring breath,
And holy triumph beamed from every eye.

Then gentle hands their 'dust to dust' consign;
With quiet tears the simple rites are said;
And here they sleep, till at the trump divine,
The Earth and Ocean render up their dead.

LIVING IT DOWN.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

"I'LL live it down, sir!"

Mr. Coleman drew himself up with a dignified air.

"That you will be able, no doubt, to do. All your friends know it to be a base slander. Still, Mr. Coleman, if you would call for an investigation, and give unequivocal proofs of your integrity, the whole matter could be settled at once, and the busy tongue of detraction silenced."

"No sir! I will not stoop to humiliating explanations. I am innocent: that is sufficient for my own peace of mind, and before I die my innocence will be seen. I can wait patiently. Sooner or later the truth will appear. Words cannot hurt me."

"I think you are wrong, Mr. Coleman. I think it is due to the cause of truth for you to come forward and justify yourself in this matter. You can do it with the greatest ease in the world."

"I know. But it is not in me to reply to false accusations. I feel that it would be a degradation. To me it is of consequence what I am; not what people happen to think I am. I am willing to wait, if it be twenty years. All will be seen in its true light in the end. Better suffer for well doing than evil doing. As for an investigation, let those call for it who question my integrity. I shall certainly not do so."

"Think of how your usefulness may be abridged," said the friend.

"Let those who falsely accuse me, answer for that," replied Mr. Coleman, firmly. "All I have to do is to live the slander down, and I will take care that it is done."

Other friends urged him to take the proper steps, which were in his power, to clear his character, but Mr. Coleman, who was a proud man, as well as a man of stern integrity, refused to do so.

"I will live it a down!" was his reply. "That is the way to neutralize detraction. All the explanations I can make will not alter the opinions of those who wish to think evil of me. Time and a blameless life, only can change the current of false estimation in which my name is held."

And so Mr. Coleman proceeded to live down, as he called it, the slander that had been put in circulation against him.

The nature of the charge was this. He had been constituted executor of a deceased brother's estate, and guardian of his only child, a daughter ten years of age. The brother was engaged in doing a large business, and was the owner of considerable real estate. In the estimation of the public he was a wealthy man, and his daugter was looked upon as an heiress.

But, in the settlement of the estate, Mr. Coleman found that his brother had been doing business on a large scale, without possessing the amount of capital he was generally supposed to possess. All his real estate was heavily mortgaged, and his current business debts and bank accommodations were very large. The terms of the executorship gave him plenary powers in the settlement of the estate, and these he made use of to their full extent, as if the estate and business were his own. With the means which the estate afforded, Mr. Coleman found that it would be impossible to meet at maturity all its liabilities, and that bankruptcy must inevitably ensue. In order to prevent this he used his own means, as far as he could safely do it, in meeting the almost daily maturing obligations of his brother's estate, at the same time he with all diligence made collections and disposed of property for the same purpose. In all this, Mr. Coleman sought to do his duty to the orphan who had been committed to his charge. The final result was an entire settlement of the estate of the course of two year, leaving a surplus of fifteen thousand dollars, which was immediately invested safely and profitably. At the time the brother died, out of ten persons who had been asked what they considered him worth, nine would have replied, "A hundred thousand dollars."

The result greatly disappointed Mr. Coleman. He had hoped to realize at least forty thousand dollars out of the estate for his neice. Of the result he said nothing. It was not a matter with which the public had any thing to do, and he was not the man to intrude private concerns within limits where they did not legitmately belong.

As Anna Coleman emerged from girlhood into womanhood, and entered society, she was looked upon by almost every one as an heiress of no small pretensions to wealth. The amount of this was variously estimated, none set it down lower than sixty or seventy thousand dollars. Of course she had plenty of suitors. The favored one was a Mr. Charles Grossman, who had quite as strong a love for the hundred thousand dollars he believed her to possess as he had for the maiden herself. His disappointment on finding, after a marriage had taken place, that his wife's fortune was only fifteen thousand dollars, may be imagined. Immediately he put in circulation a report that Mr. Coleman had wronged his niece in the settlement of her father's estate, a report that very many accredited when they heard how small a sum had been saved from his apparently large possessions.

It was the effect of this serious allegation that Mr. Coleman, in the pride of his integrity, was going to live down, instead of at once proving his innocence by laying open to a carefully chosen committee of friends, as well as of those who doubted his integrity, the exact condition of his brother's property when he died, which could easily have been done to the entire satisfaction of all—thus at once silencing detration and leaving his social influence unimpaired. But this did not harmonize with Mr. Coleman's views and feelings. He preferred, rather, to wrap himself up in conscious integrity, and live the base slander down. Proudly and erect he walked among his fellow man, undisturbed at the coldness of one, or the sidelong, meaning glance of another.

A few months after the report unfavorable to the integrity of Mr. Coleman had obtianed a free circulation, a gentlemen named Bassford called upon an attorney, between whom and himself the following conversation took place.

"What do you think of this report about Coleman?" asked Bassford.

"It sounds rather strangely. Don't you think so?"

"Very strangely. But do you, in the least, credit it?"

"I am afraid there is something wrong. It is said that all he accounted for to the daughter, out of his brother's large estate, was only fifteen thousand dollars."

"Yes. Fifteen thousand. I had it from Grossman, who married Anna Coleman."

"It may be," said the lawyer, "that he has settled the estate honestly, and that fifteen thousand dollars is all that was realized. But I have my doubts."

"Mr. Coleman has always stood high as a man of integrity."

"Yes. But the highest are sometimes liable to fall."

"Then you really have doubts of his integrity?"

"This circumstance is enough to make any man doubt."

"That is certainly true. You are aware that I have named him as my executor?"

"I am."

"To talk about that is my business with you this morning. I do not feel easy in mind, in prospect of leaving my property and the interests of my wife and children in his hands, in the event of my death."

"Nor should I. You ought by all means to name another executor."

"So it strikes me. I have been thinking of Anderson."

"You could n't find a better man in my opinion. I esteem him very highly."

"So do I."

"I would certainly make the change. It is enough that a suspicion rests against the integrity of Coleman."

"That is what I think. And as your opinion of Anderson so fully coincides with my own, I will decide the matter at once, and get you to make the required alteration in my will, which is still in your possession."

"Very well, Mr. Bassford. I will have the change made as you desire. Your course is, without doubt, a prudent one."

So the name of Mr. Anderson was substituted for that of Mr. Coleman, as executor to the last will and testament of Mr. Bassford,

Five years elapsed, during which the wrongly judged merchant persevered in his course of living down the false charge that had been made against him. The manly uprightness of his character impressing itself constantly upon those who were brought into close contact with him, gradually restored to the minds of many, who had doubted his integrity, their former good opinion. Some, who could approach him nearer than others, inquired as to the facts of the case, and received the information they sought. Time, too, developed traits of character in Grossman, who had married his neice, that destroyed the weight of his testimony in the case.

"I told you I would live it down," said Coleman to a friend, as an entire change in public opinion became clearly apparent. "And I have lived it down."

"At what cost, you may never know," returned the friend gravely.

"My character ha suffered severely, I am aware."

"I did not mean that," said the friend. "How much injury others may have sustained through your inability to serve tuem during the time public opinion was against you, will never, perhaps, be known."

"With that I have nothing to do," replied Mr. Coleman.

The friend did not say what was in his mind. But he thought that if Coleman had used the proper means, to correct public opinion, as he ought to have done, instead of wraping himself up in his dignity and proudly "living down" the charge of dishonest appropriation that had been made against him, he would have acted a wiser part, and retained that influence for good in the community which the community was justly entitled to.

A few days subsequently, Mr. Coleman, just as he was about rising from the table, after dinner, was informed that a lady had called and desired to see him. She was in the parlor. On entering the room the merchant found a lady in deep mourning. She drew aside her veil, and exhibited the face of a stranger, past the prime of life.

"I hope to be pardoned," she said, "for intruding upon you; but the nature of my business is such, that even in your eyes, I am sure it will excuse the liberty I am taking. My name is Mrs. Bassford."

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA LIBERIA, NOVEMBER 24, 1848

Here we are, at it again! We have not honored ourself with attention to the paper for the last three months. Circumstances of a most imperative character demanded that we should rusticate; and the decrees of no chancellor are so stern and irresistible, as those of poverty. Hence instead of inditing editorials and collecting extracts, we have been planting potatoes and collecting pepper. Our readers however, need not start, for we shall not treat them with an undue infusion of capsicum at present; and our potatoes are yet in a state of embryo.—SEN: ED:

Churches.

The church at New Georgia is still blessed with a visitation of the Holy Spirit. Two persons were received on Sabbath last, who with [illegible] received before, make ten candidates for baptism.

About a year ago, we organised a Sabbath School in this church, and as we attend every alternate sabbath, we took the superintendence of it ourself. It is taught chiefly by Ellen Walburg, the wife of the deacon there, assisted by two or three other female members. At first we were embarrassed for want of suitable books; but recently we have a tolerable supply sent out at our request, by the Baptist publication office at Philadelphia. Recently the school has had so large an increase of pupils that we have arranged with a member of the Methodist church to divide the school, and by so doing, enable the children to have better attendance. We hope the arrangement will be speedily put in operation.

Some months back, we begged between four and five pounds from the officers of one of H. B. M. Cruisers, for the benefit of the Baptists in the colony. A small part of the amount we applied in paying the expenses of brethren traveling to destitute churches—the remainder we are using to build a pulpit in the church in this place.

There are some persons to be baptised at Louisana.

The church at Millsburg is in a state of quiet and serenity. The members appear to be walking in love and aiming to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace. We were there a week ago, and employed one venening in reading to them the disbipline and endeavoring to explain what needs explanation; and the following day being sabbath, endeavored to preach to them. There is great need that the rules of the house of God as observed in other countries by baptist churches be inculcated here. Some people and some baptists too, do not believe there is such a thing as a baptist discipline. Hence the numerous errors and incongruous proceedings.

The church at Virginia is in peace. The loss of brother James will not be easily repaired. May the Lord send them a man after his own heart.

Arrived

On the 23th ult: the Liberia Packet, Captain Goodmanson: Passengers, Reverends Payne and Wilson: Hon. Messrs Russwurm, Benedict, Mc Gill and Lady, and Dr. J. S. Smith; Messrs Lewis, Harris, and other immigrants.

The packet brought out Tobacco and Powder for the Republic. We regret the Tobacco is damaged. It has been sold for the benefit of those concerned. We say we regret it; because we wish the monopoly scheme to go at once fairly into operation. We have great faith in the plan, especially if it be conducted as at first proposed. The other articles proposed to be monopolised were not obtained President Roberts will doubtless endeavor to contract for them in England. He may succeed with merchants not concerned in the African trade. The object of such will be to invest their capital safely and profitably. But the African merchant will meet the measure with uncompromising hostility, although the measure, if carried out to the fullest desired extent, cannot in the smallest degree, affect either American or British interest, or the interest of any nation whatever, except for good. But where men's interest is concerned they are not easily convinced if there be any apparent opposition

Fishmen.

The Fishmen, or that part of them called "Piccaninny-Cess-Men, are showing their teeth. The capture of a slave canoe at Junk not long since has stirred their bile. They pretend not to be angry because the canoe and slaves were detained, but because the canoe-men who were of their tribe, were very badly beaten. We know how not how much they were beaten—we hope not more than the law directs—for whatever be the grade of the offence, we advocate close adherence to law, both in the preliminary proceedings and the final punishment.

Their threats though are idle. There is not a craft that sails from this part which cannot beat off scores of their canoes.

New Cess.

We have heard that the Spaniards at New Cess have lately treated some correspondence with marked disrespect.

Virginia.

New Virginia is looking up. We trust we love all mankind, even our enemies, (except the few whom we can't but despise,) but some how we do love Virginia and Virginians. It is perhaps because we were born in Old Virginia. How strange that we should still love a place that disfranchised and cast us out. Well let New Virginia copy all in the old that is good, and reject the bad—by equal laws and an equal and even-handed distribution of justice, establish Virginia in Africa, of which Virginians every where may be truly proud. Such an one we will have, if improvement goes on at its late rapid rate. Our weekly route is along the beautiful and picturesque St. Paul's, and we cannot say whether we are more pleased at the clearings which are every where to be seen, than grieved to see the banks of the river despoiled of the rich mnatle of foliage which nature has thrown over them.

Currency.

The Act of the last Legislature establishing a currency has in one respect succeeded admirably. When it was first proposed to make the duties payable in specie or in government notes, based upon specie, many thought the scheme visionary, and declared the consequences would be sorely embarrassing to all concerned in trade. We thought differently—adhered to our plan and got the bill through the Legislature, The plan went into operation, and we believe there is no one in the colony who is not now in favor of it.

It should be stated however, that great praise is due to the Officers who manage our financial affairs, in systematically restraining the issue of those notes within the ability of the treasury promptly to redeem them, and so far as we know, no application has been made at the treasury which has not met a ready and satisfactory response. Consequently the bills retain their full value and circulate readily from hand to hand. This is well and we hope it may continue so.

The whole object of the bill however, is not met; and it cannot be met but by another arrangement, an arrangement which will keep money, (hard money) in the Republic. We think so too; but we are very far from concurring in any of the plans which have as yet been proposed. There is one plan to effect this desired object, which will infallibly effect it, which is so obvious, that to hold it up or recommend it would be a reflection upon the good sense of the community.

It should not be disguised however, that no little inconvenience is felt by the poorer class of people in consequence of specie being drained off by foreign vessels. Many persons are forced off in the country with merchandize, proceeds of their labor to exchange with the natives. There is but one remedy for this evil, and we will do well to look to it.

By letters received from America, we learn that an effort has been made to impress belief that in an editorial inserted some months ago, relative to the support of Mr. Drayton as pastor of the Church here, we were influenced by a desire to keep the church from being supplied. Strong in conscious integrity, we are quite indifferent as to what may be believed especially by those, whoever they be who have endeavored to make the impression. Regard however, for the opinion of friends abroad induces us to throw off the allegation, and to do this we have only to give a plain statement of the case.

Shortly after Mr. D's. so called election to the pastorate, he called on us, and after a wilderness of small talk, said "I must have a support, for if I am not supported how can I go about during the week and know who is sick, and prepare medicine for them on Sunday. We replied. This is a matter we have long thought of; but the relation we have sustained to the church, prevented us hitherto from more than obliquely hinting at it from the pulpit. Now we have a better chance. We will come out more fully; and will insert an article on the subject in the forth-coming number of the Herald.—Mr. D. replied "I wish you would —I shall be very much obliged to you if you will.

Let the candid and unprejudiced judge.

A Novel Fisherman.

Coming down the river a few days ago, we espied a huge alligator lying with his body on the sloping margin of the river, his lower jaw submerged in the water, while the upper was extended in the air, showing a formidable array of teeth. We stopped to gaze at him. Anon, a hapless mullet ventured within the dread hiatus, when the treacherous jaws suddenly closed and severed the fish asunder. The native boys who were with us, took the opportunity to assign the rationale of some of the allegator's movements. They say he lies with his mouth open to attract a certain insect which floats upon the surface of the water. These collect in large numbers around his mouth. Fishes feed upon them, and when lured by the desired prey within the vortex, they become a prey themselves.

DIED.

In this town on the 9th inst: after a short illness of thirty six hours, Rev. F. S. Jame, pastor of the Baptist Church at New Virgina, and in the employ of the Southern Baptist Board of Foreign Missions.

On the preceeding day a congo man was drowned, by falling from a canoe in which he was ferrying stone.

More Murder!

Rumours of a most atrocious murder at Bexley, Grand Bassa have just reached us. The victim is one W. Blain—the supposed murderer one Guest. As the trial has not taken place, we will withhold particulars and comment.

Recognition.

It is rumoured that the British Govemrent has acknowledged the Indepence of this Republic. We have no particulars; but we hope to be able to give them to our readers in our next.

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Liberia Herald.

Harper Cape Palmas,
August 26th, 1848.

Messrs Editors:—Sirs, by the Government sloop Curlew on the 23rd, inst: we thankfully acknowledge the receipt of a quantity of grain for charitable distribution among the indigent and suffering of our community. Our gratitude is heightened from the fact that the donation was unsolicited.

To the different charitable contributors, and epsecially to the Ladeis of your community, to whom we are indebted for the welcome supply: we adopt this method on the part of our Government of publicly acknowledging and conveying our sincere thanks.

Our hearts swelled with mingled emotions of gratitude and pride, when we reflect on the noble feelings which has prompted this spontaneous act of liberality on the part of the people of the "Republic of Liberia." If her great prototype the Republic of N. America, has exalted herself by benevolent contributions to the suffering Irish: Your Republic has done no less in thus extending aid to the distressed of Maryland in Liberia.

Our improving circumstances, together with favorable seasons, and abundant crops, enable us now to subsist indepently of extraneous aid, and as our recent destitution has operated to produce greater exertions on the part of our agriculturalist, we hope that it will be repaid in a corresponding increase of the products of the soil.

We pray that kind Providence may ever watch over and keep your Republic, and that famine may never exist within its borders: but if in the vicissitudes, to which individuals and communities are alike subject, it ever be in our power to reciprocate your kindness,—we shall bear in mind that from us a debt of gratitude is due the Liberian Republic.

I have the honor to be

GOVERNMENT.

Messrs Editors:—Sirs;

The maintenance of liberty has always been a cheerished object by all nations of the earth, whether it be a monarchy or republican government. But the essence of true liberty is not to be found; much less enjoyed in an aristocratic institution. Liberty, as it exists in its purity, is both soul-stirring and procreative;—it is soul-stirring because, when it operates with full effect on the mind, it has an expansive tendency; it bouys up the very soul—exalting its faculties; enlarging its ideas, and brightens its prospects for future events: it is procreative; because when fully enjoyed and appreciated: it leads from imagination to ideas, from idea to sentiment, from sentiment to action; and from action to perfection: this being its nature—and its tendencies, where, I would ask, is it to be centered, and enjoyed?—but in a republican institution, that kind of an institution—where the will of the people acts and governs. Liberia being a Republican Government, it is in the power of its inhabitants to enjoy true liberty; therefore let them cultivate it with perseverance and energy—let them, when sending their representatives to their legislature, send such men and characters that fully understands their important and momentous duty. Let them select men from among them, who are able and qualified for the task; for be assured that your cause should be placed in the hands of such, that will exert their capacity for your individual and several interests: let the will of the people be carried ont by their representatives—so far as that will is consistent with the constitutional authority, and your liberty will be consummated.

But while it is the duty of representatives to watch over the interest of their constituents: it is also the imperative duty of the constituents to watch over the actions of their representives; for this very fact secures your freedom. When representatives forgets their character and object of liberty, you will see in them an awful departure from the spirit of republicanism, and a palpable assumption of power, not delegated to them. When you see them in the least departing from the spirit of the constitution, then I would advise you to check them by the power that belongs to you;—nip the flower is in its bud, destroy the first approach to illiberal and venal principle, and you will effectually guard against that political excess that eventuates in anarchy and dissolution.

It is with the people, and for them to maintain their government: as long as the people will, the government may flourish, but when they (the people) cease to afford their delegated powers that succor which is due to them, then the moon of their free institutions will begin to wane away, and society will relax into its first elements: yea; it will retrograate to its native darkness, and nothing but moral blackness will gather around; then avoid this fatal rock of supineness; this deadly miasma to your national prosperity—keep yourself from it as you would from within the influence of the Boom Upas, cultivate an energy among yourselves—a sagacity to overlook your own affairs—a watchfulness over your freedom: fortify the castle of your government, by cultivating true liberty—strengthen your liberty by diffusing literature and education among yourselves and you will find this to be the indestructible germ of your happiness and prosperity. Search for qualified rulers, such as can add to their experience in government affairs; the true light of education, as the lamp of righteousness urge upon them the work for the diffusion of more intelligence, if they are possessed with sagacity, prudence, energy, wisdom and forestght, they will acquit themselves with zeal and fidelity—and add to Liberia's constitution a halo of glory that shall be commensurate with her political existence:—by such action as this, you will be effectual in extricating—long lost, down trodden, and forgotten Africa, out of the labyrinth of mental and moral darkness, bring out those latent virtues that are hiden in her lonaleness, disperse the gloomy forbording of ignorance from her horison show her that she can be a people—that she will be a nation: and a moral energy, insurmountable in its nature—insurmountable in its tendencies will be awakened up in her, she will arise in her strength, the dove of purity and innocence will flap its wings and raise its beak in triumph. And Africa emerging from the clouds will rule again in her natural sovereignty, among the nations of the earth, having been regenerated, disenthraled, and redeemed—by the all pervading influence of the towering genius of true national liberty.

Yours, &c.

OBITUARY.

For the Liberia Herald.

Departed this life at Louisana on the 14th of September, Mrs. Phillis Watts aged about 70 years.

Mrs. W. emigrated to this colony in 1844. She was from Louisana U. States. Mr. Watts had for many years peeceeding her death, suffered from feeble health; although her active mind and industrious habits bore her along with cheerfulness and through a series of domestic duties. No one witnessing her cheerfulness and activity, would have supposed she was all the while the subject of severe bodily ailment, yet such was the fact.

The day on which she died she attended as usual to the duties of her house. About noon she felt unusally ill, and sent for her daughter, who resided about two miles off. The daughter arrived and prevailed on her to retire to bed. Shortly afterwards the disease devoloped itself with fearful force, and immediately prostrated her energies. About 6 P. M. the disease triumphed when she said "I can't stand it," and immediately expired.

Mrs. Watts had not publickly avowed herself upon the subject of Relgion. Yet she frequently expressed a hope and even firm belief that the Lord had been merciful to her and forgiven her sins. More than once she expressed herself thus to the writer of these lines, and had also expressed her intention to come out boldly on the Lord's side, and at no distant day, present herself for fellowship will the church. But before that time came her race was finished and her days numbered. What a solemn warning! How admonitory against delay!! "Death is ever on the wing" and how important therefore it is that men should do at once what their hand findeth to do, before they are remanded to the dust where "there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom —Com.

NOTICE

The undersigned have formed themselves into a company for the manufacture of soap, under the name of the Liberia Soap Manufactury. Their establishment is at Teage's Wharf. Their object is to furnish the people with a sufficient supply of the necessary article of soap at a reduced price, to keep in the Republic the large sums which have been annually drawed off for the article—while at the same time they promote their own individual interest. The business will be managed by the three parties first named. J. S. Payne has only a share in the concern without any active management.

SUMMARY

The Poverty That Complains Not.—A silent poverty that goes dressed in its black coat, polished, it is true where polished should not come, and with a slaty hue, produce by the frequent application of ink to its theardbare surface.—It is a couragous poverty which resists all aid—even from that fictitious fund, a debt—which dresses itself as you would dress, if your coat were ten years old; which invites no sympathy—which maybe seen in the sorbre evening, stoping a moment before the baker's shop of the white windows of the money changer, but passing or gaining without a sigh heard. Oh, this poverty in a black coat! And then it enters into its cold and solitary chamber, without even the sad consolation of weeping with another.

Why he did it?—We see an anecdote in the papers which furnishes a reason why the famous John Hancock wrote his signature to the Declaration of Independance, in so large and bold a hand. It is known that the British government offered $3 500 for his head, and according to the Maine Cultivator, when he appended his signature to the "Declaration," he did it as though he wished to dash his whole soul into it, and rising from his seat, he exclaimed:

"There John Bull can read my name without spectacles—he may double his reward, and I will set him at defiance,"

The wedding ring is put on the fourth finger of the woman's hand, because, in the original formulary of marraige, it was placed first upon the top of the thumb with the words—"In the name of the Father," then on the next finger, with the words—and the Son," and on the middle finger, with "and of the Holy Ghost," and finally on the fourth, with the "Amen"

A Neat Epigram—Logan, the commedian once lent his watch to a lady as he was going on the stage. She placed it in her bosom, and on returning it to him, it was found to have stopped from the moment she took charge of it, where upon L. presented her with the following neat impromptu:

"My watch my lovely friend you say, stopt on your breast,—you're vexed,
I see,—
The trinket on your bosom lay,
And held its breath in ecstacy."

An Amiable Queen.—The more you examine the character of Donna Maria, the more convinced you become that she is the botom of all the mischief.—If I was to go into the interriot of her palace, I could mention to you instances where she has beaten and knocked down a lady, in waiting only because she has innocently made some remark which did not pleas her —London Post.

A lazzling Argument—"You teach," said Emperior Trajant to Rabbi Joshua, "that your God is every where, and boast that he resides amongst youf nation I would like to see him."

"God's presence is indeed everywhere," replied Joshua; "suppose we try to look first at one of his ambassadors?"

The Emperor consented. The Rabbi took him in the open air at noonday, and bid him look at the sun in meridian splendor.

"I cannot," said Trajan; the light dazzles me."

"Thou art unable," said Joshua, "to endure the light of one of his creatures, and canst thou expect to behold the resplendant glor of the Creator? Would not such a sight annihilate thee?"—Hebrew Tales

Knowledge of Life.—Books without the knowledge of life are useless; for what should books teach but the art of living? To study manners, however, only in coffee houses, is more than equally imperfect. The minds of men who acquire no solid learning, and only exist on the dust, forage that they pick up by running about, and snatching what drops from their neighbors as ignorant as themselves, will never ferment into any knowledge valuable or durable; but like the light wines we drink in hot countries, please for a moment through incapible of keeping. In the study of mankind, much will be found to swim as froth, and much must sink as feculence, before the swine can have its effect, and become that noblest liquor, which rejoices the heart and gives vigor to imagination.—Dr. Johnson

——God gives to every man
The virtue, temper, understanding, taste
That lifts him into life and lets him fall
Just in the niche he was ordained to fill.

Pleasant doctrine

Our minister preaches and labors to prove,
Tis my duty my neighbor to cherish and love;
In such doctrine I hope to improve more and more,
For young Harry Rutherford liveth next door,

Anna Maria.

Gravity vs. folly.—It was a saying of Pope that he who is not a fool half of his life is a fool all of the time.—Robert Hall, who held a similar opinion, on being requested to hear a very dull preacher, with the exclamation

"How can a man who preaches as you talk in so trifling a manner?" replied—

"There, my dear, is the difference between us; you talk your nonsense in the pulpit—I talk mine out of it."

The eminent Dr. South, being in the midst of a frolic on a certain occasion, and seeing a dignified, unbending acquaintance approaching, exclaimed—

"Stop! we must be grave now, there is a fool coming!"

In and out of Place.—Tallerand once said that the art of putting men in their proper places, was perhaps the first in the science of government. We do not always succeed; sometimes we send men to Congress who we ought to send to the State Prison; and place men on the bench who ought to be set before the bar; men are seen laboriously thumping the cushion who ought to be thumping the anvil. You will sometimes see a college graduate who cannot write a page of good English, nor even spell well such English as he can write.

Laughing too soon.—A commander of Malta, very avaricious, had two negroes who once complained that they had no shirts. He called his major-domo—

"Tell the wife of my farmer to save some hemp; when it is grown, let her spin it and make some shirts for those little rascals."

The negroes laughed.

"Ah! you young scamps, if you laugh so soon you may just as well be without shirts," and he countermanded his order.

From the Ladies' Garland.

ASPIRATIONS OF A SICK STUDENT.

Break forth thou fountain of unmeasured thought,
And spurn the barriers that would stay thy course;
Thou struggliest madly with the fetters wrought
By flesh and sense to check thy mighty force!
How like a pent up river dost thou seem,
Cold, restless, dark, without a friendly beam!

Oh, for an angel's finger to unlock
The glorious portals, that the tide may flow
Strong, broad, and free, "the water from the Rock,"
Dispensing, as in ages long ago,
Life, vigor, and the nobler hope within,
That shows us "Promised Land," and leads us in.

When shall the full, out-pouring of the soul
Be granted to my prayer? Worn with the strife,
Longing to burst the fetters that control,
Yet all too weak, I weary of my life.
When shall the warfare cease? Not until death
Lays his cold finger on my fluttering breath!

There come such dreams of nobler things to start
Ambition's latent gem within my breast,—
There come such wild, fierce throbbings to my heart,
Bidding me shun the tempting needful rest,
That I must toil till Fame's effulgent star
Shall mark my grave or light my triumph-car!

Be still my heart, be still! This frightful storm
Will wreck thy citadel of life and strength!
Curb its vain fury, raging to deform,
And thou shalt find the ark of peace at length!
Hush! hush! These words have touched a mournful string,
As if the angel Hope had furled its wing!

Comparative Philology.

Comparative Philology is a recent science. The name, no doubt, is taken from comparative Anatomy, in which a system is involved by a careful examination of the real structures and functions of animals. This comparison of languages had never been instituted, except casually, until the present century. Von Humboldt, Bobb, Grimm, (and more recently Burnouf, Lassen and others,) are here the great names. By bringing together the languages, with the history and character of Middle and Western Asia, Northern Africa, Europe, they have developed the most brilliant results, the central and more valuable languages of the world classifying themselves into two great families, called respectively the Shemitish and the Indo-European. From these labors, and as a foundation to others a complete revolution has been nearly accomplished in philosophical grammar, lexicography, and the methods of classical study. Memory, instead of reigning supreme, and holding firmly immense masses of heterogeneous facts, now sits at the feet of her brother reason. Grammar, from being one of the most uninteresting of studies, is becoming delightful. The foundations are laid in human nature, and the philosophical grammarian shows, or labors to show, how every branch of a verb, and every vowel change, follows not a caprice, but a natural law, and that speech, instead of a farrago of contradictions, a mass of confused utterances, is the appropriate expression of the human soul every where, whose actings, though sorely jarred by depravity, show its original brightness, as through a veil darkly.

Adelung estimates the whole number of languages and dialects, known upon the globe at 3656. Balbi rates them at 2000. But by careful examination the number, no doubt, may be reduced to hundreds, and a very few hundreds of distinct languages, especially if we exclude mere savage or outlandish idioms. But after all this reduction, the question returns, are these various modes of speech arbitrary, so that the learning of one but little facilitates the learning of another, or are they so connected as that it is by no means a prodigy, but might be an ordinary result of human industry, to be acqnainted with twenty or fifty languages? Comparative philogogy has solved this question. We will try, striving to avoid the fathomless abyss of Teutonic generalizing, and the flying cloudland of French theorizing, to present some simple and intelligible views on this subject.

The soul of man is one. It struggles for utterance and articulate speech; the result must be, in its essence, every where the same. In utterance man always uses the same vocal organs. Here is another source of similarity. That is, thought and feeling must be essantially alike; the organs of expression are the same. Hence, there must be, and there is, a general likeness, in all articulate speech. There are, for instance, everywhere words to express existances—nouns; action gives rise to verbs, sudden emotions to interjections. Every language, possesses these, and a hundred other things because man is like man. But as it has been well remarked, there are two great classes of words, those which resemble external sounds, where sound is the echo of the sense, those which struggle to express that which is peculiar to the soul, and for which there is perhaps no perfect picture in material things. The former class of words must be strikingly alike everywhere. It is in the latter, that there will be the most diversity. The reason for the choice of one word here rather than another, though it cannot be considered arbitrary, is subtle, and perhaps will altogether, at least in many instances, evade our search. Then the modes of developing and connecting words are very various, and here it is that the greatest scope is given to the effort of the comparative philologist.

The reader will observe that there is the greatest difference in the value of languages. Some are remarkably beautiful structures themselves, and well reward the labor of examination, and their complete mastery is a mental discipline. Besides, they may enshrine a noble literature. The character and history of the people whose it was or is, may be such as that it will be a matter of exceeding interest to study the nation in their speech. Or it may embody the solemn revelation of the will of the Creator to the creature. Other languages may be rude in structure, even unwritten, and there may be nothing to interest to the history of those who speak them, except that they are men. It is upon the former class, as was natural, the philologists of our age have laid out their strength.

Early Printers.

Early printers were men of profound erudition, and the printnig office was then, in the strict sense of the word, a "temple of learning." In the first days of the art of printing its professors very often wrote, or edited the works which they gave to the world,—and these, it will be remembered, were for the most part composed in the learned languages. Among the most celebrated of these early printers is the family of Stephens, who, for more than a century, astonished the world by their vast erudition, as well as by their magnificent specimens of typography which issue from their press. This press, says Hallam, might be called the central point of illumination to all Europe. In the year 1558, Henry Stephens, the star of the family, published more editions of ancient authors than would have been sufficient to make the reputation of another author." His "Thesaurus of the Greek" remains to this day and is the great lexicon of this language.

Robert Stephens, the third in succession, is distinguished for his very beautiful edition of the Greek Testament, which forms the basis of the one now in use. An idea may be formed of his extensive erudition, as well as the learning of the times, from the following accounts of his biographers—"He received only such compositors into his printing office as were conversant with the Greek and Latin languages. His workmen, in and about the office, were obliged to speak Latin. His wife and daughter understood this language thoroughly, and assisted him in carrying his directions into effect: so that throughout his whole house and printing establishment, from the bureau of business to the kitchen, nothing was heard but the Latin tongue. He usually employed the proof readers all from foreign countries, who spoke the various languages which they corrected. The zeal of this early and learned printer for study, for the maintaining the honor and dignity of the press, and for the public good in general, is worthy of the highest commendation—and his character in this respect is worthy of imitation by all the members of the craft.

"The glory of the house of the Stephens was sifared by five successive generations," first in Paris, afterwards at Geneva, in Switzerland.—Scientific American.

The Glass of Bohemia.

This beautiful article is manufactured in various parts of Germany, chiefly in Bohemia, and always in the woody, mountainous districts. The materials from which the glass is formed, consist chiefly of the same as those used in England; the manufacturers themselves seem to believe that there is no difference except in the proportions of the materials and in the fuel, which is exclusively wood, and produces, by a little attention, a more constant and intense heat than can be produced by any coal; the feeding the furnace with the latter material, they say, creates a change in the temperature detrimental to the fluid above, and never sufficiently intense. The wooded mountains of Bohemia are entirely inhabited by a population whose industry, morals, hospitality, and kindiness of manners, do honor, not only to this rich and beautiful kingdom, but to the whole human race. Clean to a proverb in their houses and persons, hospitable and amiable in their manners, simple in their habits, cheerful and devoted in their religion, they form, perhaps, the happiest community in the world. In passing through the country, a stranger would never find out that he was in a manufacturing district, but might fancy himself in the green valleys of a purely pastoral, patriarchal people. Each cottage has its cheerful little cottage, clusters of cottages or scattered along the glens or sides of the hills, are embowered with fruit trees, and encircled with shrubs and flowers which each cottager cultivates with a fond peculiar to his race; on every side the fields of grain or pasture stretch out like a vast enamelled carpet between the hills which are clothed in dense forests of spruce, fir, pine, and beech; filled with deer, roe and capercailzie; they extend in every direction far beyond the reach of the eye, one vast cloud of verdure. The fabriques or fatories are placed generally in the middle of one of those villages, the extent of which can only be known by going from house to house; so closely is each hid in its own fruit-bowers, and so surrounded by shrubs and flowers, that the eye can only pick up the buildings by their blue smoke, or get a glimpse of them here and there as you advance; thus some of the villages are along two or three miles, forming the most delicious walk along the green, and generally accompanied by a stream always overhung by a profusion of wild flowers, the mountain ash, and weeping birch, one of the former only to be found in our gardens.—Art-Union Journal.

Ancient Ships.

Ships had usually several banks of oars rising one above another, in the manner of stairs. On going on board a ship, you would first step on the side. This was the first bank of oars. Here the rowers had short oars. The next step was higher and farther from the sea. This was the second bank of oars. Here the rowers had longer oars. The next step was the third bank or oars. Here the rowers had still longer oars, and consequently, the work was harder, and the men had higher pay. Some of the ancient ships had two rudders on each side; afterwards they had a rudder at each end; but at length they had a rudder only in the stern, and the prow or bow of the ship became ornamented with a figure head. The ships of war were not adapted for carrying any cargo; the chief object was swiftness in sailing. The men could never sleep, nor even conveniently eat on board. In their naval expeditions they kept close to the shore, and landed to take their meals, as stage coaches stop for the passengers to take their dinner. When about to engage, they took down their sail, and depended entirely on their oars, as they could then advance or retreat, according to circumstances. The ships of war being long or narrow, and crowded with men could not bear up against a high wind; but the ships of burden, or the round ships, as they were called, were adapted for the wind; they were worked by fewer hands; and fit for long voyages. The principal vessels used at first were triremes, or ships with three banks of oars; but the Phœnicians or Carthaginians constructed vessels of four and even five banks or oars; vessels built for stateliness and show had sometimes a greater number. Ships of war had usually a beak of wood covered with brass placed on their prows, for the purpose of annoying the ships of the enemy.

THE UNFORTUNATE CIPHER.

A merchant at Marseilles, having a business correspondent on the African coast, bethought him, that as some members of his family had shown a partiality for monkeys, he might gratify them by sending for one or two specimens of these animlas from Africa. Accordingly, he wrote to his correspondent to procure two or three of the finest and most admired species, and transmit them to Marseilles. Chance so ordered it, that the merchant, in putting down the ou (in English or) between the figures 2 and 3, made the o very prominent, while the u remained scarcely visible. Some months afterwards, a ship came in all haste to the old merchant's address to him that [illegible] 200 monkeys, in place of 203 ordered, as promised as soon as possible, to fulfil the enclosed order. The feelings of the consignee may be guessed, when, on moving down to the quay, to satisfy himself on the subject by ocular inspection, he beheld his 100 monkeys, all duly caged and fettered, and grinning at him with the most insufferable pertinacity. It was the moment when a man might reasonably doubt whether it would be best to laugh or cry. So much for the value of ciphers.—La Fenêtre.

☞ It has been remarked that many men have gone from the shoemaker's bench to the pulpit. Indeed, the calling of the shoemaker is such as naturally leads to such a result. He early learns the importance of the sole, as the foundation of his work; and often thinks of his last, with his end continually in view. His lapstone reminds him of the rock on which he should build his house, and also of the stone which slayed Goliah. His uppers remind him of the upper realms to which he should aspire. Whenever he uses a hide, it reminds him that he should not hide his sins under cloaks; and when the [illegible] it reminds him of [illegible] If the shoemaker should not be converted by all these means and up, he is gone, it would betoken great hardness of heart on his part.—Religious Herald.

☞ The profession of [illegible] admirably adapted to encourage meekness. He is daily cautioned that he ought not to form any bad habits; he is early impressed with the importance of a vegetable diet, by the frequent resort to cabbage and early learns not to make a goose of himself. By sitting cross-legged on his platform he is reminded of the Turks and thus reminded that he ought to resist all attemps to convert him to Mahometanism. In fine, a tailor knows that he ought not to cut an acquaintance, but that, when he cuts any thing, he ought to cut his coats and pantaloons. Ibedem.

☞ There is some clever sparring of an interesting nature going on between the Sun and Journal of Commerce. The Journal has the most sagacity, and the Sun has the most wit. The Journal is good at telling stories while the Sun has a knack at speaking the truth. So every quality is fairly represented, as in the case of Mr, and Mrs. Sprat, of whom the poet sang,

"Jack Sprat could eat no fat,
His wife could eat no lean,
And so betwixt them both
They licked the platter clean."

LIFE OF LAMARTINE

Lamartine is now fifty-five years of age. He was born at Macon, in France, Oct. 21st 1792. This town, of twelve thousand inhabitants, is of the swiss frontier, about the same distance to the north of Lyons, the seccond city in the kingdom—we forget—republic, and two hundred miles to the south-east more of Paris. His father, who was a major of cavalry under Louis XVI and who had been imprisoned as an adherent of the Bourbons, soon removed from Macon to an obscure retreat near Milly, where Lamartine passed his early years. His mother, whom he has described as 'most tender and affectionate by nature,' with 'clear and silvery voice,' taught him to read when very young from a pictorial Bible. 'When I had read about half a page with tolerable correctness, my mother allowed me to see a picture; and placing the book upon her knees, she explained the subject to me as a recompense for my progress.' The religious germs thus implanted, were matured and developed in the colledge of the Faith at Belley, where he was sent to be educated. Leaving this cloister, he passed some time in Lyons, visited Italy, and at two-and-twenty in the latter days of the Empire, made his entrance into Paris. There, by turn he rambled wandered in the neighboring forests, and dreamed of literary, especially dramatic fame. On the fal of napoleon, whom he had been brought up to detest, he offered his services to the restored Bourbons, and in 1815 joined the royal body-guard. After the Hundred Days, he retired from military service and completed his first literary work, the meditations poetiques. This he offered to one book-seller after another, in vain; a small volume of pomes by an unknown youth presented but slight temptation to the money wise craft. At length, one, bolder than his brethren consented to usher it into the world. Even then, the volume, without name, preface or introduction, seemed in a fair way to suffer the fate of an untimely birth when by chance, the celebrated critic Jules Janin, cast his eye upon it, bought, and read it.

'Never,' says he, 'shall I forget my delight as I perused this volume of a nameless poet. For, what was my surprise and admiration, when suddenly my dazzled eyes and heart devoured this new world of poetry! when at length they found combined in one book all the sentiments of the heart; all the joys of earth, and all the ecstacies of heaven; all the hopes of the present and all the doubts which shadow the future.' Janin wrote an elaborate review of the poems; and Lamartine, like Byron, whom in many respects he is said to resemble, awoke one morning and found himself famous.' In four years, forty-five thousand copies were sold, and the young poet at once took rank with the most distinguished of his European contemporaries. This literary success opened to him a diplomatic career; he was appointed attache to the legation of Florence and went to Tuscany. There, in 1821, he heard a strange, but tender and melodious voice murmuring in his ear this quotation from his own Meditations;

'Perchance the future may reserve for me
A happiness whose hope I now resign;
Perchance amid the busy world may be
Some soul unknown responsive still to mine!

The 'hope' spoken of in the second verse was that of being united to the object of his love, of whom death had robbed him, and who under the name of Elvira, had been the inspiring theme of the Meditations. But a second Elvira was found; the melodious voice was that of a young, rich, and well-connected English lady, whom in the same year he married at Naples, whither he now went as Secretary to the French embassy. He next visited London in the same capacity, and afterwards returned to Tuscany as Charge'd Affaires. Mean while he continued his devotion to the gentle art. In 1823, appeared his Secondes Meditations, which won for him higher praise, even than, the first; this was followed by Socrates, a sketch. His next publication was the Last Canto of Child Harald, which he was led to write by his admiration of the English bard. It was designed to complete Byron's poem; but, notwithstanding it was an original composition. It glowed with the inspiration of Lamartine's own genius and was received with general favour. In this poem, lamenting the degradation of Italy, he says in conclusion:

'I seek elsewhere forgive, O! Roman shade?)
For men, and not the dust of which they're made.'

The apostrophe involved him in a duel with a Neapolitan officer; Larmartine was dangerously wounded, and his life hung on a thread. But in the true spirit of chivalry, he sought and obtained of the Grande Duke the pardon of his adversary, and thus became the admiration of all Florence. In 1824 he published Le Chant du Sacre; in 1829 he returned to France, and in May published his Harmonies Potique Religieuses. His protracted residence in Italy must have made that country seem to him like a second home; and we cannot wonder at the strong interest which as a ruler of France he has manifested for her liberation, nor at the decided tone in which he has warned Austria away from her borders. Aprill, 1830. Lamartine became a member of the French Academy, and was about to proceed to Africa as Minister Plenerpotentiary when the Revolution of July broke out. Up to this period he had been by birth, education and habit attached to the House of Bourbon. But he thought that his country had higher claims upon him than a king whom he believed to have committed grave errors; having therefore paid his honest adieus to Charles, he threw himself into the new path opened by the Revolution. 'The past said he, is but a dream; we may regret it, but we must not lose the day in weeping fruitlessly over it. Refusing the offer of Louis Philippe to confirm him in the Greek embassy he sought to be returned as a Deputy; but the electors of Toulon and Dunkirk both rejected him. He now resolved to execute a long contemplated project, and in May, 1832, sailed for the East, in a vessel freighted and manned at his own expense. The most remarkable incident connected with this expedition was his interview with Lady Hester Stanhope, the niece of Pitt. This singular and gifted woman was then residing in an almost inaccessible solitude on Mount Lebanon. She believed she possessed a knowledge of astrology, and offered to reveal the future destiny of the visitor, to her unknown even by name. He replied—'In regard to the future, I only believe in God and virture.' She in reply, uttered the following remarkable prediction, which was published at the time in his Pilgrimage to the Holy Land.

'No matter; believe what you please, I see evidently that you are born under the influence of the fortunate, powerful and good stars; that you are gifted with analogous powers which conduct you to one aim; which I could, if you were willing, point out to you at once. It is God who has conducted you hither to enlighten your soul; you are one of those men of a good disposition, whom he requires as his instruments to accomplish the marvellous works which he will soon accomplish among mankind. Let your religious belief be what it may, you are not the less one of those men whom I expected, whom Providence has sent to me and who has a great part to perform in the world that is preparing. In a short time you will return to Europe. The fate of Europe is decided. France alone has a great mission to accomplish.—You will participate in it. I do not yet know in what manner; but if you be anxious to know, I will consult the stars to night and tell it to you. I do not yet know the name of all; I see now three at present—four, perhaps five, and there may be more. One of them is certainly Mercurury which imparts clearness and color to the mind and tongue. You must be a poet; it is legible in your eyes, and in the upper part of your countenance. Lower down, you are under the influance of very different stars almost in opposition; there is an influance of energy and action."

How well recent events have fulfilled this prediction, our readers can judge. Lamartine continued his tour, and afterwards embodied the result of his observations in the charming Pilgrimage, to which we have already referred.

While he still lingered in Syria a sudden stroke plunegd him into the deepest affliction. This was the death of his child Julia, Sole daughter of his house and heart.

How keenly his heart was wounded may be learned from this brief entry in his journal, made on leaving the house in which Julia had embrace him for the last time: I kissed the floor of of her chamber a thousand times, and steeped it with my tears, for it is to me a sainted relic. I still beheld her in every part of it. Meanwhile, he learned that he had been elected Deputy for the Department of the North. He returned home, and on the 4th day of january, 1834, first appeared in the tribune as a parliamentary speaker. There was room to doubt whether he, a poet, and devotee of literature would be able to achieve success on such a theatre. Jeffrey, whose brilliant essays in the Edinburgh Review, had charmed all readers, was compelled to beat a quick retreat from the House of Commons. Lord Byron before him, had also failed in his parliamentary attempt. But the happy intellectual-organization of Larmitine enabled him to triumph. The poet and the statesman ascended together! He won at once universal admiration, and conciliated all the sympathies of all who listened. His political affinities carried him to the side of the Conservatives, then headed by Guizot. On a dissolution of the Chamber he was chosen to represent Macon his birthplace. Gradually he formed and headed a party in the Chamber, styled the Parti Social. He soon out stripped Guizot on social questions, and when the Conservatives were halting or retrogrfunding, he continued to advance. In this attitude of progress he was found by the Revolution of February. Our readers know the glorious rest. Of his last and greatest work The History of the Girondists, we have not room here to speak in adequate terms.

In person, Larmitine is said to be about five feet ten in inches in height, with sharp features and countenance; high and expancive forehead, thick head of hair, now turning grey, prominent brow, dark and sorrewhat deep set eyes, noble look, long nose thin and rather arched, a wide mouth and thin lips marked at sides, a-long, but well defined chin, and dark complexion: altogether the physignomy is striking and prepossessing.—Cong. Journal.

Scenes in Jerusalem.

On the 15th of March, 1848, an entirely new event took place at Jerusalem, of which there is no example in the annals of any history. A Turkish Pacha preached to Christians in the most august of all temples, that of the Holy Scriptures. On the preceeding day, Pacha, Mustapha Zerif, had sent to invite the three Patriarchs, the Latin, the Greek, and the Arminian, who were residing in Jerusalem, to come to him that he might consult with them; and they accordingly went. After several exhortations, tending to the union of the three discordant nations, the Pacha invited the three Patriarchs to meet the next day in the Temple of the Holy Sepulchre, where he himself also went at the hour fixed upon, accompanied by his whole suit. The Patriarchs being assembled and joined by the Father Procureur, and their suit of Brothers, Monks, and Turkomans, the Pacha made an address to them in the Turkish language, inculcating peace, concord, and harmony, in order to set a good example to the people; and concluded by saying that they ought to do this for the love of Jesus Christ; before whose Sepulchre they were.—Peace was made, and the Latin Patriarch said to the Pacha, "I congratulate myself, that your Excellency, being at Jerusalem, to administer justice, you have made yourself the conciliator of peace between Cristians—an office of the greates honor and highest glory."

The next day the Greek, with the Armenian Patriarch, paid a visit to the Latin Patriarch, who received them graciously; and on the following day, the Latin with the Arminian Patriarch, paid a visit to the Greek Patriarch. The visit to the Arminian Patriarch was still unpaid, and unhappily, it did not take place, for the Patriarch's exhortations to peace had not reached Bethlehem on the 18th; and on that day whilst the Frank monks were according to their custem, walking in procession in the Holy Grotto, the Greeks attacked them with arms, and one of the monks was seriously wounded in the head. The wounded man immediately set off for Jerusalem, where he was presented to the Pacha by the Father Guardian; but the Custos of Bethlehem could not go to Jerusalem, because he had been even still more wounded than the monk had been. On the 19th, upon the representations of the Latin Patriarch, and of the Sardinian Consul, whose subject the monk was, the investigation of the attack was summoned to Jerusalem before the Pacha, and imprisoned. This is the seventh time since January, 1847 that the Greeks have insulted and beated the Latins; and it is the first that the Latins have obtained the slightest satisfaction. On the 20th, by virtue of the treaty of [illegible] Greek who had been arrested was set at liberty, and on the 21st the visit of the Patriarchs was resumed. Thus, thanks to peaceful and friendly intercourse among the Christians has been established by the exhortations of the Pacha.—From the Maltese Portfolio.

A Dramatic Sketch.

Scene, a parlor with gas lights burning and coal fire diffusing an agreeable heat.

Husband—(sitting at a centre table, papers before him, and addressing his wife) My dear, I have just been reckoning the expenses of our family for the year, and find them to be considerably greater than our income justifies. Cast your eye over this schedule, and you will be surprised to see how much we have expended, and be convinced of the necesity for retreachment. First, a thousand dollars per annum is the estimate for expenditure—thus, house rent $300; [illegible] hire, $200; tailor's and milliner's bills, $300; articles bought at fancy stores, $300; teaching & concerts, $150; [illegible] $300; three servants wages, $200; [illegible] proceed, you can examine the [illegible] yourself. Now, the question is, [illegible] retrench? It is true, I have invested $500 a year; but unless I can do better than this I can scarcely hope to acquire the competency I have so long anxiously desired, and upon which I can retire from the cares of business.

Wife.—I am as ready as you can be to retrench if it be possible; but you know, my dear, that it is necessary to keep up appearances. Our station in society demands this, as well as our daughters, who you know, are growing up, and whose prospects depend on our keeping up a genteel establishment. Still, I think, we have been rather extravagant not in our necessary expenses, but in our charities. You recollect, you gave to the Missionary Society $20, to the Tract Society $20, to the Deaf and Dumb, Blind and Lunatic Asylum $25 each, and I have been in the habit of paying a dollar a year, to—let me see—seven, different societies; and then too, you recollect, our new is 25 a year, and, think, besides this we have given at least $30 during the past year to other charities. And then the Religious Newspapers and Missionary Herald cost several dollars. We can disdpense with those publications, as we take a daily political paper. Now, all these things count up, and I really think we are not called on to do so much. There is Mr A. and Mr B. and Mr C. that are worth five times as much as we are, and I never heard of them contributing to such objects.

Husband—(musing) Well it does appear to me, that we have been a little too liberal in these matters, and,—

(Here a knock is heard at the door, and a gentleman is ushered in, in whose countenance benignity and severity are strangely mingled.)

Conscience.—I hope I do not intrude, but overhearing your conversation, I could not forbear to venture an opinion on the subject of it. You find your expenditures have been too lavish, and wish to curtail them?

Husband and Wife.—Exactly so.

Conscience.—And you wish to begin by retrenching your charities?

Husband and Wife.—That appears to be the most natural way of accomplishing our objects.

Conscience.—Suppose you begin with your luxuries and superfluities. God's providence has bestowed on you all you possess, and do you owe him no acknowlengement for this? If you withhold benevolence from God's poorer creatures, can you expect he will continue his benevolence to you? Does he not hold you in his hand, and can he not, in a moment, blast your prospects, and bring you and your children into a situation to be recipients of charity? If you show no mercy, can you expect mercy? Is there not an account to be given of your stewardship? Would not a very trifling retrenchment in your household expenses, enable you to keep your charities—and in doing this, would you not feel better, and have a surer prospect that your money would prove a blessing to you, and not prove a curse to your children.

Husband and Wife.—(excited.)—This, sir, is a very unwarrantable and imprudent intrusion upon our private matters.

Conscience—(retiring.)—I have nothing more to say at present; but remember, I will visit you hereafter, when you will be compelled to listen to more unpalatable truths.

The Rothschilds.

The following account of the origin and progress of the house of Rothschilds will be found interesting. It will be recollected that Baron Rothschild, resident in London, has recently been elected a member of Parliament; and a change in the English constitution being necessary to admit a Jew to Legislative honors and privileges, the necessary amendment was made, and the "dog of a Jew" was placed by the side of the "proud Saxons." Recently, the English were compelled to yield the legal restrictions on the issue of the Bank of England because the Baron Rothschild threatened to withdrew his deposits unless the Ministry changed the law, and again the Saxon was compelled to yield to the Jew.

In the year 1740, in a little Jewish settlement in Frankfort-on-the-Maine, dwelt a family of poor, but respectable Jew pedlars, and in that year they were blessed with a son whom they called Mayer Anselm Rothschild. They gave him what education their small means would permit, but dying when he was at the age of eleven, left him to his own resources. He then earned a scanty living by writing, which he soon abandoned for a trade. But his ambition was to be a priest of his religion. Fortunately for tottering dynasties of the present day, this was not accomplished. His trade required him to travel, and after some years he returned to his native place, and established a mall business. He soon, however, gained considerable notoriety as a collector of old and curious coins, which brought him much in contact with persons of rank among whom it was fashionable to make such collections; and finally he went to Hanover, as a clerk in a large house. Subsequently, with a few years savings, he returned to Frankfort, married, and commenced a little exchange business. His great sagacity, strict punctuality, and rectitude of conduct, pushed him rapidly forward, and towards the close of the century the Frankfort banking house had become famous, and the profits large. The banker in the mean time brought up ten children, of whom five sons were "after his own heart;" and when he died, he left them his vast wealth and extensive business, with the injunction to dwell in strict and unbroken unity. And the injunction then bestowed has been faithfully carried out. The five sons conducted as many banking house at the leading capitals of Europe. They were as follows: the eldest, Anselm, was born in 1773, and was the most substantial citizen of Frankfort; and representing the father, was the head of the whole operations of the house. The second, Solomon, born in 1774, became a citizen of Vienna, where he is held in high estimation as a man, as well as a member of the most stupendous banking house in the world. The fourth son, Charles was born in 1778, and has since 1821 conducted the house at Naples, where his popularity is equal to any of his brothers. The youngest son Jacob, was born in 1792, and is the banker at Paris, where maintains a splendour that eclipses most of the princes of Europe. The third son we have yet to mention, Nathan, who was born in 1777, and became the head of the London house in 1798, and was in every intellectual respect a giant. It was observed of him that should he share in the chase it could only be to hunt elephants.

These five houses, combining all the financial resources of Europe in their movements, which are always simultaneous, have exercised for fifty years a power unseen, but overwhelming. Nearly all the governments debts of Europe are of their contracting. Through the wars of Bonaparte their informations was always correct, and always in advance of the British goverment, which was often dependent upon them for information, as means of action. Although their residences were always widely separated, each controlling all means of information, no important transaction was entered into without consultation and strict harmony of opinion among them all. Commercial exchanges and all movements of business were often known to and controlled by the old Jew in Frankfort, who could, in the exercise of his great power look with contempt upon feeble despots crying to him for help; and the aid asked depended on the assent of the five brothers. Accordingly they were courted in every possible way. In 1813, they were made private commercial counsellors to the Hessian Government; also to the Austrian Emperor who conferred on them the rank of Barons. In 1836, Nathan died, leaving £3,000,000l. and seven children, of whom four were sons. The eldest, Lionel, who had been made Knight of Isabella, by the Catholics at Madrid, and who is a Baron of Austria, in right of his father, appeared in 1836, on the London Change in the place his father had occupied for thirty-eight years. This gentleman it is who has become a member of Parliament at the change in the English Constitution.

The House combined loaned the king of the French the money supposed necessary to keep him on the throne a few years longer. It is manifest that as this house has grown up with government debts, the continuance of their power is in some degree dependant upon existing government. A branch of the house has been established in New-York, conducted by Auguste Belmont a relative of Solomon Rothschild, of Vienna. Republican free trade, however, is not the soil on which the stupendous business of the great loan contractor will best flourish.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA LIBERIA, DECEMBER 29, 1848

Republican Legislature.

The legislature is in session, and at the time we write, is drawing its deliberations to a close. The multitude of affairs which has demanded our attention added to feeble health, has deprived us of the pleasure, which we no doubt would have received from a constant personal attendance, at the deliberations of this important branch of our government. For although, not at present a member of the government, our interest is unabated in its vigorous and healthy sustentation. The subjects taken up at this session are not numerous. The most important is the judiciary.

The system of judiciary established by the last legislature has been from the first moment of its operation up to the present, the subject of loud and almost general complaint: and although we will not say how just these complaints are, yet it is but fair to confess that the system was perfected and thrown through on almost the last day of the session, when the minds of the senate were wholly absorbed, and greatly agitated by angry discussions, which had taken place on other subjects. No alteration has yet been made, though modifications and amendments have been submitted; and we are in doubt, whether if an alteration should be made, it will be for the better; unless, as is rarely the case in Liberia, it has been the subject of previous prolonged attention. It is perhaps better to let it alone for the present, and give the subject the benefit of another year's consideration.

A new code of criminal law is talked of, and it has been suggested to appoint an individual or a committee to draw up a code and present it at the next legislature. We confess the necessity, and we are confident every one who has any thing to do with the law, will respond a hearty amen. Nothing can be conceived more perplexing than our present code; the enactments of one session have invariably been the subjects of repeal the next;—and if there had been as invariably a whole sale repeal of the entire act, or of an entire section of an act, there would not be so much confusion. But when too much of the act as relates to—is hereby repealed" this year, "and so much of" this same reappearing act is next year, "thereby repealed;" and this killing and making [illegible] "Philadelphia [illegible] day, and [illegible] which has [illegible] And who is to blame for all this? No one: it is the necessary consequence of rapidly enacting without previous thought.

We fall in with equal readiness with the suggestion as to the mode by which the code should be prepared.

It may seem in the eyes of some a presumption to talk of preparing a criminal code in Liberia. Law we are told has become a science, and a science so obscure that deep and profound learning is required to understand it, to explore what is dark—trace analogies and discrimtnate differences. If so, it is not the law adapted to man; for of the people who inhabit our globe, not two in ten have the requisite ability to determine whether they are in the road that conducts to the degredation of the scaffold or to the pinacle of honorable ambition; and were we not afraid of being written a clown, we would declare it as our settled conviction, that where to an honest man of common sense mystery in law begins, at that point its utility and efficacy for general good are deplorably enfeebled; and the facts that we are not a learned people and cannot fathom the depths of scientific law, are amongst the strongest arguments, why we shall have a code prepared in Liberia. But that we are competent to form a system of law efficient for all practical purposes, is demonstrated by the well known fact, that up to the present moment, we have been regulated by laws made by ourselves: and if anarchy disorder and irregularity arising from hasty legislation have rioted here, we have felt their inconvenience not more than is confessedly experienced in those communities where law is a science of which, the governed have can never attain one clear idea.

We therefore strongly advocate the measure—extending the work beyond what is usually understood by the phrase criminal law; to the whole intercourse of man with man in his domestic circle and relations—to all that relates to his reputation, person and property.

Nor need the matter end here; it might embrace a system of Judiciary. The present system, as we have already stated is a subject of general complaint. Some improvements can doubtless be made; but we are far from the opinion that the reasons for disturbing the present judiciary, are as urgent as for an enlarged settled and well defined code of law.

It should be be borne in mind that in the remarks made above, we have reference to laws which affect ourselves and those only who come amongst us. In our intercourse abroad we must expect to conform to the maxims of the world, and prepare to be lost in that labyrinth of scientific law, out of which no man of scientibe can hope ever to find his way.

We would suggest that the expressions be simple and concise—that each idea be clearly expressed, but in the fewest possible words—that no terms be used but those to which the mass of the people has assigned a fixed and determinate meaning—that all barbarous and fatiguing repetitions be avoided, and that not one word be added to a clear and complete expression of the meaning.

It occurs to us that another great improvement might be made: and although the proud pedan and the votary of mystery might frown with indignity upon the attempt, yet the genius of the English language would applaud and if we succeed, crown us as reformers. The improvement we suggest is the banishment in every possible case of every word which is not purely English, or a well known denizen of the language, by long and familiar intercourse among the people. There would be nothing unreasonable in this: On the contrary, it would be a redeeming of our language from the odium of incapability, for all the purposes of communicating thought and expressing action. The language which gave expression to the lofty conceptions of Milton and Burke, and Newton and Hall, and Chalmers, and of one almost immortals who signed the declaration of American Independence, cannot be wanting in vigor, precision or copiousness, for all the purposes of life. What idea is there in nisi prius, or Habeas corpus, or non coram Judice, or mandamus, that cannot be adequately expressed in English? As they now stand, none but the initiated can comprehend them; whereas were they expressed in English, even periphrastically, the learned and the unlearned would at once understand them. A poor ignorant man applies for a divorce, and after week of anxiety, he is told that his wife is divorced a mensa et thora; but not a vinculo matrimonii. What does he know of the matter? If instead he is told she no longer shares his bed and board, but that some of the responsibilities assumed by marriage are still [illegible] to him, he at once knows his position, and how easily can any one possessing an english tongue express the sentiment, or english brains, understand it!

If, however chosen exotics must adorn the borders of our beautiful english paterre, let them be the odorous and splendid productions of sunny Africa. And this is the more reasonable, as we indulge the hope that our institutions will exert a recuperative and healthful influence upon the tribes around us. Already there are certain words of equal currency amongst us and them. As for instance the word "palaver," Suppose we should name our justice court "palaver;" our oyer and terminer "big palaver;" and our supreme court, from which there is no appeal, "Great devil palaver;" all would understand them, neither we who are acquainted with the African manners, nor they would be at any loss. Every thing would be plain. In that case our Chief Justice would be "Grand Devil," and the subordinate officers of that court "devil's mates."

One of the first Settlers.

On the 9th, inst. Mr. Charles Brander, breathed his last. Mr. Brander was one of the small remnant of the expedition by the Nautilus in 1821, which was the second in the enterprise of African Colonization. He came to this shore with the other settlers in 1822, was present at and took part in the fearful struggle which took place on the first day of December of that year. Mr. B. was buried on the 10th. The body had been conveyed the evening previous to the M. E. Church, of which Mr. B. was a member—thence on sabbath morning to the house appointed for all the living, followed by nearly the whole population of the town. The occasion was honored by the presence of the volunteer companies and their martial music. While we are sensible of the respect intended, and feel happy that the sentiment holds its place amongst us, we cannot say we altogether agree with this mode of displaying it. If it were a question whether silent grief cannot be as sincere and deep, as loud and boisterous wailing, or whether respect can manifest itself in any way but by professions, still we would object to disturbing the stillness and solemnity of the sabbath by the thumping of drums and the fire of muskets.

The Harmattans are blowing. They have commenced earlier than usual, and they have brought with them their usual accompaniments of colds, chills and fevers. Mr. Ashmun was correct when he said the periods when these winds blow are very irregular. They sometimes commence as late as the middle of January. This year they blew a strong breeze as early as the middle of the present month.

Royal Funeral.

Old King Doongalee is no more. He breathed his last, no one knows when, as it would be a profanation to suffer it to be known when majesty is undergoing that awful change. He is however dead, and while we write, his loving subjects are carousing, revelling, dancing and firing guns, by way of testifying their great grief and sorrow for his loss. He was in our opinion a very poor king, we speak of this world's goods; but rich enough, as we were assured a few days since by one of his people to have forty wives, all of whom are shared out among his intimates. Eleven kings have assembled to honor the occasion.

"Ladies' Monrovia Literary Institute."

We are glad to be able to announce that an institution of the above name has been formed and is now in successful operation. Such an institution was highly needed amongst us. We have other institutions of a charitable character, such as the Dorcas, the Benevolent, and Union Sisters, whose object as their names import, is to alleviate the sufferings of the poor and destitute; and their efforts are entitled to great praise. The Monrovia Institute has another [illegible] view, the improvement of the mind, than which, we can conceive of nothing more important. There have been two meetings, at one of which, we had the pleasure to be present. Certain Ladies had been appointed at the previous meeting to read; and certain questions in history, cronology and natural philosophy had been submitted to others to answer in writing at the ensuing meeting. We confess we were much disappointed in the manner which all acquitted themselves. The reading was far above the average of either pulpit or forinsic reading in the settlement, and the answers evinced a research that is highly creditable. Go on ladies; you have embarked in a noble career, and if you persevere you will accumulate upon your young country a debt of obligation which it will never be able to cancel. There is nothing selfish, nothing sordid, nothing for exclusive benefit in your institution. Your object is the elevation, the enlightenment and the expansion of mind, and at no higher object can mortals aim. Dr. Lugenbeel is engaged to deliver an address before the institution on the first evening of the ensuing year.

On Tuesday the 28th, ult. Mr. James held an examination of his school. We had the pleasure of witnessing the progress the pupils had made during the year. We are bold to state that the examination reflected great credit upon Mr. James as an efficient and successful teacher; and also upon the children, many of whom evinced great capacity. On the succeeding day an exhibition was held at the M. E. Church. A crowded house testified the interest which the good people of Monrovia feel in education. The affair was well conducted. Many of the pieces rehearsed were original, the productions of Liberians, and they showed that there is a rich vein of latent talent in the Republic, which only requires application and a filling opportunity to bring it forth. We would suggest but on the next exhibition we bestir ourselves and have nothing but home productions upon the literary board. We can safely commend Mr. and Mrs James as faithful teachers.

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Liberia Herald.

Messrs Editors:—Sirs, please allow me the use of your columns, to throw out a few suggestions to our citizens, or, more particularly the merchantile and farming portion. We all are aware of the scarcity of money. Now the inconvenience arising therefrom, should necessarily bring us to consider why it is so; and if we can find out the cause, the inconvenience experienced, will naturally prompt us to seek some probable plan, by which we can retain it amongst us. In reflecting upon the matter, a plan has suggested itself to my mind, which I freely give to the public, whether they receive as a good one, and worthy to be put into practice, or, one to be laughed at, as the visionary notions of a jackass. It is scarcely necessary for me to say—as it is known to all—that all the specie that is afloat in our Republic is brought in by foreign vessels—upon them we are entirely dependent for a circulating medium—as we coin none. Whenever man-of-war vessels anchor in our harbor, every thing becomes alive; because the main purpose of such visits, is to spend money in getting supplies; they unlike other vessels that visit our waters, come solely to bring us specie, whilst others come solely to take it away; such being the fact, if we can adopt a plan to retain the specie brought amongst us, and can manage our affairs so as to satisfy the demands of those who drain us of our cash, we will remedy the scarcity, and promote general welfare by adopting the following plan, by which specie can be spread throughout the Republic. There is a large number of persons in the settlements around us, who do, and can raise a large quantity of things, such as, pepper, arrow-root, coffee, ginger, sugar, eggs, chickens, ducks, calves, sheep, goats, cotton and many other things, which they seldom bring to Monrovia, because they can find none or but little sale for them. No one will give them cash for their articles, therefore they must take goods in exchange at enormous prices, consequently, country people are not stimulated to raise any thing for market, and nothing but absolute necessity, can induce them to come to town to barter, as they conceive that the town people take advantage of their necessity, and impose on them by asking exorbitant prices for goods. Now suppose all the merchants were to come to a general understanding, and make known to the country people in every direction, that they —the merchants, will purchase all the above named articles, and other at certain set prices, in quantities, however small or large, and that they will pay one half in cash, such would at once stimulate the country people to raise such articles for market; they would feel assured that their produce would be immediately disposed of, and at prices that would afford them a living, and at the same time, give them a chance to obtain a little cash, to hoard away, as a consoler for times of need. Such a plan I am almost sure, would create an impulse among the country people, that would soon cause the fields to teem with produce, and the barn-yards to be merry with the music of cattle and poultry; every person would produce some thing, because of the surety of sale, and the known price would be an inducement, and daily we would see numbers of canoes gliding to our wharves, ladened with an abundance of all sorts of articles for our immediate consumption, for supplying man-of-war vessels, and after such was accomplished, there would still be, a considerable surplus on hand for exportation. Now if we can get the plan to work thus far, which is as easy as sliding down a hill, it is but once commenced, because it would be the interest of one, of course to effect, we at once would have it in our power to keep the specie in the Republic, by exporting our surplus articles. The several quantities purchased by each merchant, would enable each to constantly have on hand a large quantity of articles always ready for shipment, and when such merchant, desires to purchase goods in America or elsewhere, or to pay bills in other countries, he would only have to ship his produce to any port he might chose, and direct a commission merchant as desired.

Thus goods could be purchased, and bills paid in other countries, without sending a nine-pence cash out of the Republic.

OBITUARY.

For the Liberia Herald.

Departed this life at Marshall, on the 25th ultimo, Mrs. Jane Henderson, consort of Mr. A. B. Henderson, after a protracted illness of about eight months in the 44th year of her age. Mrs. Henderson was a member of the Providence Baptist Church in this place, and died in the triumphant hope of a blessed immortality.

She was born in Spotsylvania Country and State of Virgina, 1806. At an early age she experienced the religion of Jesus Christ; and shortly afterward she was moved from that place to New Orleans; where she was baptised in full faith of her redeemer. She remained there about twenty years. In 1842 she emigrated to Liberia; survived the ferver, and lived about six years. After which, she was taken with an illness which terminated her existence. Mrs. Henderson was a person possessing a bold and persevering spirit, not easly danuted nor moved out of her course. But she is gone, and we trust from labor to reward. She expressed a willingness to depart, and said a few hours before she died; that the "Angels of God had come to convey her soul home to glory."

Jesus how glorious is thy grace,
When in thy name we trust,
Our faith receives a righteousness
That makes the sinner just:
We walk by faith and not by sight,
Tell we arrive at rest.

The hour of my departure is come,
I hear the voice that calls me home,
I come, I come, at thy command,
I give my spirit to thy Hand:
Stretch forth thine everlasting arm,
And shield me in the last alarm.

Pleasing Others.

We should study to please—to please everybody, rich and poor, the agreeable and the repulsive, the saint and the sinner, the elevated and the humble. No matter how disagreeable a person may appear at first sight, we should not turn him away with a short word or an indifferent air. He may posses rare jewels in his bosom. Looks are often deceptive. An intimate acquaintance with persons who, at first sight, struck us with disgust, has changed the whole feelings of our souls. Hatred has been turned into love. Scores of such instances appear in the lives of those who study to please. They have learned this fact—that the outward appearance is not a true index of the heart—and so they make themselves agreeable to all. They will be as pleasant to the servant as to the white—and be as anxious to accommodate the one as the other.

There is no disposition that needs more cultivation than a pleasant and agreeable one. Study to please, we advise you. Be not cross and crabbed; give no mopish answer to an inquiry, and never hesitate to go a few steps out of your way, if so be you can please and accommodate another. Who will not labor to please?

The Sun behind the Clouds.

The children of God have an eternal and overflowing fountain of consolation opened, in the plan of the Gospel discipline and salvation, which is set before them. There is no condition, no sorrow, no gloom and heaviness of spirit to which it is not adapted, and to which it is not fully adequate for all the relief that it is best for them to receive. Journeying through this vale of tears, they must needs pass through many a dark and gloomy avenue. Storms, yea, tempests of sorrow and distress will assail them, and beat upon them. From the dark cloud that is over them, the thunders will be heard, and the lightning flash be seen. Bow to the storm they must—its violence will admit of no effectual resistance. But look! battered and way-worn traveller, as thou liest prostrate in the dust by reason of the tempest; direct your sight beyond the dark and frowning borders of that cloud which is bursting with all its violence upon you. See! there is a streak of clear sky beyond, of golden light diffusing [illegible] and splendors abroad. It will brighten your path, and conduct you and [illegible] ward to that blessed place where the Lord Jesus will be your everlasting light, and the Saviour God is glory that will never wane.

HABIT.

Few have sufficient respect for habit, the ease with which it may be formed, the difficulty with which it can be broken, the magical power with which it smooths the rough path of duty, and enables us to look with indifference upon the allurements of the world. It is a kind of shield, which the fingers of a boy may, at first weave of threads light as gossamer, and which yet grows into the strength of steel. By its aid the greatest things are accomplished. The cultivation of proper habits should be impressed on the young. Isolated acts are of little comparative importance. In short, a correct habit of living is principle, without which no one can be happy.

Epitaph on a Lawyer.

"Beneath this humble mound, Pleapwell hic jacet.
Who ne'er rise again till Deo placet,
He in his life-time many a harrangue fecit,
Death grudged his fame, and at him his dart jecit."

Another on a man who had erected a large stone edifice:

"Here lies William Trollup.
Who did all these stones roll up,
And when death took his soul up,
His body filled this hole up.

☞Men are very prone to think that there is no virtue out of their church or particular class. What men want more than all things else, is to know each other. We never love a person till we know him or her, and we never know till we love, so that love and wisdom go hand in hand.

☞An English doctor among the Turks, has made love to two or three wives of some big bug, and the said ladies have reciprocated his tenderness.

☞All sects, however peaceable, will take an intruder by the throat and put him out of church if he insists on preaching against their will. Even the Quakers will do that. The Methodites make no bones of it. We wonder if the Apostles used to lug out offenders in that way.

Spare not thyself. The greatest good is only accomplished by the greatest pains. "He that soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly and he that soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully."

Maintain cheerfulness. The demon of melancholy unnerves religious effort. Be joyful in the Lord; for the joy of the Lord is strength. Rarely will you find a better motto than this: "Serve God and be cheerful."

POETRY.

From the Southern Baptist.

Conscience.

"How aptly and well are the melancholy regrets and the meekness and humility which our conscious short comings must inspire, expressed in the gentle words of the poet."

It is not what my hands have done
That weighs my spirit down;
That cast a shadow o'er the sun,
And our earth a frown;
It is not my heinous guilt,
Or vice by men abhorred;
For fair the fame that I have built
A fair life's just reward;
And men would wonder if the knew
How sad I feel with sins so few.
Alas! they only see a part,
When thus they judge the whole;
They do not look upon the heart,
They cannot read the soul,
But I survey myself within,
And mournfully I feel
How deep the principle of sin
Its roots may there conceal,
And spread its poison through the frame,
Whithout a dread that men would blame,
They judge by actions which they see
Brought out before the sun;
But conscience brings reproach to me
For what I'v left undone;
For opportunities of good
In folly thrown away;
For time misused in solitude;
Forgetfulness to pray;
And thousand more omitted things,
Whose memory fills my breast with stings.
And therefore is my heart oppresst
With thoughtfulness and gloom;
Nor can I hope for perfect rest
Till I escape this doom.
Help me, the Merciful and Just!
This fearful doom to fly;
Thou art my strength, my peace, my trust;
O help me, lest I die!
And let my full obedience prove
The perfect power of faith and love.

LIVING IT DOWN.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

"Widow of the late Herman Bassford?" inquired Mr. Coleman, speaking quickly, and evincing a sudden interest.

"Yes sir," replied the woman, in a low voice, while her eyes dropped to the floor.

"I knew your husband well, and highly esteemed him," said Coleman. "He was one of our best men. If there is any thing in which I can serve you, I shall be most happy to do so. Pray feel perfectly free to command my services."

"For your kindness I feel truly grateful," returned the widow. "I need a clear and strong minded adviser, and have come to you as such. You are aware, I presume, that Mr. Anderson was named in my husband's will as executor to his estate. I had understood from him that you were to be the executor. Why he changed his mind, I cannot tell. But that avails nothing now. From Mr. Anderson I have never been able to get money, except in small sums. The amount thus far received, has been really inadequate to the support of my family since my husband's death. Yesterday I asked him for two hundred dollars and he told me that I could not have it. I asked when he could give me money, and received an evasive answer. I am afraid something is wrong. Will you advise me what to do?"

"Is it possible that Mr. Anderson treats you in this way?" said Coleman in surprise. "It is very wrong. How much have you received from him since the death of Mr. Bassford?"

"A little over two thousand dollars."

"Is that all?"

"Yes sir, every dollar."

"I think Mr. Elliotson was your husband's legal adviser?"

"I believe he was."

"Have you seen him?"

"No sir. I have not spoken a word on the subject before, to any one. My business in calling upon you, is to ask your advice as to what is best to be done. The only apology I have to offer for troubling you, is the confidence I have in your integrity. I need a discreet, intelligent, and energetic adviser, and such I believe you will be if you consent to aid me."

"That I will most cheerfully do, as well for the sake of your husband as for the sake of what is just. Perhaps it would be best for me to consult Mr. Elliotson at the outset."

"Perhaps it would. But I will leave all that to your better judgment."

On that very day Mr. Coleman waited upon the lawyer, and after stating the case of Mrs. Bassford, desired to know what were the steps necessary to be taken in order to make the executor pay over the money he had received more freely into the hands of the widow. Mr. Elliotson, who had written out the will had understood, precisely the duties and responsibilities of the executor, expressed great surprise at what he heard, and said that by the requirements of the will, it was the duty of Mr. Anderson to close up the business of the testator immediately, collect all debts, and as fast as it could safely be done, invest what was received in good real estate in the name of the widow, and hand her over the title deeds

"Nothing of this kind has been done," said Mr. Coleman.

"And yet the testator has been dead more than twelve months. There is something wrong there, depend upon it.

"I'm afraid there is. But whether there is or not, immediately steps must be taken to protect the widow in her rights. And I wish you, therefore, to commence the required proceedings against the executor."

"I will do so. First, however, I will write Mr. Anderson a note, setting forth the complaint of the widow, and desiring him to call upon me."

A day or two afterward Mr. Coleman learned from the lawyer that the executor refused to give any satisfaction, or to answer any questions, and that he had been cited to appear before the Judges of the Orphan's Court to show cause why he had not fulfilled the provisions of the instrument under which he was acting.

"I regret very much," remarked the lawyer, "that Mr. Bassford selected this man as the executor of his will. You, sir, were his first choice, and your name remained in the instrument for some years. But, circumstances occurred that led him to substitute the name of Mr. Anderson."

"Ah! I was not aware of that. That base slander against my character, set on foot by the husband of my niece on the part of Mr. Bassford."

"Yes sir! I happen to know that that was the reason."

"Thank God! I have lived that slander down. I said I would do so, and I have." Mr. Coleman spoke proudly.

"But it took too much time, unfortunately, Mr. Coleman. While you were living it down, great wrong has, I fear, been done. Your character has come out clear. but what can compensate for the loss of an honest man's influence in society even for the space of a few years?"

"What else could I have done? I gave no cause for the base detraction. Those who originated it must answer for the consequences."

"Living a slander down, Mr. Coleman, is not always the right course for us to take," replied the lawyer. "It would do very well were we alone concerned; but while we are engaged in living it down, our usefulness in society is abridged, and others are liable to sustain injury, as in the present case."

"What then would you have a man do, situated as I was?"

"I would have him not only live right, for that is the duty of every man; but I would have him make use of all the means in his power to disabuse men's minds of the errors under which they are laboring. In your hands were ample means for this purpose. It would have been an easy matter for you to have called together a certain number of well known and influential individuals, and laid before them a full statement of your executorship, by which act your integrity in their minds would have been fully established."

"Humble myself in that way, Mr. Elliotson! No—never!"

"I do not see that there is any thing humiliating about it. Every man's opinion is made up from evidence, and how there can be any thing humiliating in our furnishing the minds of our fellow men the evidence by which a false judgment may be corrected, is beyond my comprehension."

"What right had they to make a false judgment of my acts?

"Because one who was presumed to know alleged that you had committed a wrong, and to sustain his allegation were very plausible appearances. Every body believed that your brother had left a large estate in your hands for his daughter, and when but fifteen or twenty thousand dollars appeared, were naturally very much astonished. I own that I was; and also, that I was led to doubt your integrity, and to concur with Mr. Bassford in substituting Mr. Anderson for you as executor. Since then, the true facts of the case have come to my knowledge from a particular friend of yours, to whom you submitted a full explanation with substantiating documents of the whole affair. So, after all, Mr. Coleman, you have not so much lived down the slander, as corrected public opinion by giving it the proper evidence for arriving at a just conclusion. At least it was so in my case, and I believe it has been so in every other case. I know very well that all whom I have heard speak of having changed their sentiments are in possession of the facts of the case. What your subsequent life has been is not taken into the account at all. Men's minds, Mr. Coleman, must have some evidence by which to correct a false judgment, and if we withhold this, we do a wrong to society by robbing it of our influence. Pardon me for speaking so plainly. The peculiar nature of the circumstances that have occurred, have impressed the truth I have uttered so strongly upon my mind, that I could not help declaring it."

Mr. Coleman was silent. He saw as well as felt that what Mr. Elliotson had said was true, and that he had been wrapping himself up in false pride and the dignity of mere self and suffering wrong to be done, which a little properly directed effort on his part would have prevented. He left the lawyer's office a wiser man, at least, though not as self-complacent and happy as when he entered it.

A week after, and it was announced in bussiness circles that Mr. Anderson had failed for a heavy amount. It did not take long to ascertain that the property of the widow and orphan had been used in his business, and that all was involved in the failure.

Spurred on by a consciousness of the error he had committed, Coleman instituted vigorous measures, through Mr. Elliotson, for the maintenance of the widow's interests. Unfortunately the security given by Mr. Anderson proved to be merely nominal. Nothing was to be expected except from the estate of the failing executor. At the final settlement off this forty-five cents on the dollar was the whole sum realized which left Mrs. Bassford and her children the possessors of just thirty thousand dollars instead of more than double that sum. There was no one who did not believe that Anderson had embezzled the widow's property. He continued to live in his usual style, although out of business. But nothing like property could be found and identified as his.

Results of a like character with this though varying in their external features always follow, when men seek, in the pride of conscious integrity, to "live down" a serious charge that is made against them, instead of at once furnishing evidence to prove their innocence. We hear a great deal said about this "living down" detraction; but we have something besides mere living right to do—that is every man's duty without reference to things external—we must give men the ability to form just estimates of our character whenever we have it in our power. If we do not, we are responsible for any injury that society may sustain in consequence of our influence for good being lost.

An Eccentric Minister.

There lived, a century since, in the city of Boston, an eccentric pastor, known familiarly as "Johnny Morehead." A convention of ministers was held in Boston, and met in his place of worship, to whom president Edwards, then settled at Northampton, was appointed to preach the opening sermon. In consequence of the bad roads, he did not arrive in time for the commencement of the service, and, after waiting, another minister was procured to preach. The service commenced; and while Mr. Morehead was offering up his first prayer, Mr. Edwards came in, with his saddlebags on his arm, and walked up quietly to the head of the aisle, where he stood while the prayer was being made. Johnny went on praying for the blessing of God on his eminent servant, whose absence they had so much reason to regret; thanking him for his great and distinguished mercies conferred on his church by his pious and useful labors, and supplicating the blessings of God for him, that he might long be continued a great and shining light to the church of God in this wilderness in which in his providence his people were planted; and opening his eyes, he discovered Mr. Edward standing below. He went on: "But O Lord! thou knowest that great as thy servant is he is not to be compared to his wife!"—Knickerbocker.

Curious Facts in Natural History

The rattlesnake finds a superior foe in the deer and the black snake. Whenever a buck discovers a rattlesnake in a situation which invites attack, he loses no time in preparing for battle. He walks up within ten or twelve feet of the snake, then leaps forward and aims to sever the body of the snake with his sharp bifurcated hoofs. The first onset is most commonly successful; but if, otherwise, the buck repeats the trial until he cuts the snake in twain. The cautious old policy of the rattlesnake never leaves him a slight chance for its victim either to escape or to inject his poison into its more alert antagonist. The black snake is also more than an equal competitor against the rattlesnake. Such is its celerity of motion, not only in running, but in entwining its victim, that the rattlesnake has no way of escaping from its fatal embrace.—When the black and rattlesnake are about to engage in battle, the former darts forward at the head of the latter, and strikes at the neck of the latter with unerring certainty, leaving a foot or two of the upper part of his own body at liberty. Then instantly he encircles him with five or six folds; in the twinkling of an eye looks the strangled and gasping foe in the face, to ascertain the effect produced upon his convulsed body. If he shows signs of life, the coils are multiplied and the screws tightened—the operator all the while narrowly watching the countenance of the helpless victim.—Thus the two remain thirty or forty minutes—the executioner now and then seeking out a rest, morning at the same time if any signs of life appear if so, the coil is renewed, and so on until the incarcerated wretch is completely dead. The moccasin is destroyed in the same way.

Original Sin.

Luther was one day being shaved, and having his hair cut in the presence of Dr. Jonas. He said to the latter, "Original sin is like the beard. We are shaved to-day, and look clean and have a smooth chin; to-morrow our beard has grown again; nor does it cease growing while we remain on earth. In like manner original sin cannot be extirpated from us; it springs up in us as long as we exist. Nevertheless, we are bound to resist it to our utmost strength, and cut it down unceasingly."

Practical Counsels

Let the Sabbath be sacredly observed. It is impossible that religion should thrive in the heart if this be abused. "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy."

Suffer no excuse to keep you away from the Lord's Supper. It is a fearful indication of guilt where there is a disposition to neglect this last pledge of Christ's love to his church. "Do this" he said "in remembrance of me."

Never leave your own meeting for any attractions of novelty in another. "He that leaveth his place is like the bird that wandereth from her nest."

Use of Afflictions.

Afflictions are the same to the soul as the plow to the fallow ground; the pruning knife to the vine, and the furnace to gold.—Day.

LIBERIA HERALD.

Captain Mercer's Letter to Mr Cresson.

The annexed letter presents a most gratifying picture of the condition and prospects of the new republic on the coast of Africa. It will be read with interest and pleasure by all who feel for the colored race, and will furnish fresh inducements to exertion among those who have promoted and sustained the benevolent enterprise of which it gives so encerishing an account:

(Communicated for the N. American and U. S. Gazette.

U. S. Ship Jamestown,

Madeira May 12th, 1848.

When we unexpectedly met at Havre de Grace for a few moments, when I was on my way to Norfolk to take command of this ship bound to the coast of Africa, to cruise for the double purpose of preventing the slave trade being carried on under our flag, and to protect our constanly increasing commerce on the coast, you requested that I would write to you after I had visited Monrovia, and give my opinion of the state of the colony of Liberia and of its future prospects. I avail myself, with pleasure, of this opportunity to comply with your request.

We have been at Monrovia three times, and at each visit I was ashore repeatedly, mixed freely with the colonists, and took pains to inquire of the most intelligent among them what were their future intentions and prospects, and also as to their present state and condition. On our first visit, in November last, the colony had just declared its independence and published its new constitution as the basis upon which the Republic of Liberia was to be governed. We were prepared for this change, as one of our national vessels, the Boxer, has already saluted the flag of Liberia with twenty-one guns

As soon as we anchored, notice, was sent on shore by Commodore Bolton to Governor Roberts, of our intention to salute the flag of the new Republic. This salute was accordingly fired, and promptly returned, gun for gun.—The next day, the Commodore and myself, and a number of other officers of this ship, went ashore, to wait upon the Governor, with whom we dined by invitation that day. A few days after, the Governor and a small suite came on board, by invitation, and partook of a collation, perpared for the occasion. He was saluted with seventeen guns on leaving the ship. Our intercourse with the Governor and inhabitants, after this interchange of courtesies, was of a most cordial and friendly character. On our second visit, which was in January last, the new government was in operation, Governor Roberts having been duly inaugurated as President, and the Senate and House of Representatives in session. I took occasion one day to visit both houses of Congress, and listened with attention and interest to their debates on the new revenue or tariff law. Every thing was done in the most decorous and orderly manner, each member seeming to understand the subject of discussion fully. The Senate consists of six members and the presiding officer, and the House of eight members and the Speaker.

It was, indeed, to me, a novel and interesting sight, although a Southern man, to look upon these emancipated slaves legislating for themselves, and discussing freely, if not ably, the principles of human rights on the very continent, and, perhaps, the very spot, where some of their ancestors were sold into slavery. Who can foresee what may yet spring from this germ of freedom for the generation of Africa? Knowing the deep interest you feel in the welfare of these people, I have more than once remarked to Governor Roberts and Judge Benedict, "How delighted Mr. Cresson would be, if he could witness, as I do how much happiness he has aided in conferring upon so many human beings, as are here presented to me in Monrovia."

I am quite certain if colonies were established along the coast on the same liberal principle as Liberia, that the salve trade would have to be abandoned along the west coast of Africa as far south as the equator, in ten or fifteen years, and at a cost too less than is now consumed for two or three years, in keeping up the American, French and English squadron, for its suppression. Two or three millions of dollars, judiciously spent, would do all this. I have no correct idea what has been the expense to the Colonization Society in planting and nourishing its colony on this coast, but imagine I am safe in estimating it at no more than four hundred thousand dollars, and with that amount it has, by its energetic, humane, and judicious management, driven the slave trade from an extent of coast of 320 miles, reaching from Cape Mount to Cape Palmas, with the single exception of one slave establishment at New Cess, which President Roberts, by stringent and energetic measures, will soon cause to be abandoned. From Cape Palmas to Cape Three Points the slave trade does not exist; indeed, I believe it may include the coast as far down as Cape St. Paul, as freed from this abominable traffic.—From the latter Cape to Cape Formosa the trade is still in active operation, whence thousands of slaves are taken off yearly, notwithstanding the vigilance of the many cruisers on the coast—the officers and crews of the English and French men-of-war being rewarded with the amount arising from the sales of the vessels captured, besides getting twenty dollars a head for each recaptured slave. It will be perceived, then, that the only part of the coast north of the equator, with the exception of that portion extending from Cape Mount to the Sheba river, which will require colonizing, reaches only from Cape St Paul to Cape Formosa, a distance not exceeding three hundred miles. I am satisfied that this portion of the West Coast is quite as healthy, or to speak more properly, not more unhealthy than the coast of Liberia. There are portions of it, too, where the soil is exceedingly fertile, and indeed, may compare advantageously in this respect with any other part of this coast. Near Quitta, (a Danish fort) adout fifteen miles east of Cape St. Paul, the abundance with which we were supplied with sheep, hogs, fowls, and fruits, and the cheapness of the articles, surprised us very much.

Liberia, I think, is now safe, and may be left, after a while, to stand alone. Would it not be advisable then for the Colonization Society to turn its attention to some other portion of the coast, and extend the area of its Christain and philanthropic efforts to bettering the condition of the colored people of our country, by sowing, on other parts of the const, some of the good seed which have produced so bountifully on the free soil of Liberia.

I had been led to believe that the site of Monrovia had been injudiciously selected.—On visiting the place, however, I discovered at a glance that I was mistaken; and am now satisfied that there is no place on the coast better adapted for the location of a large town, than the high land upon which Monrovia is built. Its picturesqueness will not fail to strike the stranger forcibly

There is no part of the West Coast of Africa exempt from fever, and the colonist must expect to suffer from its effects for a while after landing at Monrovia, Cape Palmas, or any other point on the Coast of Liberia. On inquiry I find that the number carried off by the fever is not very large, and that the deaths are principally confined to old people and young children. After a year's sojourn those who survive its attacks become so far acclimated as to suffer little from it thereafter. I found several persons living at Monrovia and enjoying excellent health, although old, who came over with the first colonists, settled at Sherbro Island. These have been living in Africa twentyfive years.

In no part of the world have I met with a more orderly, sober, religious and moral community than is to be found at Monrovia. On the Sabbath it is truly a joyful sound to hear hymns of praise offered up to Him who doth promise that "where two or three are gathered together in His name, there He is in the midst of them," and a pleasure to observe how very general the attendance upon divine worship is among these people. I believe every man and woman in Monrovia of any respectability is a member of the church. If you take a family dinner with the President (and his hospital door is always open to strangers) a blessing is asked upon the good things before you set to. Take a dinner at Colonel Huck's (who by the way keeps one of the very nicest tables) and "mine host," with his shiny black intelligent face, will ask a blessing on the tempting viands placed before you.

In conversation with President Roberts during our third and last visit to Monrovia in March last I expressed my apprehensions that if he and a half a dozen others of the leading men of the Republic were cut off by death, it would be impossible to replace them with men of equal abilities. The President did not at all participate in my apprehensions on this point, but expressed a perfect confidence in the belief, that from the general and increasing intelligence of the people, any gap occasioned in this way, might be repaired without any detriment to the welfare of the Republic

On my second visit to Monrovia, while the Congress was in session, I had a fair opportunity of conversing with several members from the three counties in which the state is divided, from whom I was pleased to learn that the people in the interior had begun to turn their attention to agricultural pursuits, being persuaded that their true interests lay in producing more than they have yet been in the habit of doing. Of this pleasing fact had I previously been assured by President Roberts.

It will sound stranger, perhaps, to European ears than to our own, to hear that, the Secretary of the Treasury and of State, and the Chief Justice, are store-keepers, and that the Attorney General of this little Republic is a blacksmith. They were the best materials at hand, and it is to be hoped that for some years to come the diplomatic relations and financial affairs of the Republic will be of so simple a nature as to be easily managed by the present incumbents of the State and Treasury departments, who are men of good sense and honest intentions. Crimes of magnitude against the State will be but few for some time, and such cases as are brought before the Supreme Court of Liberia, will be so plain that honest Judge Benedict, the store keeper and Chief Justice, and the equally honest blacksmith and Attorney General Major Brown, will be able to see to the bottom of them as clearly as Chief Justice Taney and Mr. Attorney General Clifford in our Supreme Court, will unravel the knotty cases, (made still more knotty by the astute and learned gentlemen who plead before them,) submitted for their sage decision.

I think Liberia may require alittle pecuniary aid from abroad for a few years, until she can cast about and provide the ways and means to carry on the government from her own scanty treasury. Already, as in our own country, there are many office seekers, and each officer expects to receive a resonable price for his services. To meet these demands and others upon the treasury, Congress has provided a Tariff law which among its provisions embraces one authorizing the government to monopolize the sale of crockery ware, salt, powder, fire-arms and tobacco. From the duties on these, and the general tariff on imports, they hope to realize a sufficient sum to meet the public expenses; and they feel so confident in not being disappointed in this expectation, that Congress refused to authorize a loan of twenty or forty thousand dollars, before their own financial experiment had been tried.

It is impossible to forescee what will be the fate of this infant republic struggling for national existence; but, whatever that fate may be, it cannot be denied that its career of advancement, up to this period, has been the most astonishingly rapid of any other people, under similar circumstances, that history, ancient or modern, brings to our knowledge. It is not yet a quarter of a century since the first colonists landed at the mouth of the St. Paul's or Messurado river, and took up their abode on a small island, from whence they were obliged to proceed to the the main land in armed parties and fight the natives for the water for their daily use. Now, the colony is peopled with more than five thousand emigrants. Its rule extends, undisputed, along the east from Cape Palmas almost to Cape Mount, a distance of nearly three hundred and twenty miles—seventy thousand natives living within the limits of the republic, acknowledge its power and obey its laws. The capital of the state Monrovia, boasts of about two hundred houses most of them well built, comfortable dwellings, and a population of 1200 inhabitants. The people are moral and religious, and to judge from what I saw at Monrovia, I don't think, for the number of inhabitants, there is a greater amount of human happiness to be found in any part of the world.

What a pleasing reflection it must be to those gentlemen whose humane and Christian hearts first conceived the happy idea of planting this colony, as well as to those, equally to be commended, who have aided in carrying on the good work to its present stage, when they look upon this vast amount of human happiness bestowed by their liberal bounty upon a degraded and down-trodden race, who, in the land of their birth, could have never risen above the degree of "hewers of wood and drawers of water."

I have written this letter in rather a desultory manner, but nevertheless it contains a true expression of my sentiments in regard to Liberia, and as such is at your service. We are now on a short visit to Maderia where next I can't say, perhaps down the coast again. Accept, dear sir, my best wishes for your happiness, and believe me most cordially, yours.

A FUR TRADE ADVENTURE.

BY WASHINGTON IRVING.

Colter, with the hardihood of a regular trapper, had cast himself loose from the party of Lewis and Clark, in the very heart of the wilderness, and had remained to trap beaver alone on the head waters of Missouri. Here he fell in with another lonely trapper like himself, named Potts, and they agreed to keep together. They were in the very region of the terrible blackfeet, at the time thirsting to revenge the death of their companions, and knew they had no mercy to expect at their hands. They were obliged to keep concealed all day in the woody margins of the rivers, setting their traps after nightfall, and taking them up before daybreak. It was running a terrible risk for the sake of a few beaver skins, but such is the life of a trapper

They were on a branch of the Missouri called Jefferson's Fork, and had set their traps at night about six miles from a small river that emptied itself into the Forks. Early in the morning they ascended the river in a canoe, to examine the traps. The banks on each side were high and perpendicular, and cast a shade over the stream. As they were softly paddling along, they heard the trampling of many feet upon shore. Colter immediately gave the alarm of "Indians!" and was for instant retreat. Potts scoffed at him for being frightened at a herd of Buffaloes. Colter checked his uneasiness, and paddled forward. They had not gone much farther, when frightful whoops and yells burst forth from each side of the river, and several hundred Indians appeared on each bank. Signs were made for the unfortunate trappers to come ashore. They were obliged to comply. Before they could get out of their canoe, a savage seized the rifle belonging to Potts. Colter sprang on shore, wrested the weapon from the hand of the Indian, and restored it to his companion, who was still in the canoe, and immediately pushed into the stream. There was a sharp twang of a bow, and Potts cried out that he was wounded. Colter urged him to come a shore and submit, as his only chance for life; but the other knew there was no prospect for mercy, and determined to die game. Levelling his rifle, he shot one of the savages dead on the spot. The next moment he fell himself, pierced by innumerable arrows.

The vengeance of the savages now turned upon Colter. He was stripped naked, and having some knowledge of the Blackfoot language, overhead a conversation as to the mode of despatching him, so as to derive the greatest amusement from his death. Some were for setting him as a mark, and have a trial of the skill at his expense. The old chief, however, was for nobler sport. He seized Colter by the shoulder, and demanded if he could run fast. The unfortunate trapper was too well acquainted with Indian customs not to comprehend the drift of the question. He was to run for his life, to furnish a kind of human hunt to his prosecutors. Though in reality he was noted by his brother hunters for swiftness on foot, he assured the old chief that he was a very bad runner. His stratagem gained him some vantage ground. He was led by the chief into the prairie, about four hundred yards from the main body of savages, and then turned loose, to save himself if he could. A tremendous yell let him know that the whole pack of bloodhounds were in full cry. Colter flew rather than ran; he was astonished at his own speed—but he had six miles of prairie to traverse before he could reach Jefferson Fork of the Missouri; how could he hope to hold out such a distance, with the fearful odds of seven hundred to one against him? The plain, too abounded with prickly pear, which wounded his naked feet. Still he fled on, dreading each moment to hear the twang of a bow and to feel an arrow quivering at his heart. He did not even dare to look around, lest he should loose an inch of that distance on which his life depended. He had run nearly the way across the plain, when the sound of pursuit grew somewhat fainter, and he ventured to turn his head. The main body of his pursuerers were a considerable distance behind; several of the faster runners were scattered in advance; while a swift-footed warrior, armed with a spear, was not more than a hundred yards behind him.

Inspired with new hope, Colter redoubled his exertion, but strained himself to such a degree that the blood gushed from his mouth and nostrils, and streamed down his breast. He arrived within a mile of the river. The sound of footsteps gathered upon him. A glance behind him showed his pursuer within twenty yards, and preparing to throw his spear. Stopping short, he turned round and spread out his arms. The savage, confounded by sudden action, attempted to stop and hurl his spear, but fell in the very act. Colter plucked up the pointed part, pinned the savage to the earth, and continued his flight. The Indians, as they arrived at their slaughtered companion, stopped to howl over him. Colter made the most of this precious delay, gained the skirts of cotton-wood bordering the river, dashed through it, and plunged into the stream. He swam to a neighboring island, against the upper end of which the drift wood had lodged in such quantities as to form a natural raft; under this he dived and swam below water until he succeeded in getting a breathing place between the floating trunks of trees, whose branches and bushes formed a covert several feet above the level of the water. He had scarcely drawn breath after his toils, when he heard his pursuers on the river bank, whooping and yelling like so many fiends. They plunged into the river, and swam to the raft. The heart of Colter almost died within him as he saw them through the chinks of his concealment, passing and repassing and seeking for him in all directions. They at length gave up the search, and he began to rejoice in his escape, when the idea presented itself that they might set the raft on fire. Here was a new source of horrible apprehension, in which he remained until nightfall. Fortunately, the idea did not suggest itself to the Indians. As soon as it was dark, finding by the silence around that his pursuers had departed, Colter dived again, and came beyond the raft. He then swam silently down the river for a considerable distance, where he landed, and kept on all night, to get off as far as possible from this dangerous neighborhood.

COLONIZATION AND GRADUAL EMANCIPATION.

In the Senate of the United States, towards the close of the late session, and while the great Territorial Bill was under discussion, Mr. UNDERWOOD, the Senator from Kentucky, in the course of a speech of marked ability, made the following remarks on the subject of Colonization as the most feasible remedy of slavery. The proposition, coming from a slaveholder of large views and much sagacity, are worthy of consideration, however men may differ as to the terms of the measure which he suggests.

I am no advocate for the institution of negro slavery. I believe its existence in Kentucky to be prejudicial to the best interest of the white population, and if I had the power to colonize and remove every slave within the borders of my own State I would most cheerfully do it. But I am deeply impressed with the conviction, that to liberate our slaves and retain them among us, either with full or partial privileges as free citizens, would be a calamity which would induce every sane man who could escape, to fly from a society so constituted. My reasons for this opinion I have long since published and printed. I am, therefore, only willing to speak now upon the condition of colonization. But, when the people of the South propose colonization, how are they met by those of the North? We are told that it is cruel and inhumane to expatriate free negroes or slaves, and that the scheme is impracticable. I will endeavor to satisfy all reasonable considerate men, that one-half the expenses of the Mexican war invested in a six per cent. stock would, by a proper system of African colonization, in less than fifty years expiate slavery in the United States. I will give the scheme as applied to my own State, and if its practicability be demonstrated, the demonstration can easily be applied to every other State. Let a future day be fixed, after which every slave child born shall be the property of the State, for the purpose of colonization. Place the children when weaned in the hands of those who will raise them—females till they are eighteen years of age, and males until they are twenty-five, and upon their reaching these ages send them to Africa. There, in a few words, is the whole scheme. Now as to its practical operation. By sending off the females as they reached eighteen, the race would become extinct in less than fifty years, with the exception of a few old slaves past the prime of life. The departure of the females as they reached womanhood, would put an end to the birth of slaves among us. The extinction of slavery under such a rule is therefore just as certain as the laws of nature. But it would be slowly accomplished. So much the better on that account, as Africa is not fitted for the reception of all at once, and by doing the thing gradually we should accommodate ourselves, in our late habits, to the new state of things slowly yet certainly taking place. Where is the money to come from to defray the expenses, and who will furnish it? The Colonization Society can charter ships and transport adult colonists and take care of them in Africa, until they are acclimated and capable of providing for themselves for $60 a head. In their own packet they do it for $50 a head. The information is given to me by Mr McLain, the Secretary of the Society. Now, I believe, that those to whom the children are bound would, in consideration of their services, readily stipulate to furnish the required outfit. Poor white children are bound out by our laws, and the masters or mistress is required to teach them a trade, to educate them, &c. Boys are bound until they are twenty one years of age, and girl until they reach sixteen. They are to be furnished with three pounds ten shillings in money and a new suit of clothes when their time of service expires. I would lengthen the apprenticeship of mulatto colonists so as to raise the funds necessary. Females being apprenticed until eighteen would serve two years longer than the period required from white apprenticed girls, and their services would be much more valuable. If the apprentice lives and emigrated to Africa, I would make just compensation to the owner: but if the slave dies during the apprenticeship, and before his labor had paid for his raising, then nothing would be due.

Under the foregoing plan how many slaves would it be necessary to transport annually from Kentucky? By the census of 1840 there were 30,818 female slaves in the State between the age of 10 and 24 years. Divide by 14, and it gives 2,201 in their 18th year. Now, the slave children at this time in Kentuckey would for the next eighteen years supply annually, in growing up, 2,201 females for transportation. But, just as soon as the system goes into operation; there will be fewer children born. After the end of thirty years from its commencement, it may be safely affirmed, there would not be a slave born in Kentucky after twenty years there would be but few births among the mothers remaining in the country. In the nineteenth or twentieth year of the operation of the system there would be fewer females to transport than in the preceding year and from that time their numbers would rapidly diminish, until not one in her 18th year could be found for transportation. Now only at 2,201 at $50, the sum it cost the Colonization Society in its own packet, and we have $110,050 only as the sum necessary to be expended annually in the certain and gradual extinction of slavery in Kentucky. But it may be said it would be cruel in the extreme to send off females without sending males with them. Admit it, and double the expenditure in order to send off an equal number of males, and it only makes $220,000. Under such a state of apprenticeship, and by lengthening the periods of service of the males until they arrive to 24 or 25 years, or even longer if necessary, and requiring them to labor the last four or five years in aid of colonization, I entertain no doubt but our slave population can, by their own labor, without costing our white population one cent, transport, settle, and provide for themselves in Africa. But it must be systematically undertaken and persevered in to do it. Now, sir, the entire female slave population of the United States in 1840, between the ages of 10 and 24, amounted to 390,117 only. By the same rule of calculation we have 27,865 in their 18th year, and of the proper age for colonization. This number multiplied by $50 gives $1,393,250, as the annual expenditure necessary to remove, upon my plan, the whole female salve population of the United States as they reach their 18th year. But under the idea that humanity requires us to send out an equal number of males, let the expenditure be doubled, and it makes $2,786,500. I said half the expenses of the Mexican war, invested in a six per cent, stock, would accomplish the object. A capital of $50,000,000 would produce annually the sum required, and an excess of more than $200,000 for contingencies. I have thus, sir, only sketched the outline of a plan by which united systematic effort can extirpate slavery. I have no time to go into minute details, and obviate every conceivable objection. Only look at the thousands and hundreds of thousands of foreigners annually landing upon our shores from the old world and then, sir reflect that it only requires the removal of 27,865 female slaves annually at a cost of $1,393,250, and no sane mind can doubt the practicability of the scheme. I have made the calculations upon the census of 1840. The increase of population since then would increase the number of expenses; but I possess no data upon which to give the increased expenditure required with accuracy. In our unbounded schemes of annexation and dominion, we have nothing to do but to annex Liberia, govern her as a colony until we have located the negro race there, and then separate, leaving her an independent republic. Such a scheme, in its execution, would lead to commercial magnificent in their development; and, while it would be just as constitutional as other schemes of annexation, would be infinitely wiser, because its motives would be peace and good will to man, instead of war, conquest, and national aggrandizement.

But suppose, Mr. President, colonization is rejected, what is to happen then? You cannot divest slavery from the influence of certain causes which have heretofore and will continue to operate upon it, producing results beyond the control of human legislation. These have been most ably presented by a citizen of my own State of great attainments, John A. Mc Clurg, Esq. in a speech delivered before the Kentucky Colonization Society in January last. Our decennial tables of population prove that, in reference to many States in our Union, slavery has been marked by three distinct stages: the first is when the slave population increases at a greater ratio than the white; the second, when the white population increases at a greater ratio than the slave; and the third when the slave population actually decreases. It is remarkable too that these changes have progressed with great regularity, establishing beyond controversy that when the slave population begins to decrease, it must go on until the causes which produced its decline will ultimately exterminate it. New York and New Jersey together had in 1790 32,747 slaves. By the census of 1800 the number of slaves in these two States had increased only as follows; but there was a decrease in New York of 931, and an increase in New Jersey of 999. After 1800 the slaves in both States progressively declined, until in 1840 there were but 678 left. Now in both States the institution has been abolished. In Delaware the number of slaves has decreased from 8,887 in 1790 to 2,605 in 1840. In Maryland the number of slaves increased until 1810. In 1820 they had decreased from 111,502 in 1810 to 107,398. Thus the number for a period of ten years fell about 4,000. In the next period of ten years the fall was a little more than 5,000, and by the census of 1840 the number had come down to 89,737 exhibiting a diminution in number of 12,457 in the last ten years. In the District of Columbia the number of slaves was 6,377 in 1829, and rapidly decreased in 1830 and came down to 4,694 in 1840. In Virginia the number of slaves had continued to increase until 1830, when they reached 469,757. The census of 1840 exhibits a decline of 20,770. Thus we see that slavery has reached its height in the States on the Atlantic, including Virginia and all north and east, and commenced declining, making such progress that those farther south and east have established the institution. In North Carolina in 1830 there were 245,601 slaves. In 1840 there were 245,817, showing an increase of 216 only; so that slavery for the entervening ten years was upon a stand. In Kentucky, we have passed from the first into the second stage of the institution. The census of 1840, for the first time showed that our free population had increased by a small but greater ratio than the slave. Since 1810 our slave population has been nearly at a stand. Our lists of taxable property, in which the slaves are annually enumerable, show that in 1847 their number was 189,549; showing an increase of only 7,291, since the census of 1840; or an increase at the rate of about half of one per cent. per annum. There has been no enumeration of the whole of our free population since 1840; but from other facts there is no doubt that our free population has increased during the same period at a much greater rate. In 1839 our free white males over twenty-one years, or the voters of the State, numbered 108,500. In 1847 our voters amounted to 136,945; making the increase at the rate of more than three per cent. per annum for the last eight years. In 1847 we had 137,908 free children between the ages of five and sixteen years; showing an increase of 4,773 in one year. These facts, exhibited in the report of our Second Auditor, show that our white population in Kentucky is rapidly increasing; while the slave population is nearly at a stand; and they likewise prove that the day is not distant when the number of slaves in Kentucky will begin to decrease as in Maryland and Virginia. Our auditor's report already shows a decrease in the number of slave in twentyeight counties in the State, comparing the years 1846 and 1847 and our lists of taxable property prove that there are more than three-fourths of our voters who do not own a slave. These results have in part been produced by an act of Legislature, passed in 1833, prohibiting the introduction of slaves into the States, except brought by emigrants, or when they have been acquired by inheritance. If the convention about to be called in Kentucky should, in the new constitution, provide that the further introduction of slaves should under no circumstances be allowed, such a provision, I have no doubt, would tend to the rapid diminution of the slave population.

GREAT PROFITS OF FARMING.

A correspondent of the Boston Cultivator, states the success of a man who left a lucrative business in the city of Philadelphia, for farming to make a profit. After two years trial, he was asked if he did not find the profits small compared with those of trade! He answered "Quite the contrary; I have already realized far more than the most I have dared to anticipate, and am, at the end of two years, richer than I ever could have become by twenty-five years successful trade. It is true, I made more dollars and cents in trade than I do now, but that is dross compared to the blessings of health of body, and peace of mind, which gold and silver could never purchase. I eat, drink, and sleep, with an appetite; yawn at bedtime and never in the morning; am up before the sun, and yet the day is never too long; and more than all, I have no acceptances to take up. Money! why what use have I for it? I raise my own food in the richest profusion, and my own clothing—my estate is annually increasing in value—then what is the use of money! I can't eat it or drink it, even if it were cut into mince meat."

New' bold, and iusq.ring ideas are only a clear head that stands over a glowing heart. The most precious wine is produced upon the side of volcanoes.

The Young Men's Lyceum

On Friday the 26th January, the first anniversary of the "Young Men's Lyceum" was celebrated in a very interesting manner. The ceremonies on the occasion took place in the Senate Chamber. The members of the institution assembled at the school room of L. V. R. James, Esqr. and marched to the Senate Chamber to the lively tune of music.—The exercises commenced with the singing of hymns selected for the occasion, and we were delighted to see a number of our most intelligent young ladies taking the lead in this animating part of the services. The singing was excellently done—how could it be otherwise, when the choir was composed of such handsome ladies? We fear not a successful contradiction when we assert, that in point of beauty, the ladies of our town will compare favorably, with those of any other town of the same size. But we are digressing—we are noticing the Young Men's celebration Immediately after the reading of the annual report, Mr. Richard L. Sykes, the President of the Lyceum, delivered a very able and interesting address—it was attentively listened to, and the audience did not fail to express their heartfelt gratification.

The Rev. H. W. Ellis followed next,—his was a dissertation on dead Language, it was listened to with intense interest. We would willingly name all the orators of the day, but our time will not permit us to do so, and our readers must be content, when we assure them that the addresses of Messrs Baxter, J. A. R. Wilson and Franklin were worthy of listening and that they acquitted themselves ably. The dissertation on soap making, by Mr. D. T. Hart, the soap manufacturer, had an equal share of attention. We have no knowledge of the art of soap making, but we know of Mr. Hart's will prosecute vigorously his soap making, he will derive a handsome competence from it's sale. His style and manner of address portrayed the orator, and we prophesy to see him ere long claiming a prominent position among the statesmen of Liberia. Mr. John Lewis delivered the ending address—it was deeply interesting and instructive—he pointed out the advantages to be derived from the cultivation of the mind—its importance to the State and to society. He encouraged the Young Men to renewed efforts—to throw far away from them minor matters, and devote every idle hour to the improvement of their minds. The speaker done full justice to his subject—and all who heard him, will we doubt not award him the palm as having delivered the most important and interesting subject

Owing to unavoidable circumstances, our paper has been delayed considerably beyond its time; and we therefore beg the indulgence of our readers. We will make up for loss time, and endeavor to have the next number out on its regular day.

To Correspondents.—We have received the communication, giving a history of the celebration of the anniversary of the "Young Men's Lyceum," and delay publishing it, until the signature is [illegible] changed.

Destruction of the Slave Factory at the Gallenas

It is with more than ordinary pleasure that we record the destruction of the Spanish slave factories on the Gallenas River, and of the tremendous amount of property which they contained, amounting it is supposed to nearly a million of dollars. This laudable act took place some fifteen days since. It will be recollected, that the chiefs of the Gallenas, made a treaty some years ago, with the British government, in which they pledged themselves to abandon the traffic in slaves. Since the making of the treaty, the slave trade has been prosecuted there, as vigorously as ever was, and to the knowledge of the commanders of the British armed vessels, who have frequently remonstrated with the chiefs, and threaten to punish them, if they did not respect their treaty stipulations. Finding that remonstrances had not the desired effect, Commodore Sir Charles Hotham, commanding the British Naval forces on the African coast, landed with several hundred sailors and marines, from seven vessels of war, and succeeded in destroying all the slave factories, and the immense quantity of goods that were in them, without the loss of a man. The attack on the factories was so sudden and unexpected that the Spanish pirates had no time to remove any of their goods. We regret that the gallant Commodore did not get hold of the slaves, they were hastily marched off. The chiefs have promised to deliver up to the Commodore, two thousand of the slaves; but we fear they will not do so; and as they do not live on the beach, they are not easily get at to be punished.

The Commodore has declared the Gallenas in a state of blockade—and sufficient force is kept there to maintain it. The adoption of this course will cut off all supplies to the Spaniards and natives, and may eventually, do more to abolish the slave trade there, than the destruction of the barracoons. We hope the blockade will be vigorously enforced.

Arrival of President Roberts.

On Sunday night, the 28th: ultimo, about 8 o'clock, H. M's. Ship "Amazon," Captain Troubridge, anchored in our roadstead, having on board President Roberts. Before the people of our town had heard of the President's arrival, the thundering of cannon, and the ascension of rockets in the harbor, proclaimed an event of more than ordinary character—and all were anxiously waiting to hear why the stillness of the fine star-light, evening was so unexpectedly disturbed. But a very few minutes had passed, before a message reached town announcing the arrival of President Roberts. This was joyful news. A loud shout of congratulation was raised, and very soon, nearly the entire population were out. Some half a dozen gentlemen went off to the ship, to pay their respects to the President, and to hear the news. They returned to the shore about midnight. Cannons were fired on shore, and other demonstrations were made until the approach of day-light warned the joyful citizens that it was time to seek repose. At the hour of 8 the next morning, the "Amazon" was beautifully dressed out with the colors of every nation, and our beloved flag was flying conspicuously above them all. Such was the courtesy the gallant Captain shewed our infant Republic. Captain Edward Byrne of the U. S. ship "Decatur" was in port, he visited the "Amazon" to pay his respects to the President. At the hour of 9 the President left the ship. Captain Troubridge and Captain Byrne accompanied him. As the boat with the President cleared the ship, a national salute was fired, and directly afterwards, the Decatur commenced uttering her thunder to the same tune. The President landed at Cheesman's wharf, where the citizens received him. Captain Payne President of the Town Council welcomed him with a congratulatory address, which was replied to by the President in his usual dignified manner.—He was then escorted to the Government House by the citizens and uniformed companies—Captains Troubridge and Byrne accompanying him. An arch formed of flowers of various colors was supported by two young ladies, under which the party had to pass, before entering the house—a short but neat address was made by one of the ladies which a brief reply was returned. As the last named party entered the house, a national salute was fired from Central Hill and Fort Norris.

The slave trade at the Gallenas, may for the present, be considered at an end. The destruction of the slave factories, and the immense amount of property they contained, by H. M's. squadron, leaves the Spaniards no resources to carry on the infamous traffic. If the vigorous blockade which that squadron is now maintaining off the Gallenas is kept up, we do not see how supplies can be introduced into the country, unless, indeed, they are conveyed by land from the Sherbro country—and we apprehend, that this plan will not be adopted as the expenses of transportation would be found too great, notwithstanding the lucrativeness of the slave trading business.

In this state of affairs at the Gallenas, we think the time very opportune for our government to commence negotiations for the purchase of that country, and indeed, for all the country, commencing at Grand Cape Mount and running along to the northward, until we reached the Sherbro river, Our boundary line, then would be the Sherbro river—farther our jurisdiction need not extend.

The Legislature.

An extra session of the legislature is determined upon. Notices have been sent from the State Department, for the meeting to take place on the 26th: inst. Some of the members have already arrived.

On our first page will be found the letter of Commander Mercer, of the U. S. Navy. Our Liberia readers will peruse it no doubt, with some attention. Take the letter altogether and we think it may be accepted as a fair history of the present condition of our Republic. We are pleased to see, that strangers take some interest in our affairs—that they seek on the spot for information, and from what they observe, they draw favorable conclusions

We may be permitted however, to dissent from Commander Mercer's suggestions, for the Society to commence settling other points, bevond the jurisdiction of Liberia.—To do this, not only, would the expenses of the society be considerably increased, but the sufferings of the immigrants from the treachery of the natives, would be far greater, than what the first settlers in Monrovia had to undergo. It must be borne in mind, that tho'. the privations of our first settlers were very great, they were highly favored in having for their enemies, a people who were, and are now less inclined to warfare, than any of the tribes we know of, on the western coast.

Interchange of National Salutes

The U. S. ship Portsmouth, bearing the broad pennant of Commodore Cooper, Commander-in-Chief of the U. S. Naval forces on the coast of Africa—And H. B. M's. ship Favorite, Commander Murray, saluted the Flag of the Republic with 21 guns. The salutes were promptly returned gun for gun.

Arrival of Her Majesty's Ship Amazon.

On Sunday, the 28th: ultimo, about 8 of the clock P. M., H. B. M's. ship "Amazon" Captain Troubridge arrived from England, via. Maderia, Cape de Verds and Sierra Leone, with His Excellency President Roberts and lady, Mrs. John N. Lewis, and Miss Anna Godwin—all well. The Amazon had a passage of 47 days.

General Lewis has received directions from the Executive to commence preparations, for a military expedition, to leave here about the first of March. Volunteers are now being enrolled, and every other movement are making to have the expedition as respectable and efficient as circumstances will permit.

We believe the object of the expedition will be to operate in the neighborhood of New Cesters, and to bring to strict accountability, all who may be found engaged in the slave trade.

The Public Dinner

On Tuesday the 30th: ultimo, the good people of Monrovia gave a dinner to Captain Troubridge and his officers. The dinner was served up in the Government Square, in fine style, and to the admiration of all present.

Captain Byrne of the U. S. ship Decatur and his officers were invited guests, we were delighted to witness the good feelings which existed between the representatives of two of the most enlightened nations of christendom.

We select of the number of toasts drank—the following—Her Majesty Queen Victoria.

The President of the Republic of Liberia.

The President of the French Republic.

The President of the United States of America.

The Navy of Great Britain.

The Navy of the French Republic.

The United States Navy.

Captain Troubridge and the officers H. M's. ship Amazon.

Captain Byrne and the officers of the U. S. ship Decatur.

The dinner passed off pleasantly.

The people of Liberia will ever entertain grateful remembrance for Captain Troubridge and his officers for their kind attentions to the President and suite while on board the Amazon.

Recognition of Liberia

President Roberts while in Europe, succeeded in procuring the recognition of the Independence of the Republic of Liberia, from the British government, and from the French Republic. The Prussian Minister at the Court of St. James, assured the President that his government would follow the example of Great Britain, and that at a very early day; he might expect to receive an official announcement of the acknowledgement of the Independence of the Republic of Liberia, by his government.

Her Majesty's government, agreed upon a treaty of Amity and Commerce with the President, in behalf of the government, which we presume will receive the sanction of the Senate mithout a dissenting voice.

We are further gratified in noticing the magnanimity of the British government, in the presentation of an armed Cutter for the protection of our coast;—and of a promise to give some pecuniary assistance to enable us to enlarge our territory.

The Ladies of Monrovia are now engaged in making a couple of flags, for the military expedition.

Illuminations.

On the nights of the 29th: and 30th: January, our town was beautifully illuminated. Bonfires were seen in every direction—and the citizens were parading the streets to a very late hour, to the lively tunes of musical instruments. All the principal houses were brilliently lighted up. Speeches prepared for the occasion were delivered at the most prominent places. Some forty lanterns made for the purpose were carried through the town in procession, to give light to the ladies who joined heartily in the demonstrations of joy.

Thus was the gratitude of the people exhibited for the return of President Roberts, and for the able manner he had accomplished the duties confided to him by the people.

ARRIVAL OF PRESIDENT, J. J. ROBERTS.

Messrs Editors:—Sirs, now I comply with one of your requests, by submitting the following.

The 30th of January, a proud day in Liberia. Our President, J. J. Roberts, lady and Mrs. John N. Lewis, arrived in Her Britanic Majesty's ship of war, Amazon, Captain Troubridge. And were, in a civic manner, received home. They were escorted to the shore, by Her Majesty's and His Excellency's Representatives Regina Victoria, of England et President Taylor, Zachary Taylor, of the U. S. A. [illegible] presence, the community, headed by the [illegible] companies of Monrovia, attended [illegible] President's Mansion, where a more [illegible] review was sought. But the avidity [illegible] his Excellency's history of his [illegible] voyages and travels would be perfectly [illegible] assures us, that ere long, it will [illegible] to print before the public. Then [illegible] us at length; how it was, that [illegible] consigns the substructing a republic [illegible] churches. But judging, from my [illegible] Newark, and Ohio throughout, [illegible] those, that disinterested goodness [illegible] their conduct when African in- [illegible] lived, induces me to a generous [illegible] that part of the American people, [illegible] the head of such a people, in this [illegible]

[illegible] more modern time and place, let [illegible], on this coast, the gentlemanly bearing of [illegible] sectional naval officers, to the Liberians. And then let us enquire can these officers be so different from the country, at large,—their constituents? Most sirs.

The relation of constituent and representative would be anomalous. Therefore, however, let these facts inspire our most bouyant hopes, that all is right to be sure all's right there.

Yes, to speak of Old England's treatment, of our National interests and Functionary, being to [illegible] disparaging disparagement to the Americans, is if we were able, to laud her to the skies.

France and Prussia, with Old England's dynasty, have acknowledged our independence with a [illegible] of frankness, that meets our most cordial approbation and sincere gratitude.

Yours Respectfully,
EDWARD J. ROYE.

Messrs Editors:—Sirs, it appears from certain intelligence that I have received, that it has been reported by Mr R. H. Knowls of the brig Majesty, that I had demanded and received of him anchorage at this port, notwithstanding he had paid his anchorage at the port of Monrovia. This I emphatically deny, and believe that I can prove satisfactorily that I did not receive it; now I have no doubt but that these things are reported in England for facts, and though untrue, will have a deleterious effect upon the operations of this Republic. I hope sirs that you will give this a place in your columns, so that the truth may be known.

POETRY.

FROM THE NATIONAL ERA

DEATH'S FERRYMAN.

BY MISS ALICE CAREY.

Boatman, thrice I've called thee o'er,
Waiting on life's solemn shore,
Tracing, in the silver sand,
Letters till thy boat should land.

Drifting out alone with thee,
Toward the clime I cannot see,
Read to me the strange device
Graven on thy wand of ice.

Push the curls of golden hue
From thy eyes of starlit dew,
And behold me where I stand,
Beckoning thy boat to land.

Where the river mist, so pale,
Trembles like a bridal veil,
O'er yon lowly drooping tree,
One that loves me waits for me.

Hear, sweet Boatman, hear my call!
Last year, with the leaflet's fall,
Resting her pale hand in mine,
Cross she in that boat of thine.

When the corn shall cease to grow,
And the rye-field's silver flow
At the reaper's feet is laid,
Crossing, spake the lovely maid:

Dearest Love, another year,
Thou shalt meet this Boatman here—
The white fingers of despair
Playing with his golden hair.

From this silver-sanded shore,
Beckon him to row the o'er;
Where yon solemn shadows be,
I shall wait thee—come and see!

There! the white sails float and flow,
One in heaven and one below;
And I hear a low voice cry,
Ferryman of Death am I.

A SONG TO THE MORNING.

"When the final morning dawns, the day must follow, For light must ever triumph."

Say, can'st see o'er you horizon
Faintly, wish a doubtful ray?
Shout for joy! the morning cometh;
Hail the harbinger of day!

Demons of darkness gather,
Your obscure the feeble light?
Hopeful gaze upon the heavens—
Soon will put their clouds to flight!

Say, hast thou in yonder forest
Seen sweet bud of early spring?
Know the omen—kiss the token—
Glorious will its gladness bring!

Do the cold winds from the North-land
Blast its promising premature?
Be thou confident and fearless—
Heaven's promises are sure!

Buds are springing—light is dawning—
O'er earth and from the skies;
Shout for joy—the pledge is given,
Earth from bondage shall arise!

MISCELLANEOUS.

Transcendentalism,

BY PROFESSOR B. F. TEFFT A. M.

Not long since, an intelligent lady of a neighboring city wished me to tell her, if I could, the meaning of the word so often repeated, and so commonly misunderstood, now taken as the heading of this little article. After hearing what I had to say upon it, she made me engage to give a definition of it in the Repository, for the benefit of others, as there are many she thought, who use the term very frequently, without having the slightest conception of its meaning.

With this object in view, as well as to add something to the correct use of language, I now under take to redeem my promise.

It will be essential for the reader, in the first place, to be reminded, that there are three great schools of philosophy, or of speculation, founded on different estimates made of man's elementary being. The first asserts, that man is nothing but a physical organism, put into existence and kept in motion by material agencies, there being nothing in the universe but matter; the second maintains the existence of immaterial, thinking mind, having within the body, but deriving all its knowledge from the outward material world through the medium of the senses; the third, claiming for the spirit of man higher powers than mere sensation and sensual perception, declares that, through revelation, it does not all come in this manner, there being a spiritual faculty, which like faith, transcend the bounds and limits of the senses.

The first of these schools is very properly called the sensual: the second, which was the first to assert the existence of a thinking intellect, is termed the intellectual: the third, for the reason I have just laid down, in modern works is styled the transcendental. Every man, therefore, who does not believe that all our knowledge is derived through the five senses, or that the soul has not powers transcending the reach and region of sensation, is strictly speaking, a transcendentalist.

The head of the first school, so far as history has informed us, was Leucippus, a disciple of Pythagoras; the father of the second was the renowned Thales, of Miletus; while Plato, the great philosopher of Athens was the first to establish the third on an intelligible basis.

The tanscendentalism of Plato, and of the Greek and Latin fathers in the early ages of christianity, and of Ralph Cudworth, Henry Moore and many others of the Enligsh Church, is to be carefully distinguished from the transcendentalism of Kant, who, though starting with his master, s great principle grievously errs in its application. The followers of Kant, however, such as Snelling, Ficher, Hegel, are after all, the great corrupters of this doctrine It is to them we owe the utter confusion and ridiculous nonsense of what now goes under the name of transcendentalism.

Kant in his leading work, simply lays down the doctrines of Plato, by asserting for the soul a power of thinking with ut the intervention of the senses, and then proceeds to demonstrate the laws according to which that power is exerted; but, in his subsequent publications, he goes far astray from this orgical foundation, in claiming for the pure reason—the name he gives this transcendental faculty—an authority entirely unwarranted either by philosophy or revelation.

His disciples, carrying the extravagance still further, and, as the French Illuminati did with Locke's doctrine of experience, attributing to this high faculty an authority above that of revelation, have led the way to the lowest depths of infidelity. The Kantanism, therefore, of the age, and particularly of Germany and of this country, is nothing but a subtil skepticism in those who understand it or an unintelligible and reckless hostility to religion in the low and ignorant.

But, in conclusion, while I deny that the sensational theory of Locke was legitimately reduced to sensualism by the French infidels, I can see no necessity for pushing the doctrine of Plato to the same extreme, as has been done by the modern transcendentalist. However, as I undertook to write an essy, I will now leave the criticism with my readers.

Foretastes of Glory increase our desires of Heaven.

Livy tells us, that the Gauls, when they had once tasted of the wines of Italy were so much taken with the pleasantness of them, that they would not afterward rest contented with a bare trade thither for their wine, but firmly resolved to get possession by conquest of the land which produced it. Thus the antepasts of glory do but provoke the desires, and excite the appetite of the believing soul. He is so far from being satisfied by foretastes, that they do but augment his thirst after a full fruition. He is not content with those small drops which are derived unto him at so great a distance from the fountain; nor are those degrees of grace and comfort, which he gains by holding commerce with heaven while upon earth, by means of prayer and faith in the worship and ordinances of God sufficient to allay his hunger.—He cannot drink his fill. nor slake his thirst, at those cisterns. A holy insatiableness doth so enlarge the capacity of his soul that the more he hath, the more he longeth for; and the wideness of his increasing desires is proportioned to the largeness of his receivings. He therefore resolves and aims, by a holy violence, to get possession of that spiritual Canaan from whence these grapes are brought; that so he may there drink of that wine of the kingdom, and of those rivers of pleasure.—Ibedem

Mariner's Compass.

Before the invention of the use of the pole star, and the needle and compass, it is diverting to see what a wonder was made of a small voyage; it required almost a council of heroes in Homer,s time if they were to cross the Ægean sea; and for many ages the voyage of Jason with his Argonauts was the wonder of the world. It was spread abroad with all the pomp of oratory, the invention of fables and the flowers of poetry. Every youth at school reads with wonder of the ship Argo, fitted out to go to Colchis to fetch the golden fleece. especially as the poets represent their gods as admiring the exploit, and placing the ship in the heavens; and yet, after all, how trifling to modern navigators! But Thales the Milesian Philosopher, had not then lived; he learned the important use of the pole star from the Phœnicians, and imparted the knowledge of it to the Greeks, about 600 years before Christ. The compass is supposed to be the invention of the Chinese, and to have been brought into Europe by Paulus Venetus, an Italian, in the year 1200, and what seems to confirm this conjecture is, that they at first used the compass in the same manner that the Chinese still do; they let it float on a little piece of cork instead of suspending it on a pivot. Some ascribe the discovery to Flavio de Melpni, or Flavio Glovia, a Neapolitan, about the year 1302, and hence it is, they say, that the territory of Principato, which make a part of the kingdom of Naples, where he was born, bears a compass in its arms. Fawchett supposes it was known in France before it was discovered by the Neapolitan or Venetian, and Dr. Wallace ascribes the first invention to the English.—Chamber's Dictionary.

Suspicion.

Some one has defined suspicion to be the imagination of the existence of something without proof, or upon slight evidence, or upon no evidence at all." Suspicion proceeds from the apprehension of evil: it is the offspring or companion of jealousy "Suspicions (affirms Lord Bacon,) are among thoughts like bats among birds, that ever fly by twilight." They find no resting-place in a candid and benevolent bosom. As bats shun the day, so do suspicions sink from the sunshine of an honorable and unpolluted mind. Their appropiate dwelling-place is a soul, narrow, shriveled, cold, dark, selfish, little and malevolent. Is a man to be pronounced guilty upon no evidence at all, or upon insufficient evidence? Is it not plain that suspicion is an inadequate basis for measures essentially effecting the rights, reputation and happiness of a fellow being? What security is there for the innocent, if they may be lawfully assailed and prostrated to gratify an adamantine, envious and suspicious heart? A malevolent person can, without much difficulty, set in motion a train of measures, which may for a season cause a worthy and useful member of society to be distrusted and depressed. It is easy by an ingenious hint, a shake of the head, a suspicious look, and various other artifices to bring a cloud over a person's good name, and to cast about those slanderous reports which Solomon compares to fire-brands, arrows and death There are individuals in every community, to whom no feast is so agreeable as that made on murdered reputation. These do often succeed in depressing, temporarily, the most upright and deserving, by involving them in the mists of general suspicion.

It is a severe affliction to be derpived of the means of subsistence, to be cast moneyless upon the charities of the world; it is a greater still, to be called to consign to the grave an only relative or friend. But if from the wreck of fortune and family one is able to save what is more precious than all,—an unsullied reputation, a good name among his fellow-beings,—he still possesses something to support him; something worth living for; something by which he may honor God, and be useful in his day and generation. By making suspicion the ground of measures with respect to one, you may rob him of his last, his best, his only treasure. It is the prerogative of a narrow and uncharitable disposition to look at the dark side only of one's character; to put the worst construcion on doubtful cases; and endeavor to preserve in remembrance those lesser, venial errors and misdeeds, over which oblivion should drop her pall, and the traces of which the tears of repentance may have long since quite washed away.,,—Christian Magazine.

MATERNAL COURAGE.

We have rarely, if ever, met with a more striking example of maternal self-devotion, united with singular presence of mind, than is offered by the following circumstance which occurred two or three weeks ago in the State of New York. The extracts which we give are made, as will be perceived from a letter written by the heroic mother herself to a friend, a few days after the event narrated had occurred.

Mrs. ——, accompanied by her daughter, a young girl about twelve years of age, and some young children with their nurses, went to visit—— cemetery. A favorite dog, named Carlo, was permitted to accompany them as escort, and the little ones were amused with his gambols as he ran and leaped by their side. On reaching the cemetery, Mrs. —— and her daughter were a little in advance of the rest of the party.

"When suddenly we were all arrested by the most horrible yelps from Carlo, who came plunging, rolling, and foaming, furiously mad. The dog took a circuit round, and as the shrieks went forth from ——, and——, 'He is mad! he is mad!' I echoed, 'Yes, he is mad—run for your lives!" In the same breath I tore from my shoulders a large heavy shawl, as my only defence. Carlo immediately made for Mary, who was running with all the speed possible. I shrieked, 'Mary, this you he pursues—run as quick as thought.' At the same time, I kept nearly pace with the dog; and, as dear Mary turned, I enveloped him completely with my shawl, winding the corners (which I held in my hand for the purpose) closely round his neck. It was, of course, only for one moment I could hold him, but every instant counted, and enabled Mary to change her course, so that he was unable to pursue her in any direct line. But the instant he escaped from me, he made direct for her again, a frothy foam issuing from his mouth, accompanied by that unearthly yelp.

"The others had made their escape from the cemetery, and I was left alone among the dead, to contend with, and protect my child against a raving mad dog. Oh, who can imagine my feelings! Calm, and perfectly self-possessed, I remained, keeping unceasingly to Mary, who I found was quicker than given. All the time the dog was not followed, save when I muffled him with the shawl. It was only by Mary's making short turns and leaping upon palings that I had an opportunity to wind it round him at all. Several times he endeavored reach her as to raise his paws to spring up to the spot she occupied, and each time strength and thought was given to me to cover him with the shawl and wind it round his neck. Thus she escaped until aid was sent. Even that, I fear, might have been too late, had he not fallen in a fit, from which he was never allowed to rise. His head was severed entirely from the body by the heavy blow of an axe, given by a strong arm, while Mary stood directly over him, upon a high fence, whither he had pursued her.

"One week has passed, and last night was the first time I have been able to shut out from my sight that furious dog, gnashing his jaws, uttering those horrid yelps, and foaming forth from his mouth, running after my poor child."

In the midst of the horrors of the scene described with such simplicity and vividness, how touchingly sublime appears a mother's love. Again and again the mother offers her life in sacrifice for that of her child. Each time that the shawl was thrown around the furious animal, he might have turned upon that noble woman and made her his victim, yet still she persevered, and God in mercy made her the instrument of saving the life of her beloved daughter.

One word on the remarkable presence of mind here displayed. It is a quality which all should cultivate. It is invaluable in the hour of danger. And who knows when that hour may be at hand? The timid and irresolute are in imminent peril themselves, and entirely useless to others, while those who have learned to maintain control over their thoughts, and to preserve presence of mind, are often made the happy instruments of saving those whom they love from danger and from death. LIBERIA HERALD.

A Domestic Sketch.

BY MRS. LYDIA H. SIGORNEY.

It is the duty of mothers to sustain the reverses of fortune. Frequent and sudden as they have been to our own country, it is important that young females should possess some employment by which they might obtain a livelihood, in case they should be reduced to the necessity of supporting themselves. When families are unexpectedly reduced from affluence to poverty how pitifully contemptible it is to see the mother, desponding or helpless, and permitting her daughters to embarrass those whom it is their duty to assist and cheer.

"I have lost my whole fortune," said a merchant, as he returned one evening to his home; "we can no longer keep our carriage. We must leave this large house. The children can no longer go to expensive schools. Yesterday I was a rich man—to-day there is nothing I can call my own."

"Dear husband," said the wife, "we are still rich in each other and our children. Money may pass away, but God has given us a better treasure—these active hands and loving hearts."

"Dear father," said the children, "do not look so sad. We will help you to get a living."

"But what can you do poor things?" said he.

"You shall see, you shall see," answered several cheerful voices. "It is a pity if we have been educated for nothing. How can the father of eight children be poor. We shall work and make you rich again."

"I shall help," said the youngest girl, hardly four years old. "I will not have any new things bought, and I shall sell my great doll.

The heart of the husband and father, which had sunk within his bosom like a stone, was lifted up. The sweet enthusiasm of the scene cheered him, and his nightly prayer was like a song of praise.

They left the stately house. The servants were dismissed. Pictures and plate, rich carpet and furniture were sold, and she who had been mistress of the mansion shed no tear. "Pay every debt," said she, "let no one suffer through us, we may yet be happy."

He rented a neat cottage and a small piece of ground a few miles from the city. With the aid of his sons he cultivated vegetables for the market. He viewed with delight and astonishment the economy of his wife nurtured as she had been, in wealth, and the efficiency which his daughters soon acquired under her training.

The eldest one assisted her in the work of the household, and also instructed the younger children. Besides, they executed various works which they had learned as accomplishments, but which they found could be disposed of to advantage. They embroidered with taste some of the ornamental parts of female apparel, which were readily sold to a marchant in the city.

They cultivated flowers and sent bequets to market in the carts that conveyed the vegetables—they plaited straw, they painted maps, they executed plain needle-work. Every one was at her post, busy and cheerful. The cottage was like a bee-hive.

"I never enjoyed such health before," said the father.

"And I never was so happy before," said the mother.

"We never knew how many things we could do when we live in a great house," said the children; "and we love each other a great deal better here. You call us your little bees."

"Yes," replied the father, "and you make just such honey as the heart likes to feed on."

Economy as well as industry was strictly observed; nothing was wasted. Nothing unnecessarily puchased. The eldest daughter became assistant teached in a distinguished female seminary, and the second took her place as instructress to the family.

The little dwelling which had always been kept neat, they were soon able to beautify. Its construction was improved, and the vines and flowering trees were replanted around it. The merchant was happier under his woodbine covered porch, in a summer's evening, than he had been in his showy dressing room.

"We are now thriving and praspesous," said he, "shall we return to the city?"

"Oh, no, no," was the unanimous reply.

"Let us remain," said the wife, "where we have found health and contentment."

"Father," said the youngest, "do we children hope you are not going to be rich again—for then we little ones were shut up in the nursery, and did not see much of you or mother. Now, we all live together, and sister, who loves us, teaches us, and we learn to be industrious and useful. We were none of us happy when we were rich, and did not work. So, father please not be a rich man any more."

ORATORY IN THE UNITED STATES.

Public speaking, far more than any branch of closet literature, requires for its development a correspondence between the taste and temperament of the speaker and of the auditory. An author in his library, can despise and forget the tastes of the day, and imagine himself the contemporary of Plato, or Cicero, or Bacon, and tune his mind to their pitch, and write with weight and gravity, as addressing himself to hearers, fit though few. In the court house or the senate, the powerful influence of mans presence put such thoughts to flight: the speakers forced to bring his mind into contact with those that he addresses; he is at the mercy of his audience, and if he cannot raise their tempers to the loftiness of his own, his must sink to theirs. Erskine, it is well known, could not speak with effect, if any one of his jurymen remained stolid and unmoved. And, if eloquence is cold and tame with a phlegmatic audience, greedy of coarse food and strong excitement devoid of the mental temperance that with an Athenian was an instinct, and with an Englishman is the result of breeding—with such an audience eloquence must needs grow meretricious, and sink into rant and fustian. This, we fear, seems the Charydbis of American rhetoric.

Eloquence, we are persuaded, will never flourish in America or at home, so long as the public taste is infantile enough to measure the value of a speech by the hours it occupies, and to exalt copiousness and fertility, to the absolute disregard of conciseness. The efficacy and value of compression can scarcelely be overrated. The common air we beat aside with our breath, compressed, has the forceof gunpowder, and will rend the solid rock: and so it with language. A gentle stream of persuasives may flow through the mind, and leave no sediment; let it come at a blow as a cataract, and it sweeps all before it. It is by this magnificent compression that Cicero confounds Cataline, and Demosthenes overwhelms Æschines; by this that Mark Antony, as Shakspeare makes him speaks, carries the heart away with a bad cause; by this that Lady Macbeth makes us, for the moment, sympathize with murder. The language of strong passion is always terse and compressed; genuine conviction uses few words; there is something of artfice and dishonesty in a long speech. No argument worng, because none can make a deep impression, that does not bear to be stated in a single sentence. Our marshalling of speeches, essays, and books, according to their length—deeming that a great work which covers a great space; this "inordinate appetite for printed paper," which devours so much, and so indiscriminately, that it has no leisure for fairly tasting any thing is pernicious to all kinds of literature, but fatal to oratory. The writer who aims at perfection, is forced to dread popularity, and steer wide of it; the orator who must court popularity, is forced to renounce the pursuit of genuine and lasting excellence.—Westminster Review

ON THE FOOD OF CHILDREN.

Dr. Thompson, in his "Researches on the Food of Animals," after some remarks on the relative qualities of nutritive matter in various articles of diet, makes the following judicious observations on the appropiate food for children.

"Milk in some form or other is the true food for children, and the use of arrowroot, or any members of the starch class, is opposed to the principles unfolded in the preceding table. Arrowroot and tapioca are prepared by washing the roots of certain plants, until all the matter soluble in water, is removed. Now, as albumen is soluble in water, this form of nutritive matter must in a great measure be washed away; under this aspect, we might view the original root, before it was subject to the washing process, to approximate in its composition to that of flour.

Arrowroot may therefore be considered as flour deprived, as much as possible, of its nutritive matter. When we administer arrowroot to a child, it is equivalent to washing all the nutritive matter out of bread, flour or oatmeal, and supply it with starch; so it is the same thing as if we gave it starch; and this is in fact what is done, when children are upon what is sold in the shops under the title of "Farinaceous Food"—empirical preparations, of which no one can understand the compositon without analysis.

Of the bad effects produced in children by the use of these most exceptionable mixtures, I have had abundant opportunities to form an opinion, and I am inclined to infer that many of the complaints to which children are subject, are often attributable to the use of such unnatural species of food. It should be remembered that all starchy food, deprived of nutritve matter, is of artificial production, and scarcely, if ever, exists in nature in an isolated form. The administration of arrowroot is therefore only admissible when a sufficient amount of nutritive matter has previously been introduced into the digestive organs, or when it it unadvisable to supply nutrition to the system; as in cases of inflammatory action. This treatment is euivlqent to removing blood from the system, since the wasting of the fibrinous tissues goes on, while an adequate reparation is not sustained by the introduction of nutritive food.

The extensive use of oatmeal, which is attended with such wholesome consequences among the children of all ranks in Scotland, is however an important fact, deserving serious consideration, and it appears to me is strongly corroborative of the principles which I have endeavored to lay down."—Medcal-Chirurgical Review

AN UNHAPPY TEMPER.

BEAR AND FORBEAR.

"Of all bad things by which mankind are curs'd,
Their own bad tempers surely are the worst."

"Good temper! 'Tis the choicest gift
That woman homeward brings—
And can the proudest peasant hit
To bliss unknown to kings."

If we could only trace to their real sources, most of the personal enmities and feuds which occur among the human family, we would discover that in a majority of cases, they originated in an unhappy temper, an excitable, peevish and fretful spirit, either on the part of the offending or the offended. It is in moments of excitement that men make use of harsh expressions, impugn each other's motives, recall by-gone grievances, and thus embitter the present by reviving painful recollections. It is difficult, we admit, to restrain ourselves at all times. It is hard to be insulted, and yet to bear the injury patiently and meekly. Still, when we know that the assailant is of an unhappy temper, and cannot control himself—is, in fact, a constant victim of an evil spirit of his own nature, we should, perhaps rather pity than condemn. If we examine narrowly into the history of such persons we will find that the penalty which they pay for their infirmity, is indeed fearful—that they are constantly getting into difficulty—that they cannot govern themselves—that they disturb and destroy friendships of years' standing—and that indeed, many of their hours are embittered, simply because they cannot control their manner, language, and feelings.

We some days since had occasion to be present when and where three gentlemen were holding an argument. It was upon a subject of no little interest and excitement, and all were more or less interested. They were friends, had been for years, and entered upon the controversy in a mood any thing but angry. But as the matter proceeded, they became more animated, and at last, one utterly lost the control of himself, and denounced the others with no little bitterness. He was reminded of his excitement and his language, had the good sense to see the error, and the manliness to acknowledge it. He admitted, indeed, that he was of an unhappy temper, that he frequently became excited before he was aware of it, and did things of which in his cool moments, he was heartily ashamed. But he possessed a noble, a redeeming quality. The moment, that he became calm, and reviewed all that had transpired, he had not only sense enough to discover the mis-step he had taken, but the manliness to make generous and prompt atonement.

The great infirmity with many people, under similar circumstances, is, an unwillingness to retract harsh expressions, a dogged and perverse obstinacy. Thus, in the first place, they will while under momentary excitemon't, commit an injustice, and when they become calm, refuse to acknowledge that they have done wrong. Ill-will is thus created, which lasts for years.

In domestic life, there is nothing more invaluable than a gentle temper, a mild and even frame of mind—an amiable appreciation of the errors of others, and a generous disposition to make due allowances. We would, however, in all such cases, have some firmness mingled with the quality. The mistake must not be committed, that amiability and weakness are inseparable. An individual may very readily adhere to opinions with great firmness, and at the same time be calm, gentle and good-natured. Because a friend differs with us, we need not get into a passion with him. He may be wrong, utterly wrong, and we may feel satisfied that he is so. But this should not disturb the courtesy of our language, or the amenity of our manner. It is a habit with some, nay, with many who cannot govern their temper, to denounce all who differ from them, as fools or knaves, and to attribute to them the basest and most venal of motives. And when, too, exactly the same rule is applied to themselves, they become furious, and charge that they have been insulted in the grossest manner. It is always best to avoid such people. Contact and collision can do no good. They are bigots and madmen on certain subjects, and they should be treated accordingly. If you attempt to argue, the chances are two to one that they will use harsh language, and thus either provoke you to retort, or compel you to receive an insult in silence. Either is unpleasant. The unhapy in temper [illegible] indeed to be pitied. They cannot but discover [illegible], that they are avoided by society. The enmity, although not catching, has the same effect as a pestilence. It repels.

"Will you be one of a party to New York?" said a friend to another a few days since—and he proceeded to designate half a dozen persons who had consented to join in a trip of pleasure. The other who at first had manifested great willingness, promptly declined, when he heard the names. The reason was—one of the individuals was of a notoriously bad temper. He would, in the language of the other, certainly provoke a quarrel, within forty-eight hours—and inasmuch as the object was pleasure, the gentleman invited, was not willing to put himself in opposition to become even indirectly a party to a fiend. Alas! for the [illegible] the peevish, the fretful, and the ill-tempered [illegible] few know, or knowing, govern [illegible].

A Hoosier was called upon to stand a away out West, to testify to the character of a brother Hoosier. It was as follows: "How long have you known Bill Bushwhack?" "Ever since he was born."

"What is his general character?"

"Letter A, No. 1—'bove par a very great way."

"Would you believe him on oath?"

"Yes, sir-ee, on or off, or any other way."

"What, in your opinion, are his qualifications to good character."

"He's the best shot on the prairies or in the woods; he can shave the eye winkers off of a wolf as far as a shooting iron 'll carry a ball; he can drink a quart of grog any day, and chaws to backer like a hoss."

A Ground for Steadfastness.

If I were not penetrated with a conviction of the truth of the Bible, and the reality of my own experience, I should be confounded on all sides—from within and from without—in the world and in the church.—Cecil.

MY THOUGHTS ON THE SUBJECT.

My brother Jonathan is a descendant of the Bull family, on the other sides of the great common; and he, with some others of his brethren, ran away and came over to this country then a wilderness and cleared up a piece of land, and built him a house, and began to live comfortably, when Mr Bull who is said to have ill-treated Jonathan during his apprenticeship, and would never give up his indentures, came over to see what he was about, and began to make a bustle in his house and to say to him in the language of Laban to Jacob; "These children are my children, these cattle are my cattle and all thou seest is mine" Jonathan took this in high dudgeon: a squabble ensued, and Bull fairly drove him out of the house and barred the door. But Jonathan watched opportunity and soon after, meeting Mr. Bull on a small hillock, just before his front door at it they went, and Bull got a sound beating, and Jonathan, soon after, succeeded in getting possession of his house again, and also made Bull give up his indentures and likewise give a quit claim to his farm, which Bull said he had a right to, because some of his family caught rackoons there, before Jonathan began to clear. Bull then went home about his business and all went on again peaceably enough until there happened a great uproar in the family of Lewis Baboon who was next neighbour to Bull,—their farms being only separated by a narrow lane which ran out from the common. Bull, who loved "to have his spoon in every one's dish," went over to see what was the matter; when a young fellow, by the name of nap, a servant who had been lately admitted in the family, and had turned old Lewis out of house and home and called himself the regulator—hit Mr. Bull such a blow on the head as nearly knocked him down. On that began 'the unprofitable contest of trying who should do the other the most harm," and Mr Bull forbade Jonathan from trading with Nap and Nap did the same with respect to Bull. It was hard to say which was the worst. Now Jonathan was much vexed at this, because he made a great deal of money by trading with both families, and now and then hauling them a load of wood, a few bushels of wheat, when they were out, and other produce of his farm; together with what rakcoon skins he could catch. But chiefly he was angry at Bull, because he kept possession of the common, and put up bars across the lane, while Nap could do nothing but threat and swagger. Bull also charged Jonathan with stealing his sheep, altering their marks and turning them out for his own: and Bull's sheperds took them away again wherever they could find them on the common, and sometimes they got some of Jonathan to boot, as they said by mistake. On the whole, Jonathan got so mad, that he declared open war against Bull, and his sheperds threw stones at Bull's sheperds and fairly knocked over half a dozen of them. But Bull being the strongest, drove Nap out of Baboon's house, once and again. and reinstated Lewis, and finally chained Nap to a rock in the midst of the common, where it is said he left him to starve with only, a paper umbrella to defend him against rain and sunshine,—though others said that Nap gnawed his chains, knocked his head against the rock, and died of vexation Bull also drove Jonathan's sheperds off the common and got a good many of his sheep in his clutches; and not only so, he drove of a whole flock of black sheep from the southern part of Jonathan's farm. Jonathan at length got tired of the contest, as he found he "got more kicks than coppers, and Bull always said the quarrel was not of his seeking: so they agreed to shake hands and make it up, Bull engaging to pay for the black sheep and Jonathan giving a sort of a half promise that he would mark no more of Bull's sheep the other points in dispute being left as usual in statu que.

Mr. Bull and brother Jonathan now began to like each other better than ever;—were hand and glove, and very flush of mutural compliments, when lo! and behold? the evel one put it into Jonathan's head to go and engage a stone cutter to hew him out a great stone post, which he stuck up on the top of the knoll where he had the brush with Bull ever so long before, and had the following words cut out on it, in large letters:—"Here Mr. Jonathan Freeman met John Bull Esq on the 17th of June, A. D. 1775, and beat him black and blue"

Jonathan also invited a nephew of Baboons —who had helped him in his first contest with Bull, and had come on a visit to Jonathan—to be present at the raising of the stone, and they made a world jollification, and drank a great many toasts, in which Bull was not spared.

This made Mr. Bull look rather glum, and even Jonathan's younger brothers cast a squint eye at the stone and called him a great brag. But Jonathan pretends that it is only to ornament his front yard, refresh his memory, and to induce his children to entertain a good understanding with the Bull family, on the ground that we always have more esteem for the man we beat, than for him who beats us. Brother Jonathan, about the same time, took many swaggering airs on himself, and had the likenesses of his victorious shepherds painted on his mugs and pitchers, so that not one of his family could ask one of the Bull family to take a sociable mug of flip, but before he could get the mug as far as his chin, his eyes were saluted by the portrait of the said shepherds, glaring at him like another Captain Kidd, which left him little stomach for his drink, or kind feelings for his host. Jonathan also got his rooms papered with pictures of his former exploits;—all as he said, to keep up a good neighbourhood' and cause himself to be respected,—so that Bull can't pay him a friendly visit, but that in doors, and all around, he is reminded and twitted of every little advantage that Jonathan ever got over him—nay, he can not even sit down to eat a bit of pumkin pie with Jonathan at a husking, but that the latter reminded him, in his country lingo, of his having been "throated, and winnowed, and bulleid." &c.

Now Bull grumbles at all this, and he has reason. But he may as well look at home, where he has an old garret fitted up in the style of a chapel, though only used as such on occasion of wedding or a christening Here he has stuck up every old rag he has ever snatched off the backs of his antagonists in his quarrels, —and as Bull has been a tasty old fellow in his time, he has a pretty many of them, (though not much of Johathan's, except an old hat,) and he prizes them more than silver or gold. for he says, it will teach his children to be quarrelsome, and that he follows the laudable example of Tecumseh the Great, who lined the inside of his wigwam with scalps, which he delighted to shew to his children, while he taught them the use of the scalping knife and tomahawk

However, the neighbors do say that the friendship of Brother Jonathan and Squire Bull will be of short duration, and that Bull will either throw down Jonathan's stone, or soon seek an occasion of erecting one at his own door.

BELKNAP.

IDOLATRY.

It is the first-born of folly; the great and leading paradox. It is, indeed, the abridgement and sum-total of all absurdities. Yet it was practised by the Egyptians, once the far-famed masters of all arts and learning. In the book of Isaiah, (xliv. 14.) we read that a man heweth down a tree, and part of it he burns, and the residue thereof he maketh a god. With one part he furnishes his chimney with the other his chapel. A strange thing, that the fire must first consume this part, and then burn incense to that; as if there were more divinity in one end of the stick, than in the other; or as if it could be graved and painted Omnipotent, or the nails and hammer could give it an apotheosis.

THE SPELL OF YEARS.

How painful to note the change which years have made, whether it be in the outward or the inward man! So intently occupied as we ever are with individual interest, we rarely pause to reflect, or note how many changes are in progress around us, until accident awakens us for a moment to consciousness—then, the work of time seems like the doings of an enchanter, and we stop and wonder for a moment, until we glance inward, and find that there, alas! thought, feeling and emotion are not as once they were, when life was in the freshness of early years—and the world had not chilled the first gushes of nature—nor taught us the lessons of experience.

THE GOODNESS OF GOD.

May not the love and bounty of God be likened unto the sun the source of all earthly good? And man unto the humble flower which springs up from earth? For the shower which bears it down and veils it in tears is but to strengthen it and prepare it for the gush of holy light which succeeds. Keeping in mind this comparison, may we not bear cheerfully and with gratitude the trials with which we are sometimes bowed down, while considering they are but in order to renew our strength and to fit us for the glorious light of the kingdom to come.

ADAM.

His own mind taught him a due dependance upon God and chalked out to him the just proportions and measures of behaviour toward all around him. He had no catechism, but the creation, needed no study but reflection, read no book but the volume of the world, and that too, not for rules to work by but for objects to work upon. Reason was tutor and first principles his Magna moralia.

If incivility proceeds from pride, it deserves to be hated, if from brutishness, it is contemptible

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA LIBERIA, FEBUARY 28, 1849.

The gratitude of the people of this Republic is eminently due to the British nation, for the deep sympathy and prompt, and we may say, spontaneous kindness which they have manifested for us.

It is known by all that we have ever been sanguine, and from the first movement of the independence question—when some were opposing; others halting, we went steadily along, and ventured to predict success—complete and entire if once the people could be induced to act.

In the English we always expect a friendly feeling. Their well known magnanimity—the deep interest they evince in the welfare of the African race—their inflexible adherence to the maxims of justice, and their ready response to the calls of humanity left no room to doubt that they would eventually accord to us all we could reasonably desire. And we confess with satisfaction, that in kindness and courtesy—in promptness of response to our appeals they have very far exceeded our most sanguine expectations.

Every attention was paid to our President while in England, which is usually paid to public functionaries from foreign countries, and the government listened with attention to every representation he had to make.

In our last number, our co-adjutor, who is a member of the government, informed our readers, that England and France have recognised us, and that assurances have been obtained that Prussia will shortly follow their example. This is indeed a great point gained. To be acknowledged and recognised by the leading powers of Europe; as composing one of the families of nations, is a matter of no small consequence. It will enable us to give vigor and energy to our laws throughout the Rebublic; while at the same time it will silence all that bickering and complaint at their enforcement, in which some foreigners have delighted to indulge.

Perhaps we would not be very wide of the mark were we to say that more considerations than one induced this prompt action on the part of the European powers. The British people regard themselves pledged to put down the slave trade. To attain this object they are annually expending thousands of pounds, and frequently sacrificing valuable lives. Nor are the French people far, if at all, behind them in zeal to destroy this abominable traffic. The cruisers of both nations are continually hovering over the coast watching these pirates; but their vigilance is frequently eluded, and the slaver escapes with his cargo. It is now universally admitted that settlements such as Liberia, present the most effectual barrier against the operations of the slave trade—that so far as their influence extends, the trade is wholly destroyed. In proportion therefore, as the Republic of Liberia increases in strength and influence—in proportion as it extends its territory and acquires strength to protect it, and suppress illicit traffick in the same proportion will their object be attained, and the necessity of keeping cruisers in the vicinity of the settlement be decreased.

This is a correct view of the matter. From observation, we have been long convinced that the slave trade cannot be put down by cruisers. The profits of the business is so great, that it will allow the slaver to resort to expedients to procure goods and ship slaves, which none but a slaver would ever devise; and in spite of the utmost vigilance of the cruiser watching the pirate, he would carry on his operations, and escape with two cargoes out of three. The slave trade will be more easily put down by the combined energies of Colonies and Naval force acting in concert. It would be eventually destroyed at a given place by a colony alone without the aid of a naval force; but the process would be tedious. A long time would be required to effect it. The natives are so wedded to the traffic —it having descended to them as an heir-loom from their fathers, that they are easily roused into hostility against any and every thing they are taught to believe is arrayed against it; and they are ever ready to protect the slaver. The cunning slave dealer takes advantage of this propensity of the natives, excites their suspicions, and at length converts them into inveterate enemies of the colony. Hence a colony would act rashly to come out boldly against a slaving establishment before it had become sufficiently strong to sustain itself against both, the natives and the slaver, unless it were aided by a naval force. Well do we recollect what indignities our little crafts had to suffer in the early years of this colony. Well do we recollect how they were frequently fired into with the most wanton cruelty by the slavers;—well do we recollect what anxiety possessed the bosoms of our sailors when at sea, they espied a vessel in the distance. And this was at a time, when the colony was not engaged in any active operations against the trade. But the sagacity of the slaver foresaw the destruction of his trade, in the growth and permanent establishment of the colony, and this awakened his hostility. At that time there were but few cruisers on the coast, and their station was principally on the southern part. Of late years a division of the English squadron has made this a cruising station, and we have not been annoyed.

It is perhaps with a view to accomplish this great object as well as from motives of sympathy, that the British government and people have given us some more substantial proof of their regard than mere recognition on parchment.

We have heard that it is in contemplation to treat for the Gallenas, and to extend our borders to the Sherbro. It was stated in our last, that as the Gallenas is now in a state of blockade, this a favorable time to open a negotiation. We think so. Is is desirable perhaps, that we should possess those places. But would it not be well to consider whether, if the cruisers should retire, we are able to protect them and keep out slavers? This seems to us an important question. Should we succeed in getting these points, it will in all probability, be expected that we will suppress the illicit traffic there —that we will at once and forever destroy the slave trade. Should we fail to do this, many generously affected for us may be disappointed, and sympathy for the Republic become greatly weakened. We are persuaded of nothing more firmly than we are, that so soon as the present investing force at the Gallenas is withdrawn, the slavers will re-commence their operations—unless they are repressed by some other force. Is it not worthy of inquiry, whether we have such a force? The place has been often destroyed, and as often re-settled. If we do not mistake, Captain Hagin, of H. B. M brig Thistle routed the slavers there more than twenty years ago. Since then thousands of slaves have been sent off. But admitting that we can go up there and destroy the place, are we prepared for annual expeditions of that character? These appear to us grave questions, and eminently entitled to serious consideration.

When we drew up the bill of our present boundary making Grand Cape Mount river our north western frontier, many regarded it extravagant, and we ourself believed we were assuming a responsibility fully equal to our resources.

*W*e have thrown out these hints and suggestions to call public attention to the subject, and to bring it before minds more capable than ours of determining correctly. We would by no means be understood as being opposed to the purchase of these places—we only question the propriety of acquisition, if it is to be burdened with stipulations which we might find difficult if not impossible to perform.

The arrival of President Roberts from Europe.—The cordial reception he met with from the people and the festivities which followed, were very handsomely noticed in our last. This was as it should be.

But it occurs to us that the successful issue to which the President has conducted the arduous and delicate trust committed to him, is entitled to some more substantial acknowledgement, than empty compliment and gratulation. The President has traveled wholly at his own expense The people of this Republic, we are confident are too magnanimous to receive so great benefit wholly at the cost of one individual. The President should be re-imbursed. With this view we mentioned some weeks ago to a member of the Legislature, the propriety of bringing in a bill allowing the President his salary while absent. Since then we have been reflecting upon the matter, and knowing by experience the expense of traveling, we are convinced, that the salary, if allowed, will fall very far short of re-imbursing the outlay. We therefore suggest that an additional amount be voted sufficient to cover his expenses. Should any be disposed to carp, let such remember, that we can to succeed in our undertaking only by fair and honorable dealing with all men.

Active preparations are going on for the expedition to New Cesters. Three of H. B. M vessels, one or two of the French squadron and the U. S. ship Yorktown will accompany the expedition.

On the 22nd: the French Frigate Penelope, Commodore Edouard Bouet, and French war steamer Carman, Captain Darrican, arrived in our harbor. The Commodore came on shore early on the 23rd, and announced his intention of landing his troops about 250 men, on Saturday, to salute the flag of the Republic, and thus formally recognise it. To receive him, three uniform companies of the town were ordered out. Early on Saturday morning the boats crowded with men were seen approaching the beach. Three pieces of artillery were first landed and stationed, first on the site of Central Fort, but afterwards removed in front of Colonel Yates' residence. The companies of the town were stationed there, that being the place appointed to receive the French troops. About 7 o'clock the horn was heard upon the hill, and in a few moments the bright muskets of the French were seen glittering in the sun. When they arrived at Colonel Yates', they halted for about fifteen minutes, while the officers took some refreshments. This being over, the whole line started—Artillery on the left, and moved up Broad Street, and after some countermarching in front of the Court House, the artillery was planted in front of the President's house, at the foot of the flag staff, on which he flag of the Republic was flying. The Flag of the French Republic was flying at Central Fort. A few moments after the guns were planted, the thunder of the cannon commenced. The French fired 21 guns, which were responded to by the vessels in harbor. As soon as their firing ceased, Liberia's turn came round, and the guns from Central Fort and Signal Hill, answered most handsomely.

Directly afterwards the men partook of a collation which had been prepared for them by Mr. Moore, and as soon as that was over they went on board. The officers remained and dined with the President. We are pleased to say that the best order prevailed during the whole exercise.—Not one intoxicated person was seen, so that we have not the opportunity to record a single instance of a broken head. The Commodore left on the 26th.

We regret to say that a colored man belonging to the Frigate Pusulope, was killed on the 24th, by falling from a tree which he had ascended to collect fruit.

Good Powder.

The powder sent out for the Republic cannot be very good.—Friend Jonhson says he threw some in the fire and it "put the fire out."

The treaty with Great Britain was ratified by the Senate on the 26th. We hope to lay it before our readers in our next. The compact with the American Colonization Society was acceded to, to day.

Rare Phenomenon.

Last night we had a real April storm. The lightning was one continual blaze, and the thunder was terrific, while the rain came down in torrents. We have been in Africa since 1821, and this is the only instance we recollect of a thunder storm in February Farmers had better be up and doing.

On the 20th, our harbor presented an animated scene. There were six French vessels of war and one English H. B. M. brig "Sea Lark" Captain Moneypenny. The numerous boats plying to and from the shore, wore an air of liveliness and activity not usually witnessed

The Legislature commenced its extra session on Monday last. President Roberts read his Message, in which he made some valuable suggestions and recommended some highly important measures; but it is doubtful whether there is sufficient time to attend to them at present. One thing however, should by all means receive immediate attention. The treaty with England makes slave trading piracy. By all means "slave trading" should be defined. Our present laws on the subject are too vague and indefinite.

We wait with no little anxiety to hear what the American people will do for us. That they have done much cannot be denied—seeing they conducted us from nothing to our present condition; but we hope and believe they will do more.

Dr. Lugenbeel delivered an excellent address a few evenings past, before the Ladies' Liberia Literary Institute.

ERRATUM.

In our last number in giving the names of the officers of the U. S. ship Yorktown, we wrote Decatur instead of Yorktown. Please read Yorktown.

AFFECTATION.

"In man or woman—but far most in man—
I loath all affectation."—Cowper

"I will be proud, I will read politicke authors, I will baffle Sir Toby, I will wash off gross acquaintance, I will be point-de-vice—the man; I will remember who commended my yellow stockings and wished to see them ever cross-gartered.—Malvolio.

Mr. EDITOR.—This is a world of tricks. Most of us (poor souls) live by trick, and I am sure many of us are doomed to die by trick. But perhaps of "all the tricks of singularity" which are attempted to be played off upon simple men that "speak right on," the tricks of affectation are the most silly and disgusting. Every man and almost every woman (with equal sorrow and diffidence be it said) has some fault or failing or others; but then, it frequently happens that single fault serves as a foil to set off some valuable accomplishment, and therefore does not make the person absolutely contemptible.

In my view, the the worst kind of affectation is that of religion Affectation in general, is only ridiculous—but in religion it is criminal. Like the solemnity of an oath, it then seems to appeal to heaven to attest its truth. The pious subject of this miserable affectation is to be seen choosing the lowest seat in the synagogue; and he is ever constant "in season and out of season" to let the poor sinful world know how good he is.—Even his air, dress and manner betoken the utmost humility and self-abandonment. It may be true that like Shylock he "waits upon his bond," but that is only because the scriptures say that he who provides not for his own household is worse than an infidel. It is equally true he is bitter and intolerant to all who differ from him in religious opinion, but the reason for this is, we are admonished that there shall be "false teachers" and wolves in sheep's clothing in the world.—His communication, for aught we know, is in the simplicity of yea, yea, and nay, nay, but when an object of privant or public charity is presented, it is for no other cause than conscientious scruples that he begins with Nay, nay!

He is "constant at church with book of wicked prayers," in order "to mend the world"—and to set the example of piety to his neighbours, and to prove like Holy Whillie a "burning and shining light to all the place."

"Oh ye wha are sae guid yourse!,
Sea pious and sae holy,
Y'eve nought to do but mark and tell
Your neebers' faults and folly."

The affectation of wealth is another common and dangerous misfortune. Many persons otherwis respectable, have often rendered themselves very poor and very ridiculous by affecting the style and living of their more wealthy nieghbours Now for instance, if Mrs. Puff gives a rout where one hundred people are nearly jammed to death, at the cost of one hundred dollars, why then to be sure, Mrs. Puffy, in the plenitude of her wealth, is in duty bound to give another, where two hundred people are to suffer the miseries of the black hole of Calcutta, and at an expense of two hundred dollars. And so it is, that if Mrs. Puff have an article of fancy that costs sixty dollars, Mrs. Puffy forthwith must have one at a hundred.

"It's hardest work man alive,
To make three guineas gae for five;"

And so do Mr. and Mrs. Puffy find it; for at last ugly creditors demand their dues. and—the rest is obvious.

But if there are some who are made poor by the affectation of wealth, there are others who make themselves despicable by an affectation of Poverty. Among such, a a slovliness of dress, coarseness of manners, a contempt for she common courtesies and distinctions of life, and moreover loud and persevering lamentations over losses, expenses and ruin, are characters which are meant to indicate superior wisdom. It would be an excellent lesson for these grumblers actually to suffer for a little while the miseries and deprivations they affect to experience. Such affectation is nothing but insulting and grateful muckery. And then there is a mawkish affectation of sensibility and sentimentalism, a sort of half fool susceptibility of mind and nerve, that sees the "air drawn dagger" in a common pitchfork, and that places the possessor in an imaginary region, far above the common feelings, the common business and the common sense of the world. People may be too sublimated for a world like ours. which as Kind Richard says, we must "bustle in." If by any misfortune you were bleeding to death, you could expect no relief from such persons:—because they 'owe you no subsrciption,' and because they would faint away at the sight of a drop of christian blood;' and more than all, because they might injure their greem dress, or as Shakspeare says, make 'the green one red.' Exquisite sensibility is employed in pouring, day and night; over the wanton pages of the "sentimental" Werter, the blasphemous raving of the teuder Rosseau, or the fee-few-fum nonsence of the delectable Della Crusac. Acts of mercy are too commonplace for sensibility And then there is au affectation of almost every thing under the sun; anffectation in writing and talking and riding, laughing and crying, and in feasting and dressing One person writes all the ponderosity of Johnson, another punishes you with puns, and a third jingles through the alphabet with apt alliteration's artful aid." One lisps in modest childishness, and another blusters like a storm in winter. Some persons speak as if their tongues were burnt, and others as if they had a teazle in their throat. In short there is no end to affectetion. One man sports a small hat with never a crown and another recreates his head a hat without a brim, for the sake of notoriety. One person writes you a letter that you cannot read, and consequently cannot answer, and another fills a page with his signature. A very worthy man of my acquaintance walks on his toes, as if were treading among eggs; while another, equally respectable plants his heel on the pavement, as if he were enforcing the word of command to a platoon of soldiers. There you will see one who is polite enough to bow twenty times an hour, like a Frenchman, and here another, who only grunts at you once a year, like a Dutchman. If Alexander were alive we should see much graceful dnformity of the neck, but in place of that, we have at present, only the "Grecian stoop." If the Cynic philosopher were among us; we should have tubs; ill nature, and wit,—we now have ill-nature enough, and "Words of learned length, and thundering sound"—but very very little wit, it must be acknowledged.

WIVES AND SISTERS

A deal of mischief and misery is not unfrequently occasioned in families, by the interference of relations between man and wife; and in many instances, the unhappiness of a married couple's existence is owing to the weakness of the wife, and the malignity or mistaken kindness of her friends. A woman should look upon her husband as her only friend; and, in all cases, wherever he differs with any branch of her family, should assume it as a fact, that he is in the right, and govern herself accordingly. Whenever any one whispers a tale to her, derogatory to her husband, she should look upon the tale-bearer as the enemy of her happiness in the first place and, in the second place, as a despicable and impertinent person, as all talebearers are In short, as Miss Pardoe says in the subjoined extract, when a woman marries, she should give up her heart feelings fancies and opinions to her husband, and never allow a sister's influence to be superiour to his. For the joy, tranquility and comfort of her existance is dependant upon her husband, and if they cannot live in amity together, they will look in vain for comfort or respectability in the of the other relations of life.

PRACTICAL PIETY.

Its voice is not low and weak, chastising the passions as old Eli did his lustful, domineering sons "Not so, my sons, not so." But it speaks out saying, This shall and must be done. It speaks like a legislator: the thing spoken is a law; and the manner of speaking lays a new obligation. In short, there is as great a difference between practical and theoretical piety, as there is between empire and advice, counsel and command, a companion and a governour.

HUMILITY OF RELIGION

The humility of religion, paradox though it seems tends to elevate and refine. There is nothing in its whole range which can jar upon the harmony of taste—nothing from its loftiest to its lowest precept which is not as purified as crystal from not coarseness. The „pride of life" is forbidden, but not its grace or its beauty; for He who for bade it has clothed the lily, and" Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these."

OUR MOTHER EARTH.

BY DUGANNE.

Whence arise the springs that nourish
All creation from its birth?
Whence spring up the oaks, and flourish?
From the Earth—our mother Earth!

Where are gems and crystals hidden?
Where are ores of wond'rous worth?
Whence are fire and heat upbidden?
From the Earth—our mother Earth!

Whence uprise the green oases,
In the desert's sandy dearth?
What is life's support and basis?
'Tis the Earth—our mother Earth.

Bread, and fire and crystal water—
All within our being's girth—
Gold and gems to those who sought her,
Hath she given—mother Earth.

She is mankind's nurse and servant—
Still our mother and our slave:
Still the same in labor fervent,
From our birth-day to our grave.

Never yet hath God ordained her
To be trodden by the few!
Grasping lords have but profaned her,
And their crime they yet shall rue!

Like the seed within her bosom
Sleeps a future, yet, of RIGHT!—
Man shall see his hopes in blossom—
Man shall yet reveal his might!

Then, no one, above another,
Shall assert his nobler birth;
But each man shall share his mother,—
Share his glorious mother, EARTH!

A National Anthem for

LIBERIA IN AERICA:

Being a Freewill Offering to the cause of Wise Emancipation.

BY MARTIN FERQUHAR TUPPER, D. C. L., F. R. S.

Author of "Proverbial Philosophy," &c.

Praise ye the Lord, for this new-born Star.
On the blue firmament blazing afar!
Bless ye the Lord!—our souls to cheer
"The love of liberty brought us here!"

Hail to Liberia's beacon bright
Luring us home with its silver light,
Where we may sing without peril or fear
"The love of liberty bright us here!"

Hail! new home on the dear old shore
Where Ham's dark sons dwelt ever of yore,
Thou shalt be unto us doubly dear,
For "love of liberty brought us here!"

Come, ye children of Africa, come!
Bring ye the viol, the pipe, and the drum
To herald this Star on its bright career,
For "love of liberty brought us here!"

Come,—with peace and to all good-will;
Unready to combat for insult or ill,—
Leave, with the trumpet, the sword and the spear,
For "love of liberty brought us here!"

Praise unto God! who hath broke the chain
That bound us as slaves on the Western main Thanks, white brothers! Oh, thanks sincere
That "love of liberty brought us here!

Thanks—ye have rescued us as from the grave.
And freemen made of the desperate slave
That ye may call him both brother and peer,
For "love of liberty brought us here!"

Thanks! O raise that shout once more,
Thanks! let it thrill Liberia's shore,
"Thanks! while we our standard rear,
"The love of liberty brought us here!"

Thine, Columbia, thine was the hand
That set us again on our dear land,
We will remember thee far or near,
For "love of liberty brought us here!"

Yes, Liberty! freeman gave
Freedom and Thee to the ransomed slave;
Then our song a shout both loud and clear,
"Love of liberty brought us here!"

A STRIKING CONTRAST!

"I seek not yours, but you," said PAUL,
"FREELY I preach to great and small;
Silver and gold I do not crave,
But all the world I long to save.
These hands my earthly wants supply;
My crown of glory waits on high.
As thus I follow Christ my Lord,
Walk in my steps with one accord."

PEMPTUS MISSIONARY BEGGERS.

In saule robes with solemn faces,
They mount aloft the highest places:
An hour or more employ their tongues,
Weary the throng—exhaust their lungs
"Bring forth your worldly wealth," they cry,
"And barter for the joys on high!
Treasure bestow with liberal hands,
To save the souls in heathen lands.
Support our Missionary plan;
Reverend divines this scheme began,
But all must fail if you withhold
The needful silver and the gold!,'

MISCELLANEOUS.

DR. HODGKIN

From an Introductory Lecture on Surgery by Professor Gibson of the University of Pennsylvania

But the [illegible] individual I have yet to notice [illegible] in public estimation so exalted [illegible] not only in England, but throughout Europe, as to deserve much more [illegible] than the limits of a single lecture [illegible] possibly allow. I allude to [illegible] member of the Society of Friends, who finished [illegible] from the world [illegible] private [illegible] surgeon [illegible] physician [illegible] other countries [illegible] of the human race, [illegible] of the helpless and [illegible] ever ready to [illegible] its succour and [illegible] as God ever [illegible] and uncompromising [illegible] and right, as determined and unflinching opponent of injustice and wrong [illegible] world ever saw; and all these [illegible] ties so unobtrusive and refined [illegible] ted with feelings and sympathies, and with charities so unbounded and diffusive, as tempered with mildness and modesty, and forbearance and truth, as to entitle him fairly to be considered as a specimen of human greatness and goodness personified and combined. This will [illegible] sound to you like unqualified, extravagant panegyric; but, when I assert [illegible] every tongue in England [illegible] claims the same, and that my own limited observation confirms all I have heard, I cannot do less than state what I have reason to believe to be perfectly true. In proof of the correctness of these positions, I may add that his father, a most respectable member of the Society of Friends, determined to educate his two sons in the best possible manner, and then to devote one to the law, the other to medicine. His hopes in both were amply realized, by the former becoming a distinguished advocate, and subsequently a minister of the Gospel, in which capacity he is now, throughout suffering Ireland, achieving a vast amount of good; and by the other raising himself to a height in his profession which few, considering the combination of qualities he has united with it, have ever attained. The first opportunity, perhaps, afforded Dr. Hodgkin to distinguish himself, was the task he undertook of putting together, and systematizing, and making useful [illegible] catalogue of great [illegible] and most valuable and [illegible] pathological cabinets England contains—that of Guy's Hospital.—So important were Dr. Hodgkin's services upon this occasion, as to entitle him, in public estimation, to any appointment within the gift of the managers of the hospital; and yet upon the occurrence of a vacancy, instead of receiving the appointment his claims were rejected, and the office given to one whose influence in church and states was superior to that of the plain, unsophisticated, intellectual, pure minded member of the Society of Friends.—Subsequently, when the museum was thrown in disorder by the mismanagement of heads and hands not calculated to extend and improve it, Dr. Hodgkin's benevolence was applied to, and in an instant he repaired to the scene of action, and, like a true Christian, forgetting and forgiving his wrongs, soon put confusion to flight, and established in its place perfect regularity and order. On these subjects I never heard Dr. Hodgkin open his lips, and I only state what every member of the profession with whom I conversed believes to be true. In proof of the perfect honesty and fearlessness of the man, I may also remark, that years ago, when a celebrated trial took place to investigate charges brought by a journalist against a surgeon who had been unfortunate in a case of lithotomy, an accusation being made that he had destroyed the patient by opening improperly, the wrong viscus; Dr. Hodgkin, from his high character for skill and integity, was selected by both parties to make the dissection. This was done in the presence of one who had made the charge, and who was to appear on the trial as a witness against the operator, and no opening, of the kind was found. Whilst Dr. Hodgkin's head was turned in another direction, the witnes, there was reason to believe, pushed his finger suddenly through the part, and immediately exclaimed, "Why, Doctor, the opening has escaped your notice; here it is." "Then," said the Doctor, in the coolest and most determined manner, "Thou hast made it thyself;" and gave his testimony in court to the same effect, and to the utter confusion of the accusers, and the acquital of the unfortunate surgeon. The medical works of Dr. Hodgkin are not numerous, but of the most interesting and solid description. His two volumes especially, "On the Morbid Anatomy of the Serous and Mucrous Membranes," comprising a course of lectures delivered some years ago, are substantial proof of the extent and variety of his information, and of the originality of his views. On colonial subjects especially [illegible] connected with the advancement of Christianity, on the British colonization of New Zealand, on the Hudson's Bay Company, in the reports of the Aborigines' Protection Society, and throughout various numbers of the Colonial Intelligencer or Aborigines' Friend, he has written constantly and by his influence and example, contributed largely to benefit all who have had the good fortune to excite his sympathy or attract his attention. In private the utmost universal estimation, I [illegible] and, in which Dr. Hodgkin is held, there is scarcely a day that we may not meet at his hospitable board the most distinguished men from every quarter of the globe, harmoniously assembled with the humblest individuals his philanthropy has gathered around him. Of his extraordinary freedom from selfishness, I may also record, that upon one occasion, not long since, when a nobleman high in power was desirous of serving him in the most substantial way, by leaving at his disposal an office which he took for granted he would secure for himself four benevolent friends bestowed it quietly upon another whom he thought in every way worthy of the gift. This I learned not from himself, but from one well acquainted with the fact. From the same source I understood it was no uncommon thing for medical men of every age and degree of intelligence, when they wished information on any subject, and were desirous of saving themselves trouble and research, to apply to Dr. Hodgkin for it, with a certainty of not being disappointed, and occasionally with an ingratitude on their part which induced them to appropriate to themselves opinions and facts belonging to him. I will conclude my account of this very extraordinary, most virtuous and intellectual man, by stating that he is about fifty years of age, a bachelor, thin, and rather below the medium height, of large expressive features, brilliant eye and healthful complexion, very upright in figure quick and stirring in all his movements, and so kind and benevolent in manner as to win almost immediately the affection of all who approach him. No wonder, then, he should be largely engaged in practice, and still less, should refuse fees when he conceives that the circumstances of his patient are such as not readily to afford giving them. Often, I am told, has he been known to pursue a patient and insist upon returning the sovereing left upon his table

A Yankees calculation.—"Well, it's curious how we do get over the ground. Why, the trees all look as if they were dancin' a jig to double quick time. I kin recollect ten or twelve years ago, that if I started from Bosting on a Wednesday, I cud git in Filedelphy on the next Saturday, takin' just three days. Now I kin git from Bosting to Filedelphy in one day, and I've been calculatin' that if the power of steam increases for the next ten years as it has been doin' for the last ten years, I'd be in Filedephy jist two days before I started from Bosting."

THE HARMONY OF CREATION.

I hold there is a general beauty in the works of God and therefore no deformity in any kind or species of creature whatsoever. I cannot tell by what logick we call a toad, a bear, or an elephant, ugly; they being created in those outward shapes and figures which best express those actions of their inward forms, and having passed that general visitation of God, who saw that all he had made was good, that is conformable to his will, which authors deformity, and is the rule and order of beauty; there is no deformity but in monstrosity, wherein notwithstanding there is a kind of beauty, nature so ingeniously contriving the irregular part, as they become sometimes more remarkable than the principal fabrick.

THE GOSPEL.

It is the great and only means, that God has sanctified and designed to repair the breaches of humanity to set fallen man upon his feet again, to clarify his will, and to rectify his reason, to rectify his will, and to compose and regulate his affections: The whole business of our redemption is, in short, only to rub over the defaced copy of the creation, to reprint God's image on the soul, and to set forth nature in a second and better edition.

POWER OF FAITH.

Whenever we are, and however it is with us, let us see that God is always the same, and is all-sufficient. Faith does not look at the difficulties in our way, but listens to the voice of the promises, and rests on the faithfulness of Him that hath promised.—Give us not fear or voice but that of faith; and when faith speak, God always hears. 'Ask what you will, and it shall be given you.' Faith honors God with confidence, and he crowns faith with success.—Jones.

Censoriousness.

He who blames others the most, is usually the most to be blamed. A quick eye to detect the faults of another, has usually a blind side to its own. A sharp tongue is moved by an unquiet spirit and an unquiet spirit wanteth not words and complainings. To rebuke, reprove exhort with all long suffering patience and power is one thing. To reprove sharply, and with a censorious spirit is another. To a hypocrite, has cast the beam out of his own eye, then can he see sufficiently to cast the mote out of my brother's eye."

Noble Reflections.—As in review we look back upon our past lives, we regret many a bargain we have made, many a step we have taken. Here we [illegible] fast, there too [illegible] folly, and there [illegible] travagance. In reviewing [illegible] thus see cause for repentance. [illegible] one thing that we are never [illegible] us live as long as we [illegible] a correct, virtuous life. When pressed for the night, we have no self reproaches for a good deed or a kind suggestion. When the world has no attraction for us—when its prospects and its glories are fading from our gaze, and the visions of an eternal estate are bursting upon us, it is then that we love to think upon an honest and upright life. Who with the [illegible] in view, would perform a wicked act? One hour of serious reflection will unfit us for any vicious society or unholy career. How strange is it that, amid the dying and the dead, mankind will so far forget themselves and their Creator as to serve a career of folly and crime, when the next breath of disease may sweep them to eternity!

Silence.

Love silence, even in the mind for thoughts are to that as words to the body, troublesome; in many thoughts as in many words, there is sin. True silence is the rest of the mind and is to the spirit what sleep is to the body nourishment and refreshment. It is a great virtue. It covers folly, keeps secrets, avoids disputes, and prevents sin—Penn.

If all who meet with injuries and disappointments were to withdraw themselves entirely from the world, every tie of society would soon be broken—all that gives charm to our existence would be at an end. Even if we cannot forgive those who have wronged us, is it liberal, is it just, to extend our resentment to all the world for the offences of a few individuals?

Contradiction should awaken our attention and care, but set our passion; we must be of no side or interest, but that of truth.

An itinerant preacher, who rambled in his sermons when requested to stick to his text, replied, "that scattering shot would hit the most birds.

AN ADALNTURE IN THE PYRENES

A large stream of sunshine chased away the mists, and showed us far distant on the right a green mountain, and a portion of sky more brilliant even than the fairest sapphire. "Adelante—en avant," we both exclaimed, and on we went with renewed spirits. The mountain we had seen was at a very considerable distance, but we calculated upon finding some shepherd's hut under which we might pass the night, should we fail in reaching Bujarelo. There was a kind of gap in the mass of rocks below in the same direction, to which my companion thought we had better descend. I differed upon this point, and gave it as my opinion that the proper route lay in front over the ridges of snow.

I yielded, however, and we forthwith began a descent more difficult than any we had hitherto encountered; for although the gap was not more than two hundred feet distant from us, the path to it occupied no less than half an hour; after which we again ascended, and reached a hollow scored by tracts of sheep, and running down toward the desired green mountain, which to our snow blinded eyes appeared an Eden. We therefore went on in the full confidence that all our perils were over. Judge, then, of our disappointment on finding, after an hour's walking, that our route ended in a continuous chain of hideous precipices, at the base of which flowed a deep and impassable river.

What was now to be done? We gazed silently at each other, and cast our eyes below at the torrent, which dashed more wildly along as its bed grew steeper, until it fell through a rocky cleft breaking in a series of cascades, and was finally lost in the abyss. It was evident that we were fairly in for a night among the crags and precipices, unless we could make our way below; wolves too were numerous in the mountains, the cold was intense, and our clothes were of the very lightest material. These were very potent reasons for deciding that descent however perilous, must be attempted, and we accordingly looked about for the way by which it might possibly be accomplished. There was a cleft on the left, towards which we observed a sheeptrack, and we made straightway for it; nothing however, was gained by this—the same hideous slopes ran down toward the valley, which now became far below, and we heard the busy murmur of its torrent, which looked like a silver thread in the distance.

We passed along the side of this dreadful ridge, regarding with longing eyes the soft green mountain opposite, from which arose the tinkling of cattle bells, although the animals themselves were not distinguishable: but the night was coming on rapidly, so it behoved us to be prompt and decisive; we therefore determined at once to lower ourselves down the slope until it might terminate in a precipice, when we trusted some way would present itself of attaining the valley—Down on we went with our hands and feet, my companion first, and I close up on his head steadying ourselves by turfs of wiry grass, and perching upon small projections in the rock—lazzy work. I can assure you, requiring no little nerve and caution; the difficult points of rest had to be felt, and their firmness ascertained, before we ventured to trust our weight upon them—a slip would have been inevitable destruction.

The thought occurred to me, and I afterwards learned that I had shared it in common with my companion, that if one had gone, how dreadful would have been the situation of the other; for no human aid could have been obtained for many mountain miles. Lower and lower we went, and more difficult at every step became the descent; the ledges grew smaller, the mountain side more smooth and perpendicular, the turfs of grass more rare. At length we reached so frightful a pitch of the precipice that I shouted to my companion to return, for it was madness to attempt any further. He, however, went two or three steps lower, and then called out to me for assistance, exclaiming that he could neither go onwards nor get back, nor could he hold on many minutes! Here was an awful predicament!—it was utterly impossible for me to render him the slightest aid; a precipice of several hundred feet was below, and then a mass of sloping granite rocks, highly inclined, ran down to the torrent upon which, unless he could recover his step, he must be hurled.

Providence, however, ordained it otherwise; he regained the presence of mind he had for a moment lost, and by a desperate effort. We now determined to ascend, although that was no easy matter, and to find, if possible, some rocks that might afford us shelter for the night. It was, however, most inviskous to give up our enterprise after having achieved so much, and as we had not ascended upward more than a few yards, when I espied a place that seemed to promise a more practicable descent, so we determined once more to attempt it. O—— as before, went first, and I followed close behind. There was only one part that seemed utterly impassable; but this my companion achieved by turning round in an every adroit manner, changing hands and giving himself an indescribable twist—most perilous, it must be confessed.

Upon my reaching it I felt I could not succeed, while it was equally impossible for my companion; I therefore determined at all events to attempt it, and after resting a few moments to collect all my energies, I succeeded in the manœuvre, and we were in a few moments some way below. We had now passed the worst, and was soon by the side of a stream which had been in our neighborhood all the way tumbling down the rock in a continuous fall; into its black and slippery bed we slided, regardless of the water that fell upon us, and were shortly on the debris congratulating each other upon our escape.—The Liberia Advocate

Inauguration of President Taylor.

SCENES ON THE AVENUE.

The Avalanche of the People.

THE PROCESSION.

INAUGURAL ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT TAYLOR.

FIRST DISPACH.

WASHINGTON March 5—10 1-2 A. M.

Our city this morning presents a sight never witnessed before at any previous inauguration, and the enthusiasm prevailing with the immense multitude is beyond all bounds. In the language of McMahon—"Every mountain has sent us rill, every valley has poured forth us stream, and lo! the avalanche of the people is here!"

The avenue present almost a living mass of people, and the mounted marshals, gaily dressed in sashes and badge, are moving towards the quarters of the President elect, whilst our military companies, with the companies from Baltimore, and the various associations, with their banners, badges and music, are following in the same direction. It is with difficulty that one can get within a square of Willard's Hotel, where the General and his suite are still stopping, as not only the pavements but the carriage ways are blocked up with the enthusiastic masses.

A great number of houses on the avenue are gaily dressed in white, red and blue, and the American flag is flying from every public place in the city, and also from many private dwellings.

The two trains of cars which left Baltimore this morning have all safely arrived, and the remnant of the "Old Defenders" attract much attention, and were repeatedly cheered as they passed up the avenue, a number, residing in this city, having also joined their ranks.

The military display is fine, the four companies from Baltimore, with our military and companies from the neighborhood, forming a full regiment.

SECOND DISPATCH.

WASHINGTON, March 5—11 1-4 A. M.

The line of procession is now moving, and a more beautiful sight was never before witnessed in the city. The General is seated in an open carriage, drawn by a splendid team of white horses, accompanied by Col. Seaton and Mr. Speaker Winthrop, and is greeted at every step by the most vehement outbursts of enthusiasm.

The windows on the whole line of march are crowded with ladies, who are waving their handkerchief and exhibiting every demonstration of respects and esteem for glorious old Zach.

The General looks well—his countenance beams with pride and gratification at the honors which his countrymen have heaped upon him.

THIRD DISPATCH.

WASHINGTON, March 5—11 1-4 A. M.

The head of the procession has reached the Capitol, and the President elect has just passed in to the Senate Chamber. The rush to obtain access to the Eastern yard of the Capitol, within sight and hearing of the stage erected on the Eastern portion, has overcome all the arrangements of the Marshal, and the pouring in from every accessible quarter.

The crowd assembled around the staging is much larger than was present at the inauguration of Gen. Harrison, and the enthusiasm of the multitude exceeds all anticipation.

The Senate is organized, and the Vice President has taken the oath of office, and the Senators, members of the House, and various official bodies, accompanied by the President and Vice-President, will in a few minutes take up their line of march for the scene of the Inauguration.

FOURTH DISPATCH.

WASHINGTON, March 5—12 1-2 M.

General Taylor, at 12 o'clock, made his appearance on the staging, surrounded by his Cabinet elect, and the Senators and Members of the House, as well as the representatives of Foreign Governments, attired in their Court dresses.

On the sight of the President a shout arose from the people assembled in the square, such as I have never heard before. There cannot be less than fifty thousand persons present.

As soon as order was obtained, General Taylor stepped forth at the front of the platform, and in a loud, firm, and clear voice, delivered the following appropriate and eloquent address, being frequently interrupted by the enthusiastic cheers of the multitude assembled.

PRESIDENT TAYLOR'S INAUGURAL ADDRESS

WASHINGTON, Monday, March 5, 1849.

This day, at 12 o'clock, General Zachary Taylor, President elect of the United States, delivered to the Senate and Member of the House of Representatives of the United States, and thousands of American citizens in front of the Capitol, the following:

INAUGURAL ADDRESS.

Elected by the American People to the highest office known to our laws, I appear here to take the oath prescribed by the constitution, and in compliance with a time-honored custom, address those who are now assembled.

The confidence and respect shown by my countrymen in calling me to be the chief Magistrate of a Republic, holding a high rank among the nations of the earth, have inspired me with feelings of the most profound gratitude.

But when I reflect that the acceptance of the office, which their partiality has bestowed, imposes the discharge of the most arduous duties, and involves the weightiest obligations, I am conscious that the position to which I have been called to fill, though sufficient to satisfy the loftiest ambition, is surrounded by fearful responsibilities.

Happily, however, in the performance of the new duties, I shall not be without able co-operation. The legislative and judicial branches of the Government, present prominent examples of distinguished civil attainment, and matured experience; and it shall be my endeavor to call to my assistance in the Executive departments, individuals whose talents, integrity, and purity of character will furnish ample guaranties for the faithful and honorable performance of the trusts to be committed to their charge.

With such aids, and an honest purpose to do whatever is right, I hope to execute diligently, impartially and for the best interests of the country, the manifold duties devolved upon me. In the discharge of these duties my guide will be the Constitution, which I this day swear to preserve, protect and defend.

For the interpretation of that instrument, I shall look to the decisions of Judicial tribunals established by its authority, and to the practice of the Government under the earlier Presidents, who had so large a share in its formation. To the example of those illustrious patriots, I shall always defer with reverence and especially to his example, who was, by so many titles "the Father of his Country."

To command the Army and Navy of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties and to appoint ambassadors and other officers; to give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend such measures as he shall judge to be necessary, and to take care that the laws shall be faithfully executed—these are the most important functions entrusted to the President by the Constitution, and I may be expected that I shall briefly indicate the principles which will govern me in their execution.

Chosen by the body of the people, under the assurance that my administration would be devoted to the support of any particular section, or merely local interest, I this day renew those declarations I have heretofore made, and pledge myself in the fixed determination to maintain, to the extent of my ability, the Government in its original purity, and to adopt, as the basis of my public policy, those great republican doctrines which constitute the strength of our national existence.

In reference to the Army and Navy, lately employed with so much distinction, on active service, shall be taken to insure the highest condition of efficiency. And in furtherance of this object, the military and naval schools, sustained by the liberality of Congress, shall receive the special attention of the Executive.

As American freemen we cannot but sympathize in all efforts to extend the blessings of civil and political liberty, but at the same time we are warned by the admonitions of history, and voice of our own beloved Washington, to abstain from entangling alliances with foreign nations. In all disputes between conflicting governments, it is our interest no less than our duty to remain strictly neutral—while our geographical position, the genius of our institutions and our people, the advancing spirit of civilization, and above all the dictates of religion, direct us to the cultivation of peaceful and friendly relations with all other powers.

It is to be hoped that no international question can now arise, which a government, confiding in its own strength, and resolved to protect its own just rights, may not settle by wise negotiation. And it eminently becomes a government like our own, founded on the morality and intelligence of its citizens, and upheld by their affections, to exhaust every resort of honorable diplomacy before appealing to arms.

In the conduct of our foreign relations, I shall conform to those views, as I believe them essential to the best interests and the true honor of the country.

The appointing power vested in the President, imposes delicate and onerous duties. So far as it is possible to be informed, I shall make honesty, capacity and fidelity indispensible prerequisites to the official character; and the absence of either of these qualities shall be deemed sufficient cause for removal.

It shall be my study to recommend such constitutional measures to Congress as may be necessary, and proper to secure encouragement and protection to the great interests of agriculture, commerce and manufactures—to improve our rivers and harbors—to provide for the speedy extinguishment of the public debt—to enforce a strict accountability on the part of all officers of the Government, and the utmost economy in all public expenditures.

But it is for the wisdom of Congress itself, in which all legislative powers are vested by the Constitution, to regulate these and other matters of domestic policy. I shall look with confidence to the enlightened patriotism of that body to adopt such measures of conciliation as may harmonize conflicting interests, and tend to perpetuate that Union which should be the paramount object of our hopes and affections. In any action calculated to promote an object so near the heart of every one who truly loves his country, I will zealously unite with the co-ordinate branches of the Government.

In conclusion I congratulate you, my fellow citizens, upon the high state of prosperity to which the goodness of divine Providence has conducted our common country. Let us invoke a continuance of the same protecting care, which has led us from small beginnings to the eminence by prudence and moderation in our councils—by well directed attempts to assuage the bitterness which too often marks unavoidable differences of opinion—by the promotion and practice of just and liberal principles and by an enlarged patriotism which shall acknowledge no limits but those of our wide spread republic.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA LIBERIA, APRIL 27, 1849

On the 28th, ult: the troops returned from the expedition against New Cesters. The fullest success crown their labours. The natives had prepared to give them a warm reception, and animated by the presence and assistance of the Spaniards, one of whom led on the savage horde, they had calculated on an easy victory. The amount of property destroyed cannot be known, but it is supposed to be large. The Spaniard at New Cesters applied the torch to his own establishment and retired into the bush. The troops brought up two Spaniards, and Thirty or Thirty five slaves.

Both men and officers, speak in the highest terms of the politeness and kind attention of the commander, officers, and crew of the French steamer "Espon."

Departed this life on the 13th. of February last, Mr. John Lewis, aged 40 years.

Mr. Lewis was a native of Virginia, but the last nineteen years of his life he resided in Philadelphia, whence he removed to this place. He arrived here in the Liberia Packet, on the sixteenth of November last.

Mr. Lewis. during his residence in Philadelphia imbibed the spirit of the party, technically called, Abolitionists. But he was a consistent one, and therefore did not oppose African colonization, or voluntary emigration to Africa. He stood high among his class in America, and was foremost in all the plans adopted for the elevation of his race, and for securing to them the rights and privileges of men. He was without the advantages of early education, but by study, close application and perseverance, he in the face of many obstacles, acquired ability to express his ideas with clearness, distinctness and force; and when warmed by an interesting subject, would sometimes rise to eloquence. Immediately on the declaration of the Independence of the Republic of Liberia, every lingering doubt of the success, and ultimate objects of the colony vanished from his mind, and he resolved at once to cast in his lot with his brethren, and seek in Liberia the boon which his native land denied him. He arrived here with all the ardent feelings of a man, who has at length, after years of anxious search and expectation attained the summit of his wishes, and he yielded to the bouyance of his feelings. Liberia presented an appropriate field for him. Here, objects of his aspiration, between him and which in America, insuperable barrier interposed, offered themselves to his efforts. He was of an active mind, and ever suggesting improvements in existing institutions, or proposing the adoption of some which had been neglected before. But he was no theorist in the common acceptation of the term. His proposed schemes were not only plausible but practicable, and commended themselves to the common sense of those who considered them. Mr. Lewis fell a martyr to his ardent feelings, which led him into exposures and imprudent exertions too severe for an unacclimated constitution. We know of no man of so short a residence in the place, who has formed so large a circle of acquaintance, nor one whose death was more sincerely and generally lamently. Great expectations had been formed of his future usefulness, and the opinion was general that he would become not only an ornament, but a pillar of the colony. Mr. Lewis never made a profession of religion. But such was the uprightness and morality of his life—his patience and quietness, that those who had no intimate acquaintance with him, would have supposed him a christian. He bore his illness with a cheerfullness truly astonishing, and retained his mental faculties in full exercise to almost the last moment of life.

The English have been paying off our Vey neighbours. Some four or five towns have been burned, and some Englishmen have lost their lives. The blockade of the Gallenas is vigorously kept up.

Bah-Gay, the nominal chief of Bassa, has paid the debt of nature. His Majesty died a few weeks since, of the disease with which he has been long afflicted. He was one of the two surviving chiefs that belonged to the Confederacy against the colony in 1822. So anxious was he to share in the plunder which it was supposed the fallen colony would afford, that in opposition to the orders of his master, King Bassa, a tried friend of the Americans, he started secretly at the head of sixty armed men and united in the attack on the settlement on the 2nd December, 1822.

His Majesty was a mysterious man, and for that reason was not to be relied on. We do not say he was "faithless;" for that would be an avowal of a comprehension of his character. He was not to be relied on simply because he could not be understood. He was never known to comply with an agreement—but by a wonderful felicity was always ready to justify his failure, by allegation of ignorance or misunderstanding on the one side or the other.

The Baptist Church at New Georgia is making affort to furnish the meeting house with a bell. They are making collections among themselves, and we have no doubt, will do all in their power, but they will not be able to raise, without the aid of others, a sufficient amount to pay for a suitable bell. Who will help? The church is composed almost wholly of native Africans, and on that account has great claim upon public charity. Donations or subscriptions will be received for the purpose, at this office, and by Deacon Walburg at New Georgia.

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Liberia Herald.,

Messrs Editors:—Sirs, it is as clear as day that Liberia's declining fortunes are re-revived. A brief synopsis of the opperations of the extra session of the legislature. The members of both Houses assembled in the Senate Chamber, in which an elaborate message, containing much of the interchange, manner and matter, accruing to Liberia's recognition, and the establishment of a treaty of perpetual amity and commerce, was read.

The affable grace shown to Africa's free-soil Functionary, by the Crown Nobles and gentry of the Old Anglo-Saxon Relm, was imitated by similar orders, and their representatives of other governments. With sentimental gratitude, he reiterated the kind offices received at their hands. Some noble Lords he particularized and named. Throughout his tour, however, the dignity and courtesy of attention, was not unbecoming his office.—The message intimated the necessity of borrowing a few more thousand dollars from our own citizens, to give potency to the government, and character to the bills now in circulation, until the judicious measures existing, shall have matured. Which can scracely fail to put into the fiscal treasury from 30 to 50 000 dollars per annum.

Therefore let every merchant lend a helping hand and willing heart to the policy.—The message informed the Senate of the purchase in England of a cargo of monopoly goods, hourly expected. On which goods the President paid £250 or $1200 out of his private pocket:—the re-payment of which sum the legislature voted &c. &c. &c. The Senate ratified the liberal treaty with England, and, in part, the codnitions with the U. S. C. Society. But the other treaties hourly anticipated, have not come to hand.—The Senate after a week's session, adjourned sinedie, to head an expedition against a slaving factoin at New Cess. Our army, after 24 days has returned victorious with the more iniquitous hostages (for the principal timely escaped), and trophies taken but destroyed with one exception. In the path of our brave army our borders were extricated from such harpies and dissentors to obey the mandates of our laws.

The French Steamer Espardon, Capt. Villems, rendered eminent good to our army, every opportunity during the campaign.

Our officers and citizens, with as conspicuously eminent gratitude, in their immortal spirits to him officers sustained the expense of a sumptuous dinner taken on the 31st: of March, at the President's new private mansion, as the most happy requital at present in our power.

Yours Respectfully,
E. J. ROYE

The following is an extract of a letter from one of the most respectable Mercantile houses in New York, to gentleman in Monrovia dated 15th, February, 1849.

We have been glad to see the kind manner in which your President was received in Europe, but hope you will not let those flattering attentions weaken your sympathies with this country. The colonzation cause here is looking up, and I think many of your people of the very first class will go out as permanent settlers.

OBITUARY.

In writing the following notice, the undersigned was prompted alike by the stern feelings of respect for the deceased, and by the suggestion of Rev. Mr. Wilson, and it was inserted in the Luminary as the more proper vehicle for its publication. Owing to some circumstance—probably to the illegibility of the copy it appears there, with so many errors, that it has been thought best to insert it here in a corrected form.

H. TEAGE.

Mr. Editor;—We have been recently, frequently and forcibly reminded of the solemn truth that in the "midst of life we are in death." The awful messenger has read his lesson in tones, calculated to startle the dullest ear and thrill the most unsensate heart. Scarcely has the sound of the bell proclaiming the departure of one pilgrim, died upon the ear, when its solemn voice was again heard announcing the departure of another. Happy indeed is he, who in the sound of the solemn knell hears the admonition of the Son of Man "What I say unto one I say unto all—watch! Thrice happy he, who not only hears, but is also incited to stand, with "his lamp trimmed and his loins girt about," ready to "meet the bridegroom at his coming."

These thoughts have been suggested by the fearfully rapid strokes which death has been recently commissioned to deal out in our midst. For a moment the archer seemed to suspend his work, and we, were fondly hugging our remaining friends to our bosoms, when suddenly an arrow flew, and Johnson fell!

Rev. Elijah Johnson departed this life, at White Plains—a station of the M. E. Mission on Friday 23rd March.

In announcing the death of Mr. Johnson, and referring to his manner of life, I am at a loss how to express adequately in the brief space to which I must confine myself, either his intrinsic worth as a Christian-citizen or the high sense entertained of him, by one, and all of this community.

Mr. Johnson was one of the pioneers in the enterprize of American-African Colonization. He came out in 1820 in the ship Elizabeth—the May-Flower of Liberia, and was among the ill-fated ones who were thrown out upon the deadly swamps of Sherbro. It was in the order of divine Providence that he should survive and enjoy commparatively good health, to animate by his habitually lively disposition and irrepressible activity, the languid few, who were spared from the pestilential influence of the place. And perhaps it was to his sagacity and constancy more than to any thing else, or to any other man, that a vestige of the colony remained. when in 1821 the Nautilus arrived at Sierra Leone.

Mr. Johnson removed to this place in 1822 with the shattered remains of the two expeditions. The agents of the society in charge of affairs were not long in discovering his worth, and he was soon appointed to offices of responsibility in the colony. He was almost wholly destitute of education; but he possessed good natural abilities; to which, by careful observation and close attention, he added more than an ordinary acquaintance with human character. In illustration of this I will mention an incident which occurred a few days before the battle of the 11th of November. A Palaver was held on Cary's Island between the chiefs of the country, and the colony—Messrs J. Ashmun, F. James and E. Johnson acting in behalf of the colony. The chiefs were un-appeasable by any talk or professions of amity and friendship. Anxious to prevent an open rupture, for which the settlement at that time was very poor ly prepared, Messrs Ashmun and James proposed to buy a peace—to win back the lost friendship of the natives with a Bonus of some two or three hundred bars. The perfidious chiefs accepted the proposal, and professed, when they had received the amount, to be perfectly satisfied. Mr. Johnson wholly dissented from his colleagues, and could not be prevailed upon to give his assent, constantly affirming the amount would be thrown away, as they would assuredly have to fight. The amount however was paid, and a few days after intelligence was received, that the combined forces of the country were rapidly advancing upon the settlement. Mr. Johnson had paid attention to the natives' character, and his intercourse with them in the ordinary transactions of life, had taught him, that no reliance can be placed on any offering made to their friendship, if an opportunity to increase their acquisitions by violence, combines with a chance to escape with impunity—a fact, which however some may be be slow to learn, has been made painfully known to many.

His services in the conflicts in which the colony has been engaged with the natives, —in most of which he bore a conspicuous part—were invaluable. His bosom was the seat of a spirit that never quailed. The energies of his mind rose with the exigencies of the occasion: and the furious shock of conflicting hosts, like the collision of flint with steel only struck out the fire which had lain concealed within. That he was skillful in planning attack or defense I will not undertake to say, but all will admit, that when the enemy presented himself, Johnson met him—and met him with sure discomfiture.

Mr. Johnson was at one time entrusted with the administration of the affairs of the colony during the temporary absence of the society's agent. His conduct in that affair evinced his fidelity as an agent, and his firmness and impartiality as a presiding officer. He was also at different times charged with commissions, to treat with the chiefs of the country on both general and special subjects. In every instance, he so discharged his trust as not only to prove his qualification for the business, but also, to evince his firm attachment to the best interests of the colony; while at the same time he impressed the natives with a deep sense of his impartiality and justice. There has never been in the colony, a man, who exerted a more extensive influence over the native mind than he: there has never been one of whom the natives stood more in awe. They regarded him with a superstitious dread. In peace, his word was law—In war, his name was a tower of strength.

One grand peculiarity in the character of Mr. Johnson was this—he was always on the side of the government. Not that he was blind to errors, or to peccancies in men or measures; but he deemed that the government had never been so distinctly marked by either, as to demand that he should put himself in hostile array against it. The colony was his nursling; and he preferred to trust to the modifying hand of time before a resort to violent correctives. In this particular at least, he has left an example which many would do well to ponder.

To give an adequate idea of Mr. Johnsons's character—of his disinterestedness —of his benevolence—leading him at times in the fullness of his heart into extravagant bestowments—of his patriotism—of his unyielding regard for order and subordination—of his profound respect for law, and of his ardent attachment to the best interests of the colony, would require, that its whole history from its first settlement to the present time should be written, and that the exigencies, which arose, and the conduct they called forth, be also minutely put down.

Having already extended my remarks beyond the bounds within which I at first limited myself, I must close my paper by a brief reference to Mr. Johnson's character as a Christian.

However much he was esteemd as a good neighbor, a faithful frend, and a patriotic public-spirited citizen it was as a Christian, and a Christian minister that he shone most conspicuously. Let not the pedantic and the idolators of worldly wisdom, smile at the application of the word shine, to one confessedly destitute of literary acquirements and high mental culture. Manly sense, shining parts, and brilliant wit, serve well as hand-maids to religion—they may set it off to advantage, just as a gilded cornice imparts an additional beauty to an elegant apartment: or the tasteful carving on the capital, adorn the well proportioned column; while they afford neither strength nor durability. Religion can subsist, and subsist in all its purity, and its beautiful simplicity, and its sustaining influence; can animate to a holy and useful life—sustain in death, and introduce into all the joys of heaven without them; while separated from religion, the sparkling corruscations of the proudest intellect, and the widest excursions of genius, like the transient meteor, flame for a moment, and are extinguished forever. The portals of the temple of science had never opened to admit Mr. Johnson; but into the inner temple of his own heart he had been introduced by the spirit of God. There he made discoveries altogether above the reach of science—discoveries which induced him to "flee for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before him." This hope he soon found, and found it to be an "anchor sure and steadfast," and possessing it he "rejoiced with joy unspeakable and full of glory."

Mr. Johnson attached himself to the M. E. Church, and in the fullness of a grateful and benevolent heart, soon asked, and obtained permission from the Church to recommend to others, that Saviour whom he had found so precious to his own soul. From that time until his death he remained a consistent member, and an active, indefatigable minister of the church with which he first united. To Mr. Johnson the Methodist Church in Liberia owes more than to any other man: not indeed that he has done more than other men during the time they have been in the field. But he was with the church in her destitution, in the infancy of the colony, when there were but few to help. His time, his talent, his money, his bodily-strength were all freely and cheerfully given to the church. Indeed it may be truly said that he was, under God, the father of Methodism in Liberia.

Although ardently attached to his church, and ready to defend her on all proper occasions, he was of an enlarged and liberal spirit. He delighted to associate with those who love God of what ever denomination they might be, and he sought opportunities to do so. In short in all the relations of life, as a father, a husbad, a friend, a citizen and a christian, his conduct bore testimony to his profession.

Mr. Johnson has left a wife & eight children to mourn his loss. Five of these, together with their mother were wholly dependent upon his daily exertions for their support. Recently his affairs have not been in a prosperous condition; but it is to be hoped that as his whole life was devoted to the good of others, the blessing of the righteous will be bestowed upon his family.

THE LAMENTED F. S. JAMES.

The information recently received from the coast of Africa, seems to confirm an impression we had received of the sterling excellence of our departed brother F S James. Though called away in early life, he lived not in vain. God permitted him the privilege of knowing that his untiring labors were successful in the promotion of those great interests to which he had consecrated his life. At a recent meeting of the Board, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

1. Resolved, That the Board have learned with sincere sorrow of the loss sustained in their African mission, by the unexpected death of Rev F. S. James, their missionary at New Virginia.

2. Resolved, That while they regard this event as deeply afflictive to them and the mission, they cannot but rejoice in the evidence given by their brother, of unaffected love to Christ, and laborious, successful devotion to his work, as a christian missionary. He rests from his labors and his works do follow him.

3. Resolved, That the Board deeply sympathize with his bereaved family, anp the churches for whose spiritual good he so diligently labored.

4. Resolved, That the treasurer of the Liberia African Mission, be hereby requested at the earliest period, to secure a suitable preacher to take charge of the station on the St. Paul's river, to be recommended to the Board for appointment.—American Paper.

Departed this life, in this town, on the 23rd, inst: Mr. W. A. Demory, after a lingering disease of several months. Mr. Demory was a member of the Baptist Church at Millsburgh. He emigrated to this country with his parents when he was very young. He embraced religion about eight years ago, and became a zealous advocate of the cross of Christ. He was employed as a school teacher at Louisianna, under the patronage of the Southern Baptist Board of Foreign Missions.

Mr. Demory survived his parents, and has left a wife, one child, two sisters, and a large circle of acquaintances to mourn his loss. His end was peace.—Com

SUMMARY

A COUNTRY preacher holding forth one sultry day in a small hall, was much annoyed by those who kept dropping in after the service had commenced, and invariably closing the door after them. He bore the vexation with Job-like patience; but, at length, being fairly exhausted by the extreme oppressiveness of the air, he vociferated to an offender:—"Friend do, for goodness, sake, let that door be opened! I believe, if I were preaching to a bottle, you would put the cork in!"

THE mind that is open for conviction, and determined to pursue truth wherever she may guide, will derive lessons, even from its own mistakes, which may prove salutary to itself and to the world. O! how grand is that character that can rise superior to selfishness and cling to the glory of immutable truth.

THE MAGIC WRITING.—Dissolve a small portion of green copperas in water, and soak it in sheets of writing paper so as to allow them to be taken out whole, and then dried; then cover the paper with very finely powdered galls, and write on it with a pen dipped in water. When dry, brush off the galls, and the writing will appear.

OLD SAYINGS.—To whom you betray your secrets, to him give your liberty. Wealth is not his who gets it, but his who enjoys it. When a man is not liked, whatever he does, is amiss. Who will not keep a penny, will never have many. We are bound to be honest, but be rich. At the gate which suspicion enters love goes not.

MACKLIN AND JOHNSON disputing on a literary subject, Johnson quoted Greek. "I don't understand Greek," said Macklin. "A man who argues should understand every language," replied Johnson. "Very well," said Macklin, and gave him a quotation from the Irish!

WOMAN.—A writer in a late Review, speaking of the Roman women, and their influence during the existence of the kingdom, says: "From the time of the Sabines to Theodora's conquest Justinian, women seem to have been at the bottom of almost all the memorable events of the Roman history. Lucretia, Virginia, Veturia, Fabia, the wife of Licinius, who became at her instigation the First Plebeian Consul, are illustrious examples of this: and whatever may be the changes of manner of opinions, as Hume has well remarked, all nations, with one accord, point, for the ideal of a virtuous woman, to the daughter of Scipio, and the mother of Gracchi." Who, then, will doubt the influence of women?

We should become intelligent, not for the sake of becoming agreeable to society, or even to our friends, but for the sake of the time we are compelled to spend with ourselves. Of all poor mortals an ingnorant man left alone is the most to be pitied.

TEHAVIOUR'S NIGHTS OF PRAYER

He sought solitude, he shrunk from observation; in fact almost the only enjoyment which he seemed ready to love, was his lonely ramble at midnight, for rest and prayer. He spent whole nights thus, we are told. And it is not surprising, that after the heated crowds and exhausting labours of the day he should love to retire to silence and seclusion, to enjoy the cool and balmy air, the refreshing stillness, and all the beauties and glories of midnight, among the solitudes of the Galilean hills; he find there happy communion with his Esther, and to gather fresh strength for the labours and trials, that yet remained.

IDEA OF THE DIVINITY.

Banish all material ideas of a Deity, and do not let your imagination struggle to find its way upward to some material heaven, with indefinite and idle conceptions of a monarch seated on a throne. The striking and beautiful metaphors of the Bible never were intended to give us this idea. God is a Spirit, to say in its most emphatick tone. Where he acts

DEATH IN HIGH STATION.

There is a peculiar solemnity and mournful grandeur inspired by death in high station, which adds depth to the moral impression made by mere grief or regret. Through such visitations of the mighty ones and rulers of the earth death speaks to all beneath them, and gives a warning which reaches alike to the humblest of subjects and the greatest of rulers and leaders.

The strange and stately verses of Shirley (which are said to have chilled the heart of Cromwell himself, by moving some mystic sympathy,) marked as they are by an obscurity which deepens their gloomy sublimity, suggest themselves here, as they do in similar circumstances.

The glories of our mortal state
Are shadows, not substantial things:
There is no armor against fate;
Death lays his icy hand on kings.
Sceptre and crown
Must tumble down,
And in the dust be equal made,
With the poor crooked scythe and spade.

Some men wtih swords may reap the field,
And plant fresh laurels where they kill;
But their strong nerves at last must yield,
They tame but one another still.
Early or late,
They stoop to fate,
And must give up their conquering breath,

The garlands wither on your brow;
Then boast no more your mighty deeds;
Upon death's purple altar now
See where the victor-victim bleeds!
All heads must come
To the cold tomb.
ONLY THE ACTIONS OF THE JUST SMELL SWEET AND BLOSSOM IN THE DUST.

DO SOMETHING.

Up, up and be doing!
Let us work while we may;
For ill is pursuing
The idle always.

Labor is noble—
God sanctioned its toil,
Be it black at the anvil,
Or brown at the soil,

Scorn not your station,
Be it higher or lower;
Each honest vocation
Has glory in store.

Ply at some calling,
No matter what,
If needful and lawful
'Twill sweeten your lot.—I bid.

EDITORIAL DECISION.

Transmitting, signed himself X. Q.;
The editor his letter read,
And begged he might be X. Q. Z."

MISCELLANEOUS.

From the Knox County (Ills.) Inteligencer.

Celebration of the 24th of august, being the anniversaey of the independence of the republic of liberia.

A large concourse, consisting of members from eleven different colonization societies, and others friendly to the object in view, met in Lewisville, Knox county, Ills., according to arrangements previously made, to rejoice together in view of the advancement of the colonization cause and particularly to celebrate the birth day of the Liberian Republic.

About 11 o'clock, A. M. Major U. D Coy, Marshall of the day, assisted by Col. R. S. Brown, and Captain Dennis Clark, formed the multitude into line near the liberty pole, on which our own national flag was floating in the gentle breeze—at an elevation of 80 feet on the same pole, about 30 feet below ours, the flag of Liberia in graceful waves, presented the six red and white stripes and lone star—the emblems of that young and prosperous nation's glory. The procession was formed in double file, in the folowing order—

1st. Officers and orator of the day, preceded by the colors and brass band.
2d. Old men and their wives.
3d. Younger men and their wives.
4th. Young gentlemen and young ladies.
5th. All other ladies.
6th Little girls.
7th. All other gentlemen.
8th. Little boys.

The procession marched over that beautiful green on the east side of the village, and back to a large arbor which had been prepared in front of the Methodist Episcopal church.

Rev. Cyrus Haynes, of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, President of the day, called the assembly to order.—Rev. Cyrus Spurlock, of the M. E. C. chaplain of the day, offered an apppropriate prayer.

The declaration of independence, and the constitution of the Republic of Liberia, was then read in a clear and distinct voice by Eusebius Morse, Esq.

The procession was again formed according to the former order, and was conducted by the Marshal to another arbor, under which was a table bountifully and gratuitously supplied with the fat things of the prairies; and after about 700 person had partaken of the provisions, and only consumed about half that had been provided—

The audience again repaired to the arbor at the church, where, being called to order, a large portion of the assembly listened attentively to an excellent and impressive address by Samuel W. Brown, Esq. After which, the following regular toasts were read, interspersed with cheers and music. Of the latter, it is sufficient to say that it was performed by the Galesburg Brass Band:

Reuglar Toasts. 1. May our nation's flag wave over our free institutions, until the monarchies of the world throw off oppression—adopt republicanism.

2. Our country—remarkable for progress in physical, poitical and moral science, and for vigorous efforts in benevolence and Christian enterprise—among the latter the colonization scheme being conspicuous.

3. Liberia—may she be made glorious in being instrumental in accomplishing the prophetic promise, "Ethiopia shall stretch forth her hand unto God.

4. May the Colonization scheme prosper in these United States, until slavery be buried in adamant, never to have a resurrection.

5. "Let us lay aside every weight," and the sin of prejudice which doth so easily beset us, and run with patience the race set before us,' of redeeming benighted Africa from her degradation, and misery, to a place among the Christian nations of the earth.

6. The Colony of Liberia—may she be a grand missionary depot to spread the Gospel to Africa's remotest bounds.

7. May the flag of Liberia wave more and more—may it drive the slave-trade from Africa's shore, and may republics spread from sea to sea, till like our own and Liberia, all nations are free.

Volunteer Toasts —By E. Moore,—May the white and black ladies of these United States, separate amicably, and continue as far apart as the U. States and Liberia.

By Wm. Stewart.—May oppression recede and republican principles advance until every nation and man shall be free from all chains, except those thrown around them by the fair.

By A. Thomas –The Colonization enterprise deserves the prayers of Christians —the smiles of the fair, and the dimes of the "hard-fisted."

On motion.

Abel Thomas, R. Smith Patterson, and Alexander Latimer, Esqrs., were appointed a committee to prepare a notice of the proceedings of the day, and to request a copy of the address for publication.

The meeting was then regularly dismissed—the benediction being pronounced by the chaplain.

The committee feel constrained to add to this narrative of the celebration, that they feel satisfied that the effects of the meetieg has been good—

1st. In invigorating and encouraging the members and friends of the colonization Societies who particpated on the occasion.

2d. In securing the friendship and cooperation of many who had been indifferent and had been enemies to the cause.

R. SMITH PATTERSON,
ABEL THOMAS,
ALEXANDER LATIMER, } Committee

The following address was delivered on the occasion above mentioned, by Samuel W. Brown, Esqr. We insert it because particularly requested to do so, and because several extra copies are called for—

ADDRESS

Ladies and Gentleman:

Thirty-two years ago, the American Colonization Society was formed, for the colonization of the free people of color of the United States, on the Western coast of Africa, the land of their progenitors. Only a few persons were concerned in its formation, and its progress was for a time of necessity slow. But that noble few were upheld in the position which they had taken, by the strong arm of faith and hope and at the expiration of six long years they received the glad tidings that the first emigrants sent out under the care of the society were safely landed upon Cape Messurado. And though that little company of emigrants has grown slowly, history tells not of a colony commenced under circumstances apparently so unpropitious, that ever made such rapid advancement in numbers, and every thing calculated to elevate, dignify, and happify, human nature.

Liberia has received about 6000 emigrants, principally emancipated slaves from the United States; and her whole population, includiug natives and emigrants, according to the delaration of Gov. Roberts, in his inaugural address of Jan. 3, 1848, is more than 80,000.—Those natives have voluntarily placed themselves under the protection of the Liberian goverment, and by its enlightening influence, have been induced to abandon all participation in the unnatusal and unholy traffic, the slave trade. They have already learned so much of human duty, and begin to appreciate so much the true relationship of man to his fellow man, that they are no longer willing to hunt as they would a wild beast their brother, and trade him as they would a tusk of ivory, to some heartless dealer in flesh and blood, for transportation to some foreign clime.

Besides, those natives who have been admitted into and are enjoying the direct portection of the Liberian government, there are, it is said, 100,000, who are beginning to see, through the midnight gloom that surrounds them, that light which was enkindled on Cape Messurado in 1822, whose point of radiation is Liberia, whose source is the wisdow of her people, and whose growing brightness, and more widely diverging rays, may God in the dispensation of his providence grant, to penetrate the darkest recess of African degradation, and cut in sunder the iron chain of ignorance, by which the sons and daughters of Africa have so long been bound to earth. You may call the expression of such a hope enthusiasm; but would he not have been called an enthusiast, who would have predicted, that from the faint light which was struck on Plymouth rock, at the landing of the Pilgrims, would burst forth a blaze which should so soon traverse a continent; whose progressive might the Rocky Mountains, with all their barrenness and terrifying wildness could not overcome, but penetrating the valleys and far off coasts of Oregon, its reflected glare from the towns and habitations of the descendants of the Pilgrims now lights up as with a smile, the once dark and lonely waters of the Pacific.

The people of Liberia have established a republican government. They elect their governor and legislature, as the people of the American States do theirs, and for the last six or eight years, the duties of officers which we have named have been acceptably discharged by colored men. They own 300 miles of coast, and territory enough, perhaps, for the accommodation of more than six times the number of black in the United State, including bond and free. They have 25 or 30 common schools, and their permanency is ensured by a law, rendering all property taxable for their support.—They have not only common schools, but they have two high schools, a lyceum, and two newspapers. They have ships of their own building, and under their own management. They have a climate and soil which ensure them two crops in one year, and the cost of living is not very great. They have 23 churches and 30 preachers, and one third, it is said, of the whole population are communicants; and more that all this, they have freedom.

In January, 1846, about 30 years from the time of its formation, the American Colonization Society, by the mutual consent of both parties dissolved its political connection with the people of Liberia. Since which they have organized a government, under the name of the 'Republic of Liberia,' and declared their national independence. And it is the independence Of that people, whose history we have so briefly noticed, that we have to-day met to celebrate. But why, it is asked, should we celebtate the independence oi Liberia?

First, a celebration is a commendation of the thing celebrated, or an expression of our gladness or rejoicing, with regard to some particular thing or event. Now we are republicans: we believe that republicanism is the best form of government ever adopted by men, and the only one which is well designed to secure their happiness. Should we not rejoice then that a new republic has sprung into existence?

Secondly, we should rejoice, because the citizens of Liberia or that portion of them under whose influence Liberia, has become what it is, went out from us, and have exchanged a land of the free black man is a land of oppression, for one of liberty.

Thirdly, we should rejoice, because the Republic of Liberia ir infinitely superior to, and unlike every other republice on earth, except our own, is based upon a constitution not only similar to, but which is in almost important features modeled after our own.

Fourthly, we should rejoice that Liberia is where it is. If it were in a region of knowledge, with regard to knowledge it might be of no great advantage to any but its own citizens. But situated in Africa, that land of moral and intellectual night, a portion of whose inhabitants are the most degraded children of earth, it may in the providence of God, have a mission of incalculable importance to accomplish, and the hope that it has such a mission, is strongly warranted by the fact that the native African, partially redeemed at least from his pollution, is alredy seen bowing with the enlightened emigrant, at the foot of the cross.

The people of Liberia ask the sympathy of nations. They ask our sympathy and who that has a republican heart, and is acquainted with the history of that infant nation, and the circumstances which led to its commencement, would withhold that sympathy? The people of Liberia occupy a position that peculiarly entitles them to the sympathy of their fellow men.

Government has often been the result of convulsion and revolution. States have often been built upon the ruins of others; but Liberia presents a different spectacle. She is not the child of convulsion, nor of revolution. In her own growth and organization she has interfered with the rights and privilage of none. Her people and their ancestors have never oppressed, but have ever been the victims of oppression. They have been ruthlessly torn from the land of their nativity, and carried into every port on earth, where market for human beings could be found; and now an effort is making for their return from this country, in which is found between 2 and 3 millions of that oppressed people, to their own, to their own, we say, for this is no more the country of that people than was Egypt the country of the Israelited.—The effort, like the work itself, interferes with rights and privileges of none. The end which it seeks to accomplish is good and just, and consequently means of a different character are not found necessary for its promotion.—Not the rattling drum, nor the cannon's most dreadful roar, but the still small voice of conscience, which is more effecttual, is at work, in the slave-holding States, and a correct conception of the interests of the people of the U. S., both bond and free, will, we would venture to predict, ere long oppereat upon the public, as a stonger argument for colonization than has ever yet been brought to bear upon the human mind.

MR. ADAMS was once asked what he most lamented in this life. He answered—"My impulsive temper and vituperative manner of speech, which prevent me from returning good for evil, and induces me, in the madness of my blood, to say things that I am afterwards ashamed of."

GOOD MANNERS.

We have known a young man, slow, sullen, sour-browed and ungracious, who, whenever you speak to him, answers as if it were an effort to be even decently civil; and who, moreover, seems to be quite content, and even proud of his incivility. And we lean to the charitable side so far as to think this nothing more than a bad habit of his, which has insensibly fastened upon him; and that he goes through the world—a world of mutual dependence—little aware of the fact, that so small a thing as his manners is constantly producing impressions, and fast forming a reputation, such as ten years hence he may regret as the great blunder of his life.

Would it not be well for every young man to learn the truthful anecdote of the rich Quaker banker, when asked the secret of his success in life, answered, "Civility, friend—civility!" How much does it cost a man, either old or young, to be truly civil in the interconrse of society? Rather, how much does it cost a young man to form the habit, which, if formed, will sit upon him easily, gracefully, and profitably, so long as he lives? For more often depends on this little, often despised civility to the world, than any other single adventitious circumstance by which men rise and fall. We may look around us, at any time, and see men high in place and power, who have not attained that elevation by force of individual character or great knowledge, but simply from the fact that the trifling graces of life have not been despised. It is not a dancing master's grace that is now referred to, but the benevolence of manner that recognizes in little things the rights of others, and duly acknowledges such rights. The thousand ways in which the little courtesy does good, need hardly be mentioned. It may be said, however, that a courteous manner has a reflective influence on the benevolent feelings. It is a source of gratification to the man who practices it. It sits naturally upon a man, it is a passport to any place and any circle. It has smoothed many a rough path for men first starting in business, and has been one of the things that has often crowned efforts with success. The man of experience, looking on an ungracious manner in a young person just starting into the world with nothing he can depend on but himself, is not angered, but rather pained, by what he sees, knowing, as he does, that the want of that little something to please as we go along, will cause many a rough jog in the road, which, otherwise, might be as smooth as a summer stream. Wear a hinge in your neck, young man, and keep it well oiled.

CULTIVATION OF THE MIND.

Cultivate the power to fix the mind on any subject you please.

Fix in the mind the elementary principles of all that pertains to life; such as the principles of science, of politics, of government, laws, and religion.

Obtain the power of using language, and defining what you mean by such terms as are in common use when we speak or think.

Fill the mind with the materials of thought; such as the facts which we read, observe and hear.

Teach the mind where to go for information; that is, from what source to draw.

Teach the mind how to take up a subject, investigate it, and draw conclusions on which you may rely.

Cultivate the judgment as to what facts are worth preserving, and what are applicable in proving or illustrating a particular subject.

Cultivate the memory, so that the materials which you gather may not be dissipated and lost, as fast as gathered.

You will think, perhaps, that I have laid out the work of a life here, and so I have intended to do but if you will read these objects over again, I believe you will say that no one of these can be omitted in cultivating the mind in a proper manner. You will not, of course, have all these objects specially before the mind whenever you exercise it; but they are to be the points to which you are bring the mind in all its wanderings, and in a cultivated mind these several points wil unconsciously receive attention.

Perhaps this is not the place, but it cannot be greatly out of place, to say that, in my estimation, all this only looks to a far higher and nobler object—which is, to prepare that mind to be the receptacle of light and knowledge, the image of God and the unseen glories of an eternal state. In all my contemplations of the mind, I look upon it as an immortal existence, and that it is for that state of immortality, it is now to be disciplined and prepared.

Education does not mean going to school in your boyhood, or going to college in your youth; but it means the power to take your mind and make it an instrument of conveying knowledge and good impressions upon other minds, as well as being itself made happy. To cultivate the mind, then does not mean to read much or little, to converse and to discipline it in all ways in your power

You must not have narrow views on this subject, or else I lose all my labour. I do not expect that every one will discipline his mind so that he can observe and think as well as Franklin; but what then? Is this a reason why you should not do what you can? Neither could Franklin reason like Sir Isaac Newton, and bring the Universe at his feet.—What then? Was this a reason why he should not do all that he could?—[Todd's Hints.

FAMILY AND SOCIAL READING.

The ben-fits of social reading are manifold. Pleasures shared with others are increased by the partnership. A book is ten-fold a book when read in the company of beloved friends by the ruddy fire, on the wintry evening, and when our intellectual pleasures are bathed in domestic affection. An elegant writer, commending the practice of reading aloud, says:

Among a thousand means of making home attractive—a main point in ethics—this stands high What is more pleasing? what more rational? what more tributary to the fund of daily talk? what more exclusive of scandal and chatter? He would be a benefactor, indeed, who should devise a plan for redeeming our evenings, and rallying the young men who scatter to clubs and taverns and brawling assemblies. Such a reformer and inventor would deserve a garland of heart's ease, from the slighted woman. Families which are in a state of mutual repulsion have no evening together over books or music. The master is at his bar-room The boys are at some public room or place of amusement. The girls are abroad in full dress. The mother sits at home in spectacles —And the several parties straggle in, wearily and sometimes surley at such hours as suit their whim, and then only because nature demands sleep. It is well even this, at length is not sought from home.

There is a higher reason still, in favor of the practice here recommonded.—Written language is the vehicle of a vast body of truth relating to our spiritual and immortal part; truth which is never without a social reference. No where is the volume of holy wisdom more appropriate, than when read aloud in the household assembly; no where is religion more sweetly interningled with the attachments of the heart.—Heavenly counsels are not the less impressive when conveyed by the familiar and cherished voice.

I beg leave to add, this is a pleasure for the poor man's house; and for this I love it. The poor man, if educated, is one day almost placed on a level with the prince, in respect to the best part of literary wealth Let him ponder the suggestion, and enjoy the privilege.

CHEERFULNESS.

The highest achievment of moral philanthropy is to rise above the cares and vexations, and disappointments of life; and the tendency of religion resting upon a divine basis, buoys the true Christian above the evils that surround him, and inspires him with moral fortitude and vigor to battle with every calamity, and to maintain an unruffled spirit amid the billows and conflicting currents which agitate the ocean of human existence. If the hurricane rages, instead of yieding to its fury, and giving way to despondency, he exerts every energy to ward off danger, and strives to look forward, indulging a soothing hope that the future will be less disastrous than the present. This method of encountering the evils to which every body in a greater or less degree is exposed, deprives disappointment of its sting, is an antidote to the poison of slander, and begets a spirit of cheerfulness which is essential to happiness. He is like the eagle which, when clouds overspread the earth, rises above them, to enjoy the sunshine. No matter how prosperous an individual may be in his pecuniary, domestic and social relations—if he suffer his spirit to be discomposed by trifling annoyances, he is a stranger to enjoyment, and every day of his life is embittered by some petty cause of vexation which his own morbid disposition magnifies into a serious calamity. On the other hand, overwhelming must be the misfortune, which can prostrate a man that has been disciplined to patient endurance, and habituated himself to uniform cheerfulness of mind

MODERN INFIDELITY

In 1624, Lord Herbert of Cherbury, published his book. "De Veritate," in Paris He first formed deism into a system, and propounded a universal religion, consisting in these articles.—I. That there is one supreme God II. That he is chiefly to be worshipped III That piety and virtue is the principal part of his worship IV That we must repent of our sins, and, if we do so, God will pardon them. V That here are rewards for good men, and punishments for bad men. He declared, that this catholic or universal religion answers the ultimate purpose of the Holy Scriptures; and that it is not from his design to do harm to the best religion, as he calls christianity, or to the true faith, but rather to establish both. He then goes on to inveigh against all pretences to inspiration, without making distinctions, according to the standard of our judgment, between the false and the true. He afterwards proceeds to censure in our day, to ridicule the doctrines, practices, miracles, and all the ordinances distinctively pertaining to christianity

The noted Hobbs of Malmesbury, affects to speak with great veneration of the Sacred Writings. Because he finds traces of nature worked in them, he professes to receive the Bible as the Word of God; and while professing the authenticity of the canonical parts of the Old Testament, and pretending to believe the books of the New Testament were written by persons of divine authority with the seals of miracles; in the year after Christ 364; treating the pretence to inspiration as a sign of vanity; he undermines the whole fabric of revelation.

The Earl of Shaftsbury 1698, introduces to the public a volume of sermons with a preface in which he finds fault with those who represent not only the institution of preaching, but even the gospel itself and our holy religion to be a fraud. In his works, he discourses beautifully of the excellence of virtue, the goodness of providence and the natural differences between the good and evil; and still assuming that "ridicule is the test of truth," he treats with contempt all the holy mysteries of our faith

Even Collins, who contracts christianity into an allegory, and teaches that the gospels as we have them, were grossly corrupted and altered in the sixth century, no where argues directly against revelation, but contents himself with sneers and insinuations fitted to excite the popular prejudice in opposition to its doctrines.

Mr. Woolston, who charges the accounts given of Christ's miracles as absurd, false and incredible, uttering the basest reflections upon the character of our blessed Saviour, yet pretends to zeal for his honor and Messiahship and assumes the attitude of a moderator between an infidel and an apostate"

Dr. Tindal says; that "christianity itself, stripped of the additions that policy, mistake and the circumstances of time have added to it, is a most holy religion;" and then brings all the force of his arguments to prove that revelation is entirely useless and needless.

Dr Morgan, author of a once famous book, called "The Moral Philosopher," expressly acknowledges the great usefulness of divine revelation in general, and of the christian revelation in particular Notwithstanding this, he discards all authority in matters of religion, and all proof from miracles and prophecy; inveighs against the law of Moses and the prophets; pretends that the apostles preached different gospels, and that the New Testament is a jumble of inconsistent religions

FRANCE

The recent events in France give interest to the followiug information which we have collected in relation in that country. The area of France is 203,736 square miles, or about five times that of the State of Ohio. The soil is good. An accurate idea may be formed of it from the description of the surface, based upon official returns made in 1837. Of the surface of France, including Corsica, 8 per cent is mountainous, 11 per cent heath land 14 per cent rich soil, 18 per cent calcareous, about 30 per cent gravelly, stony or sandy, 4 per cent clay, less than 1 per cent marsh, and the remainded various About half the surface is occupied as arable land, one tenth as pasture, one seventy by forests, and one twenty-fiftey by vineyards. Very little improvement is made in science of agriculture It is said that it was customary a few years ago in some of the southern departments to thrash corn by treading of horses, as it was done 3,000 years ago. Wines and silks are the great staple productions.

Since the revolution of 1789 a total change has been made in the laws regulating the descent of property. It was enacted, that the property of persons dying intesate, should be divided equally among all their children, were required to leave the greater part of their estate, to be equally divided among all their children. The consequence has been the distribution of the landed porperty of France among an immense number of small-proprietors. It is computed that there were in 1835 about 1 500,000 land proprietors in France. In no other country in Europe is land cut up in so many small parcels. In England there are only about 30,000 proprietors, or an proportion to the size and population to the two countries about one sixtieth as many as in France. This is the greatest distinction between the people of those two nations. The aristocracy of England is an aristocracy of wealth and power; the aristocracy that was in France a few months ago, was merely a political creature, with no other basis than a particular form of government, which has been destroyed in a moment. France has now no hereditary privileged order.

The population of France was as follows at the periods mentioned:

1801—27 349.003	1826—31,858,637
1806—29.107,425	1831—32 569,213
1821—30,46 ,895	1836—33,540,610

It may be estimated to be thirty-five millions at the present, or about 170 to the square mile. The population of Ohio is about 50 to the square mile. The number of voters in France in 1838 39 was 197,598. With such law regulating suffrage a prevail in this state, the number would be about 5,000,000, more than 25 times the actual numbers.

The leave government of France was composed of a king, a chamber of peers, and a chamber of deputies. The theory was that the crown was hereditary, the practice is just as the French people please. The peers chosen by the king their privileges were not hereditary, their number was unlimited. Hence they were completely at the control of the crown The chamber of deputies was composed of 459 members, elected for five years. The qualifications for a deputy were, that he be thirty years of age, and pay direct taxes to the amount of 500 francs a year.

The qualifications for an elector were that he be twenty-five years of age and pay 200 francs ($37.50) a year direct taxes. The great bulk of the taxes, (as in some more democratic countries) were indirect. Hence the small number of voters. More than nineteen twentieths of the pieces of landed property in the country paid less than 100 france a year of direct taxes. It was the cunning policy of the ministry to diminish direct taxation, apparently for the good of the people, but really to curtail the number of voters.

The regular army consisted in 1836, of 274,297 men, but it had been increased since that time. The National Guard correspond somewhat to our militia, except that the discipline and organization are far more thorough than in this country. This body was organized in 1790. It comprises all the male population between the ages of 20 and 60 not disqualified by natural infirmities, by their professions, or by holding certain offices under the state.—In 1832, the national guard amounted to 5,729,052 men. Its total effective force was then estimated at about 3,000,000 men.

France is divided into 83 department which are divided in 363 aroundisements, 2834 cantons; and 37.234 communes.—Each department or state is government by a perfect, assisted by a council-general of the department, which consists of a member from each canton, meets once a year and regulates a great deal of the internal administration of the department, as the distribution of taxation, &c. The sub-perfects who superintend the arrondisement and the mayors of the communes, are also aided by councils elected by the citizens.—Ohio Press.

THE ALPS.

The following beautiful passage is from a letter in the Providence Journal, written by a traveller in Switzerland:

"My first view of the Alps was at Berne, which city occurs next in the path of my narrative. I had taken a walk towards evening, to the 'Engischo Promenade,' as it is called, a mile or so from the city. Thence a fine view of the city is obtained, with its towering cathedral steeple, and the ambergris-colored Aar, winding around it, as almost to insulate it completely from the main land. I had seated myself, taken a cup of coffee, and bread and honey, was observing the people and the scenery, and occasionally casting my eyes in the direction of some huge white cumulose clouds, which seemed to have heavily upon the eastern horizon. The thought occurred to me if those clouds were but mountains, how magnificent they would be, they would be beyond all conception or all description; they would satisfy the most intense yearnings of the imagination; they would fill forever that great desire of the mind to feel, if only once an impression of the purely sublime. I listened to the music for half an hour, sauntered around under the trees, and then strayed along the promenade, a little further on, away from the crowd; but my eye still continu- from time to time, to fasten itself involuntarily in the direction of those white clouds. They were the most unchangeable clouds I had ever seen; and the impression gradually grew upon me, that there was something unnaturally hard and angular in their outline. Can these, then, be mountains? I confess this thought, as it first darted into my mind, occasioned a kind of trembling and sinking through my whole frame. Is it possible that those clouds in Heaven, so white, so etherial, so high above other clouds, that these are mountains?

Two peasants were coming along at the time, their coats and scythes under their arms. I walked up to them, and said, 'Will you tell me if those clouds there are really clouds or mountains?' They looked at me for an instant with some astonishment, either at the energy of the action, or the singularity of the question, and then, with a bow and a scrape, answerd, 'Mountains, sir, to your service.

And there they were, indeed, the Alps, the high Alps, like the imperishable white pillars of God's throne, piercing into Heaven, incrusted with a pure marble of snow, and faintly tinged with a ruby light, as if it were the smile of the Almighty. I had seen enough. I felt silent, and bowed before the greatness of the works of God."

AN ODD FELLOW.

Gen. Riley, at a late sailor temperance meeting gave an account, much to the amusement of the sailors, of a shoemaker who took into his head at a certain hour every day, to leave his bench, run down to the dock, and throw a sixpence into the dock. At first it was thought it must be some counterfeit piece which he was ready and willing to throw away. But when he was seen coming regularly every day, it began to attract attention. What could be the meaning of it? Here he would come, day by day, often with no hat on, and toss in his sixpence. The sailors would gather around him and say, you fool, what do you throw away your sixpence for? They were for diving after them, but the water was deep and muddy, and so small a piece could not be found. At the end of the year, for he kept it up steady, there lay in the dock twenty-two dollars in sixpences, doing nobody any good. The shoemaker worked hard at his trade, but threw away his sixpences. True, it did no great harm, but it was a very odd freak. 'You laugh,' said the General, "but I can tell you of a sailor that does not come off half so well as the shoemaker.—He goes to the same dock and instead of throwing his sixpence into the water, he throws it into the till of a rum-seller, and then walks away with him his glass of grog, which makes a fool of him, gets him into fights and quarrels, throws him into the Thombs, and finally strips poor Jack of everything he has."—*A. Prospective Population of the U. States.

The last number of Hunt's Merchant's Magazine contains the following startling calculation, which is yet strictly within the rational limits of probability:

"In 1840 the United States had a population of 17,068,666. Allowing its future increase to be at the rate of 33 1-2 per cent, for each succeeding period of ten years, we shall number, in 1940, 303,701,641. Past experience warrants us to expect this increase. In 1790, our number was 3,927,827. Supposion it to have increased each decade in the ratio of 13 1-3 per cent, it would in 1840 have amounted to 16,660,250, being more than a half million less than our actual number as shown by the ceasus. With 300,000,000 we should have less than 150 to the square mile for our whole territory, and but 120 to the square mile for our organized States and territores. England has 300 to the square mile. It does not, then, seem probable that our progressive increase will be materially checked within the one hundred years under consideration. At the end of that period, Canada will probably number at least 20,000,000. If we suppese the portion of our country east and west of the Appalachiac chain of mountains, known as the Atlantic slope, to possess at the time 40,000,000, or near five times its present number, there will be life 260,000,000 for the great central region between the Appalachian and the Rocky mountains, and between the Gulf of Mexico and Canada, and for the country west of the Rocky mountains. Allowing the Oregon territory 10,000,000, there will be lef 250,000,000 for that portion of the American States lying in the basing of the Mobile, Mississippi and St. Lawrence.—If to those we add 20,000,000 for Canada, we have 270,000,000 as the number that will inhabit the North American valley at the end of one hundred years, commencing in 1840. If we suppose one third or 60,000,000 of this number to reside in the country as cultivators and artizans, here will be 180,000,000 left for towns, enough to people 360, each containing half a million. This does not seem as incredible as the valley of the Nile, scracely 12 miles broad, should have once, as historians tell us, contained 20,000 cities.

THE CAPACITY OF THE WEST.

From the Alleghanies to the Rocky Mountains, from the frozen lakes of the North to the tepid waters of the Gulf of Mexico! Every soil, every climate, every variety of surface.—Of all the great products of the world, coffee is the only one which does not, or may not grow there. Take the people of Britain, Ireland, France, Holland, Germany, Italy and Spain, and place the whole in the valley beyond the Appalachians, and it would continue to ask for "more." Ohio alone, without sinking a pit below the level of her valleys, could supply coal equal to the amount dug from the mines of England and Wales for twenty-five hunderd years, and the Ohio is but a pigmy, in the way of bitumen, with Western Pennsylvania and Virginia. Iron abounds, from Tennessee to Lake Erie, and forms the mountains of Missouri and Arkansas. Salt wells up form secret storehouses in every northwestern State. Lead enough to shoot the human race extinct, is raised form the great metallic dykes of Illinois and Wisconsin. Copper and silver beckon all trusting capitalists to the shores of Lake Superior. And mark the water courses, the chain of lakes, the immense plains graded for Railroads by Nature's own hand, the reservoir of water waiting for the canals to use then. Already, the farmer far in the interior woods of Ohio or Indiana may ship his produce at his own door to reach Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore or New Orleans, and every mile of its transit shall be by canal, steamboat and rail-car.—N. A Rev.

Sweeping Invection.—A mechanic at Rumapo has invented a machine for making brooms which threatens to revolutionize the business of sweeping, and exterminate broom-corn entirely. It takes a billet of white ash, and in a trice cuts it fine like the Manilla grass as used for brushes. The brooms can be made for two cents each, and are said to work quite as well in every respect as corn brooms, and to be more enduring.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA LIBERIA, MAY 18, 1849

In our last number, we stated in a few words that success had attended the expedition against New Cesters, and that the slavers had been routed, and their factories destroyed. Not only were the establishments at that far, but ill-famed place broken up, but the factory at Trade Town was involved in the same fate. The slaver at New Cesters had raised the whole country in his defense:—had supplied the natives liberally with munitions of war, and when our men attempted to land, led on in person the natives by thousands to oppose a landing. A few bombs from the French steamer kept them at bay, and under cover of her fire our men pushed boldly ashore and formed on the beach. The Spaniard did not show himself afterwards, but the natives concealing themselves behind rocks, trees and bushes, kept up a continual and annoying fire for two days. It was very soon ascertained that they did not intend to come to an open combat; indeed such a number of men—400, and such courage displayed in rushing to the charge whenever a body of the enemy shewed themselves, was something altogether different from what they expected. As soon as the line of march was taken up for the barracoon, the slaver, who had all the time been concealed in the vicinity of our army, mounted his horse—hastened to his factory and applied a torch. When our people arrived there, nothing was seen of the house, but a heap of ashes. The wall which enclosed it was standing. It was built of mud—so thick and well dried, that it would have resisted a six pound shot. It was three feet thick; twelve feet high and beautifully white-washed—and enclosing a perfectly level and well cleaned area of about two and a half acres of land; presented a beautiful sight in the deep green wilderness, in the bosom of which it was situated. The wall was demolished: and a cow and a horse, which the hero left in his flight, were all the booty which fell to the men. No resistance was offered at Trade Town. The slaver there had heard of the fate of his compatriot below, and as the men marched up to his factory, he advanced to meet them, offering his property and suing for mercy in the humblest attitude. Property he had none. As our men advanced on one side, his friends the natives, advanced on the other: and rating their speed with the time, they had borne every thing away before the Americans arrived. And truly the Spaniard was an object of pity. The most violent were touched with commisseration. Imagine a man standing something over six feet high, with sunken eyes—hollow cheeks—blanched skin—swollen feet—the rest of the frame a skeleton—sans, hat sans, shoes, covered only with a pair of cotton drawers and a cotton shirt. This was all the natives had left him, and for these he was indebted to the rapid movement of the Americans. So far is well. But this expedition, although we were ably and honorably assisted by the French, has involved us in a heavy expense. This was not a propitious time for such an expedition. We were not prepared to encounter the outlay of money it demanded. But unwilling to decline the aid which the French government so generously offered the President, determined to proceed and trust to the liberality of the friends of humanity abroad, to enable us to sustain it.

Since writting the above, we learn another slaver has landed a cargo at New Cesters or some where in that region, for one hundren slaves. He must not, he will not be sufferea to remain there. At all hazards he must be removed.

Since the above was sent to the press, we learn that the slaver did not land any goods there.

We are already tasting the delightful consequences of war, and it is to be feared the present scarcity and high prices of provisions, especially of bread stuffs, are but a forerunner of what will be experienced, ere the season has passed over. The expedition from causes which could not be controlled, took place just at the time when we should have been burning off and preparing our lands for planting. The natives had been sometime kept in excitement awaiting the war, and neglected their farms. They are already beginning to pour in upon us, to divide, by theft or otherwise the little stock of provisions which we have. Already bacon, middling is up to 25 cents—Flour 13 to 14 dollars the barrel, and rice $2 00 to $2 50 a bushel. When all these things are taken into account, we will find that breaking up those slavers has cost us from seven to ten thousand dollars—an enormous sum for young Liberia. We do not repine. We had rather suffer these inconveniences multiplied ten fold, than permit so gross violation of our laws, so great an outrage upon humanity within our territory. It is to be feared we shall have again to take up the cudgel, and use it vigorously, both to the windward and leeward. If the state of things demand the movement, it is well to get at it at once. We cannot expect peace and quietness while the slave trade is going on near us. Nor can we hope to exert our full influence upon the surrounding tribes until the accursed traffic is wholly destroyed. When that most desirable object is accomplished, we shall then breathe freely. We may stretch freely and safely to the north, south, and to the interior. The natives then instead of viewing our approach with disiurst as calculated to destroy their trade, will court us, will receive us hospitably, and be anxious to learn our arts, our mode of agriculture, and vigorously apply themselves to produce from their fat soil and teeming forests, the rich and valuable articles of commerce. Then indeed, instead of dotting little settlements along the sea board contiguous to each other, we would strike out boldly into the interior, form settlements where the feet of civilization has never yet penetrated, and feel abundant security in the natives' eagerness to learn.

One of the original objects of the American Colonization Society—an object for the entertainment of which, they were ridiculed as enthusiasts; namely, the practicability of establishing a colony, has been fully and triumphantly accomplished. Here Liberia stands, a proud monument of American philanthropy; a fact as stubborn as that the three angles of a triangle, are equal to two right angles. But another object of equal, if not greater magnitude, was proposed, which was: through the colony as a channel, to regenerate this continent. What a noble idea! We can hardly conceive of one more grand. The first steps in the regenerating process is taken; namely, the establishment of the colony. The second is now to be made—but preparatory to this, the slave trade must be crushed to rise no more. Then the work of christianity and civilization will go forth in its "morning step"—the earth will open her bowels and reveal her treasures; peace will go forth, and with her magic wand dissolve to the ground the frowning barricade—highways will open through the desert—visits of lawful trade and friendship will be paid & received—the man of God will go forth preaching his master's message of love and peace to a people thus made ready for God—the now besotted African will come, and say, we will go with you, for we have heard that God is with you, and America, although Liberia may not prove a cure for American slavery, will be able, when for different causes, the voice of boasting and rejoicing, shall ascend from many nations, to point to Africa, the once spoiled of all, and as the song of praise and salvation shall be thrown in echos back from her mountains to her valleys, regard with an elevated pride this noble triumph of American genius."

The Felucca Again

The Felucca which we briefly noticed in another article, has given the most incontestable evidence of her character and object. About a week since she was descried at a distance off Gallenas, by H. B. M. cruiser, Alert. It being a dead calm at the time, two boats were sent in chase. She used her long oars, but the boats approached her rapidly. As soon as they within pistol shot, she opened a terrible fire of musketry, killing one officer, two seamen, and severly wounding nine others. One of the boats got alongside, but she kept so continual and brisk a fire, that she was forced to haul off and retreat. Immediately there, after a breeze spring up, when the brig made sail after her, but night coming on, she was lost. Two or three cruisers are in chase of her, but it is not to be supposed she will remain on the coast after having committed so gross an act of piracy.

We only have time to notice the arrival of the schooner Lark, Captain Hall, presented by Her Majesty to the Republic of Liberia. She arrived the 16th.

AFRICA

Is destined to be civilized principally by Africans. The missionaries, teachers, and emigrants, who go to that country, must be most generally Africans, because they can stand the climate where white men would sicken and die. The duty of the people of the United States is to furnish the Liberian colonies liberally with books, maps, and the facilities for imparting and receiving education. To sustain good schools in Africa, so that teachers may be furnished who are already acclimated. Respectable seminaries ought to be raised up in Liberia, as a place to furnish men who will carry civilization far into the interior. As the settlements extends, there will be an increased demand for teachers, and these must either be sent from the United States, or educated in Liberia, or must come from both these sources of supply. It is good policy to build up good seminaries in Africa, and then the emigrants and their children can cotinue to improve, and the natives of the country may acquire a knowledge of science, literature, and the useful arts. For the promotion of this object libraries are needed, globes and apparatus' wanted, matthematical instruments are desired, and many of the facilities for education ought to be supplied. The press ought to be freely used in the new republic, in order to give it moral force and influence. Every intelligent emigrant, of good character, who is sent to Liberia, is one added to the army of civilizers. Would it not be well for every citizen of the United States, who is wealthy, or in easy circumstances, to say that he will at once send over his man to engage in the civilization of Africa?—This he may do by giving fifty dollars, the average cost of transporting and settling an emigrant. If every citizen who is able to do so, would thus send over one emigrant, the free colored population would soon be removed from the United States and happily settled in Africa.—Liberia Advocate.

LAURA BRIDGMAN AND HER BARRER OF FLOUR.

We wonder if any of our yonng friends have not heard or read something of this interresting American girl? If there are any of our young readers to whom the story of Laura Bridgman is unknown, we would merely say, that she is a young girl, in the Institution for the Blind, in Boston, Mass., U. S. of America, deaf, dumb, and blind Just think of that condition a moment Every avenue to her mind is cut off, except the sense of feeling. We believe that her sense of smelling is impaired so as to render her insensible to the sweet breath of flowers. Poor girl! had she been born among the heathens, she would have been left to punish as a worthless thing, to whom life was of no value. But there were those who saw in her candidate for immortal glory—a being that could be made to sing, and hear the angels sing in heaven, and see and taste all the breatitudes enjoyed there by spirits that never were pent in clayey tabernacles as windowless as here on earth. And they went to work and educated that single sense of feeling to the nicest susceptibilities. And they made a wooden alphabet, a wooden model of ideas, all that had been, are and shall be in the world. And these she touched most thoughtfully, as if training for the music of a new existence; and wonderful! her fingers' ends became improvered with faculties almost miraculous, and filled her mind with astonishing revelations of things present, past and to come; Her little finger, wisping, loving estrong fingers touched the record of the olden years, beyond the flood, till they felt the branches of the forbidden tree, and the locks of murdered Able, and the surges that beat against Noah's helmless ark, and the cradle of the Hebrew baby in the bulrushes, and the tremulous base of Sinai, and David's harp and the face of the infact immanuel in the manger, and the nails that fastened him to the cross, and their prints, that unbelieving Thomas felt after the resurrection: and with his faith on shorter evidence, she had cried, in the voiceless language of the heart: "My Lord! and my God!"

How she plied at morning, noon and night those fingers! wonderful fingers! It seemed that the very finger of God had touched them with miraculous susceptibilities of fellowship with the spirit world and that around her.—She put them upon the face of his written word, and felt them thrilled to her heart with the pulsation of great thoughts of love to man. And then she felt for other's woe.

Poor child! God bless her richly! She reached her short arms to feel after some less happy than she in the condition of this life! some whose finger's end had not reached such sweet paragraphs of heaven's mercy as hers had done—some who had not seen, heard, and felt what her dumb, silent, deaf fingers have brought into her heart of joy, hope, and love. Think of that, ye young eyes and ears that daily feast upon the beauty and melody of this outer world. Within the atmosphere of her quick sensibilities are felt the presence of those whose cup was full of affliction, She put her fingers, with her throbbing sympathies, upon the lean, bloodless faces of the famish children of Ireland, and her sightless eyes filled with tears that the blind may shed for griefs, they cannot see. And she plied the needle with those fingers, and quickened their industry by placing them upon the slow, sickly pulse of want, that wasted her kind at noonday across the ocean. Days and nights, too—for day and nights were alike to her wakeful sympathies—and for weeks she wrought on her needle. And then the embroidery of those fingers was sold to the merchants —would it had been sold to England's Queen, to be worn by the young princesses on day of state—it was sold, and its purchase-price a barrel of flour, instead of a country's harvest, which it was well worth. And that barrel was stowed away among the thousands that freighted the Jamestown on he recent mission of brotherly love to Ireland. That barrel of flour, would that it might be to all the children of what in Ireland what the barrel of meal was to the household of her who entertained the prophet of old! Would, at least, that those whom it supplies with bread, might know what fingere wrought for their subsistances!

Laura Bridgman and her barrel of flour should teach the world a lessen worth the woes of one year's famine. Let all the children of England and America learn that lesson by heart, Ireland and the whole family of mankind will be the better for this visitation of want.—Church of England's Magazine.

An effectual cure for the bite of a snake.—Lasco Hickman, a black man in Frederick county, was bitten on the finger in the corn house about dark by a snake, supposed to be a copper-head, from the fact that one was killed the next day under the house. Immediately his arm swelled to twice its ordinary size I applied first the breast a chicken cut open—next a large vial of whiskey—to the wound. We also bathed the arm and hand frequently during the night, and the next day until 10 o'clock with salt water, without any visible abatement of the swelling. At that time a physician arrived, and immediately sent for the root of the yellow polar tree, (more properly called the American tulip tree;) he had a strong decoction made of the bark, washed the swollen part with it frequently, gave the patient a half pint every half hour, and applied the bruised bark which was boiled as a poultice. The relief was a most instantaneous, the swelling soon subsided, and the pain, which was very excruciating, in a short time ceased altogether. The Doctor assured me, that had it not been for this simple remedy, the man would have lived many hours; and I am convinced from what I saw, that had it been applied in the first instance, the suffering would have been very light. I wish this remedy to be generally known, as it may save the lives of hundreds.

ANTECOLUMBIAN DISCOVERY TO AMERICA.

At the late annual meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, Professor Elton read a paper exhibiting evidence that America was known to Europeans as early as the tenth century. He reviewed the statemen of the Copenhagen Antiquarian Society, making it out that the Scandinavian Northmen explored a great extent of the eastern coasts of North America, repeatedly visited many places in Massachusetts and Rhode Island, fought and traded with the natives, and attempted to establish colonies. The most southern region they called Hellaland, (i. e. stone land;) the country further south they named Markland, (woodland;) and the country further south they called Vinland (vinsland,) which appears to have extended so far south as Massachusetts and Rhode Island. The general features of the country accord with the description which they have given.

The rock at Dighton, in this State, was described by Mr. Elton, and an interpretation given of the far-famed inscription. This inscription was mentioned by Cotton Mather more than one hundred and fifty years ago. An accurate drawing of the inscription was made by the Rhode Island Historical Society, a few years since, and a copy sent to the Copenhagen Society, who confidently interpret it. They say the word "Thorfinus," and the number "132" is distinctly marked The "Th" in the Thorfinus are in Icelandic characters, and "orfinus" in the ancient Roman The 132 was engraved in the ancient Roman form of writing numericals. Mr. Elton concluded his argument in favor of the Ante-Columbian discovery of this continent, by alluding to the supposed discovery of America by Prince Madog in the twelfth century. Southey has founded an epic on this supposition, and the late Mr Ruxton was on his way to New Mexico to substantiate the theory, when he was taken ill at St Louis, a few weeks since, and died.—Boston Transcript.

GATHERED THOUGHTS.

Every tool can find faults that a great many wise men can't mend.

Every potter praises his own pot, and more if it be broken.

Force without forecast is little worth.

Friendship cannot stand all on one side.

Fetters of gold are still fetters, and silken cords pinch.

Good harvests make men prodigal, bad ones provident

He is poor indeed, that cannot promise nothing.

He that would know what shall be, must consider what hath been.

He is a good orator who covinces himself.

He who loses money, loses much; he who loses a friend, loses more; but he who loses his spirit, loses all.

A GOOD SIGN.

A correspondent of the Evening Travellar says:—"An incident occurred at one of the large hotels a Troy, New York where I made a brief sojourn, that pleasingly illustrates the progress of temperance As a numerous company sat down to dine, a drinking bill of fare was placed at each plate; embracing not less than thirty different kinds of wines and liquors.' The wine 'list' was a polite invitation to us to whet our appetites for dinner. But there were no acceptances! Not a solitary guest touched a drop. Every goblet was filled with pure cold water! It was a quiet triumph, worth enjoying. I assure you I felt like proposing that the happy and sober com should join the song:

"Sparkling and bright
In its liquid light
Is the water in our glasses;
'Twill give you health,
'Twill give you wealth,
Ye lords and lasy asses;

O, then resign
Your ruby wine,
Each sparkling son and laughter,
For there's nothing so good
For the poor mortal blood,
Nor so sweet as the sparkling water'"

GEMS FROM McCHEYNE.

SUFFERING.

"There is a great want about Christians who have not suffered Some powers must be broken or bruised before they emit any fragrance. All the woulds of Christ sent out sweetness—all the sorrows of Christians do the same. Commend to me a bruised brother, a broken reed—one like the Son of Man. To me there is something sacred and sweet in all suffering; it is so much akin to the Man of Sorrows."

HUMILITY.

"Remember, Mosses wist not that the skin of his face shone. Looking at our own shining face is the bane of spiritual life and of the ministry. Oh, for the closest communion with God, till soul and body —head, face, and heart shine with divine brilliancy; but, oh, for a holy ignorance of our shining!

BEREAVEMENTS.

Oh, God, how thou breackest into families! Must not the disease be dangerous, when a tender-hearted surgeon cuts deep into the flesh? How much more when God is the operator, who afflicteth not from his heart, nor grieveth the children of men."

spiritual sentimentalism.

"Is it possible for a person to be conceited of his miseries? May there not be a deep leaven of pride in telling how desolate and how unfeeling we are? in brooding over our unearthly pains? in our being excluded from the unsympathetic world? in our being the invalids of Christ's hospital?"

Christ's Intercession.

"I ought to study Christ as an Intercessor He prayed most for Peter, who was to be most tempted. I am on his breastplate. If I could here Christ praying for me in the next room, I would not fear a million of enemies. Yet the distance makes no difference—he is praying for me."

Progress.—There is a foolish notion stealing abroad, and creeping into small and unoccupied heads, that Christianity is about to present itself in an aspect entirely new, so "broad" as to have no outside, so "comperhensive" as to include every thing but sound and scriptural orthodoxy, so "liberal" as to give a way all of the gospel which is worth keeping, so "spiritual" as to contain nothing more substantial then metaphysical fog and "the stuff that dreams are of," so "transcendental" as to get far beyond the vulgar bounds of common sense and dull reality, and so "progressive" that it will go to Beelzebub without troubling him to come after it. It is thought, by many, that some new exposition of our relgion is to be made, which is to serve as a solvent for all sorts of opinions, to regenerate society as by some spell, and to usher in the light of the millenium as it were by the combustion in the old candlestick of some newly invented gas. In some way or other, instruction is to be drawn from the teachings of Christ, which have been unparted before. It is an insult to the Bible to cherish such an expectation; for it implies that the multitudes to whom it was given as a guide, have been laboriously and prayerfully tendying for two thousand years without discovering its most important meaning. In bringing about this impossible expectation, much account is to be made of the philosophy of religion, whereby men will be able so to philosophize the Assembly's Catechism, that they can at the same time subscribe it and ridicule it, with perfect consistency! It is from this propensity to tamper with and tinker the philosophy of religion, or to fit it up and rig it in some new philosophy, that all the depravings and corruptions of the gospel from the days of the apostles have originated. The "dark ages" were caused by the thick cloud of speculation and moral invention which shrouded Christendom in gloom, and hid her radiant Sun.

DREAMLAND.

3. In Dreamland once I saw a church;
Amid the trees it stood,
And reared its little steeple-cross
Above the sweet greenwood;
And then I heard a Dreamland chime
Peal out from Dreamland tower,
And saw how Dreamland Christian-folk,
Can keep the matin hour.
* * * * *

7. I saw the Dreamland minister
In snowy vestments pray:
He seemed to think' twas natural
That prayer should ope the day:
And Dreamland folk responded loud
To blessings in God's name,
And in the praises of the Lord
They had no sense of shame!
* * * * *

10. I saw a Dreamland babe baptized,
With all the church to see,
And strange as 'twas—the blessed sigh,
'Twas beautiful to me!
For many a voice cried 'oud Amen,
When o'er its streaming brow
The pearly cross was charactered,
To seal its Chritian vow.

11. I learned that Dreamland children all,
As bowing sponsors swear,
To bishop's hand are duly brought,
To Eucharist and prayer:
And Dreamland maids wear snow-white veils
At confirmation hour:
For such—an old apostle wrote—
Should cloth their heads with power.

THE GROUND OF PROHIBITORY LAWS.

Those who have watched attentively the progress of questions of reform in this country, cannot have failed to notice the phases under which objections to prohibitory laws have been set forth. These objections have been urged most strongly and most remarkably against the passage of laws prohibiting the sale of intoxicating drinks. It has been said—this traffic has been allowed as legitimate and proper for a good citizen, equally so with any other departments of commerce; now if the government assumes to adjudge this traffic to the immoral and pernicious, and to prohibit it by penal laws, it steps aside from its legitimate sphere, and violates both the moral and the civil rights of the citzen. The government; it is argued, cannot legitimately adjudge moral questions, much less can it enforce upon all, with convictions of a portion of the community. To do so is an impertinent interference with the rights of conscience and of trade.

The objections here raised against prohibitory laws very plainly imply that such laws are based upon what is termed by Dr. Arnold, the moral theory of government, and so take one step towards the union of Church and State. A step in that direction is justly deprecated by all true Americans and even the possibility of it is enough to awaken distrust of any measure which is even suspected of involving it.

The practical importance of ths question in our times, considered not alone with reference to the traffic in intoxicating liquors, but with reference to several other matters which are under discussion, renders an insight into the grounds of prohibitory laws a very suitable and indeed an urgent inquiry. If prohibitory laws involve the mischievous elements which we have here intimated, we have many on our statute books which should be erassd. Instead of pursuing longer a false theory of government, we should at once retrace the mistaken steps which we have already taken.

The relations of human society render civil government indispensable. Civil government is indeed an ordinance of God. Of the form of the government we now say nothing, except that the republican seems to us the perfection of government. Of such a government then, what is the design? Our republicanism, theoretically at least, will not be doubted when we answer,—its design is to secure to each individual, (and to all individuals alike,) the opportunity of developing as he will, and to the widest extent his own happines provided only that he shall not invade the same rights in his neighbors. In other words, the civil government is the union of the citizens for securing to each individual, (and to all individuals alike, his natural rights, which rights are those just named. Under this theory, which is the theory of the government under which we live, every citizen is thus addressed:—Your opportunities are as wide as the universe—employ your mind, your hands your time, your skill and your property as you may judge best for your interests and happiness, restricted only by the equal privileges of others. If you restrain not yourself within these limits, you shall be restrained. If others violate your rights, you shall be protected. This is the compact, to which there are no exceptions, and from which there can be no release.

Now if these things be so, it follows that the rightfulness of prohibitory laws, as indeed of all others, is to be determined by their relation to these fundamental principles. The "moral theory" of Dr. Arnold has nothing to do with the case, and all fear of Church and State may be summarily dismissed. The civil government not only may, but must pass prohibitory laws, when any citizen, or any number of citizens, commit acts which violate the rights of their neighbors. This is the ground of such laws, and both justifies and demands them. Thus, if my neighbors appropriate my property without my consent, the law properly step in and forbids the theft. If my neighbors invade my personal liberty and bind me in chains or shut me within prison walls, the law secures to me my release, and avenges the injury. It declares that no man shall invade the rights with which God has endowed me, and adapts its prohibtory provisions to this end. It does not assume to be a censor of morals, but the guardian of equal rights. It does not seek to control men's convictions, but to restrain their invasion of their neighbor's privileges, possessions or happiness.

When therefore an individual finds himself pressed by prohibtory laws, and is disposed to complain that his rights are thereby invaded, he will do well to pause and inquire whether the liberty which he demands for himself is not a license to invade the the rights of others. That is a thing which the government, if true to its design, cannot allow. The humblest and the weakest of its citizens is entitled to protection. Suppose the complainant in this case to be a trafficker in intoxicating lipuors. He protests that the government is seeking to enforce upon him certain notions about morality, whereas on such subjects he has his own rights of conscience,—and to injure his property by interfering with business. But to this the reply is, that others have rights which he is invading. Wives and children are entitled to conjugal and parental care, which he deprives them of by furnishing to the drunken husband and father the demon of the cup. Men of sober lives and industrious habits are entitled to the fruits of their earnings, which his traffic is filching away in the shape of taxes for poor houses, police and prisons. He is violating the rights of his neighbors—he is demanding the privilege of invading the social peace and welfare, and it is no violation of his proper freedom to restrain him. He mistook the nature of liberty when he imagined that it involved the privilege of injury to others, and society lays its hands upon him and says, Equal rights, sir you can have, but no more.

Such in our view is the philosophy of prohibitory laws,—a matter exceedingly clear and readily apprehended, but strangely involved in mystery and misrepresentation. A little reflection; under the guidance of first principles, will at any time solve questions of legislation about which men contend as if they saw some portent threatening our republican institutions. First principles are safe guides, and never more safe than in the making of laws.—New-York Recorder,

NECESSITY FOR COLONIZATION.

It is a bitter sight to witness the ripening discontent or the sullen magnanimity of those who brought up as gentlemen, crave the wages and the work of office-sweepers and errand porters. Yet of such is London full. What is common in the metropolis is not rare in the provinces. Other cities exhibit in their different proportions the same annomalies of society and the same asprations of fortune. There is in the British empire an enormous aggregate of unemployed capabilities and unprofitable skill. This, by itself, demands consideration. Great talents are given to a nation as they are given to an individual—to be turned to account, not to die idle. Despite the pedantry of the economists and the eternal preaching of Laissez-faire, we cannot bring ourselves to believe that so great an evil should be left to cure itself, while there are national means at command by which it might be diminished if it could not be destroyed. We have a colonial empire of greater extent than the world has ever yet seen—greater promise than any other kingdom has ever hoped for. Our Australian and American settlements together, exceed the whole arena of Europe. In either of these, hundreds of miles, millions of acres, are still yearning for the axe, the plough, and the wheel. In either of them is there the material for thousands of homesteads and millions of inhabitants—in either of them the source of future wealth and the supply of present food. In both of them there are opportunities of doing that which men are ashamed to do in their own country, and among their own people, viz: of exchanging the sterile dignity of inactivity for the profitable toil of active life. In both of these there is work enough for the thews and muscles of that pitable crowd who consume the energies of their minds in calculating the disadvantages of a liberal education in the cheap eating-houses and dingy divans of London. But though the State may feel itself discharged from the duty of turning poor scholars, famished artists, and despondng surgeons into colonists, and may leave them to get to their own account of failure and miscarriage with post haste economy, there is another class which must be heard, and will not be put off with a "leave alone." There is a multitudinous, more exacting, more wretched. The end of each succeeding year sees the addition of nearly a quarter of a million of human beings to the inhabitants of this country. The crowded seats of manufactures and commerce—Liverpool and Manchester, Nottingham and Stockport teem with the annual increment of creatures who exclaim, "Give us work and bread." How shall we meet this cry? Shall we tell them that work is an affair of demand; that work depends upon competition; that competition is an effect of population; that population outruns subsitence; that they are too many; in a word, that they have no right to exist? They would be bold men—that would be a bold government, which should hold such language as this. With Chartism in front, and discontent in the rear, it would be perilous to begin such lecturing. But is not the principle acted on though not vowed, when—with a vast territorial domain in which labor might grow into power, and poverty into wealth—with mines of ore and fields of fertility—with capital calling for labor, and adventure crying for help—the State refuses to acknowledge the duty of settling its redundant multitde in its own distant lands, or discharges it in a niggardly and grudging mood? The danger of such neglect or such parsimony is great. Time glides on, adding alike to the numbers and the discontent of the masses. Misery has strange axioms.—The misery of multitudes invites a mild policy. They whose normal condition is endurance, will avenge themselves on the empire by a normal agitation. They whom the national wealth does not assist in bettering their fortune will wage an obstinate war against wealth, property and order. We have put down Chartism: but we have not conciliated discontent. Let us beware lest the discontented become the majority. —Much depends upon ourselves, much on the use to which we turn our existing establishments; and no establishments have we more valuable than our colonies. A colonial empire founded on the sparings of our superfluous wealth and the craving of our unemployed industry would be a grander commemoration of victorious order and triumphant law than a century of hospitals or a myriad of wash-houses. Those who were elated and those who were dejected on the 10th of April, might alike view with pleasure the glorious fabric of a new empire springing from the ruins of a broken faction and the energies of a noble purpose, emblematic of the "bow of hope that spans the earth"—emblamatic of the only faith that ever yet inculcalted liberty, fraternity, and equally aright.—London Times.

THE LIGHT OF NATURE.

There lived many years ago, in Philadelphia, a celebrated Indian chief by the name of Tedyuscung. He was sitting one evening by the fireside of a friend, both of them looking silently at the fire, indulging their own reflections

At lenght the silence was interrupted by the friend, who said, "I will tell you what I have been thinking of; I was thinking of a rule delivered by the Author of the Christian religion, which from its excellence, we call the Golden Rule."

"Stop," said Tedyuscung, "dont praise it to me, but rather tell me what it is, and let me think for myself. I do not wish you to tell me of its excellence—tell me what it is."

"It is for one man to do to another as he would the other should do to him!"

"That's impossible! it cannot be done," Tedyuscung immediately replied, and taking his pipe, lighted it, and commenced walking about the room. In about a quarter of an hour he came up to his friend with a smiling countenance, and (taking the pipe from his mouth) said, "Brother, I have been thoughtful on what you told me. If the Great Spirit that made man would give him a new heart, he could do as you say, but not else.'

Ezekiel xxxvi. 26—A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you; and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you a heart of flesh.

WEALTH OF THE UNION.—The report of the Patent office, recently made, presents some interesting statistics relative to the wealth of the Union. The population of the United States is set down at 20,766,000, and the aggregate of personal and real property is estimated at $7,295,560,000. New York is the richest State, her property being $1,112,000,000; Pennsylvania next, $950,000,000; then Ohio, $740,000,000; then Virginia, $508,000,000. The remainder of the States rank as follows:

Indiana, $384,000,000; Tennessee, $380,000,000; Kentucky, $342,000,000; Massachusetts, $340,000,000; Georgia, $320,000,000; North Carolina, $300,000; Illinois, $291,000,000; Alabama, $276,000,000; Mississippi, $256,000,000; South Carolina, $242,000,000; Missouri, $240,000,000 Maine, 240,000,000; Maryland, $[illegible],000,000; Louisiana, $[illegible],000,000; New Jersey, $166,000,000; Michigan, $[illegible],000; Connecticut, $132,000,000; Vermont, $[illegible],000,000; New Hampshire, $120,000; Arkansas, $80,000,000; Texas, $[illegible],000,000; Iowa, $52,000,000; [illegible] $[illegible],000; Wisconsin, $26,000,000; Delaware, $32,000,000, Florida, $30,000,000; District of Columbia, $18,000,000 Oregon, $8,000,000.

WEALTH OF GREAT BRITAIN.—The whole property of Great Britain, says the Nonconformist, was estimated, nearly thirty ago, years at £3,600,000,000. Since that period it value has increased to between six and seven billions of pounds sterling; so that the national debt of £800,000,000, frightful as it is, is only about one-eighth part of our national wealth. In other words, our assets show a sevenfold surplus over our liabillities.—New York Recorder

Spare Moments.—Spare moments are the dust of time; and Young was willing a true as well as a striking line, when he taught that moments make the mountain, and moments make the year. Of all the portions of our life, the spare moments are the most fruitful in good or evil. They are the gaps, through which temptations find the easiest access to the garden of the soul.

Tight Lacing—A learned doctor, referring to tight lacing, avers that it is a public benefit, for it kills all the foolish girls, and leave the wise ones to grow to be women.

FRANKLIN THEATRE.

We take shame to ourselves for not having seen the Golden Farmer before its withdrawal, as we are told that Sefton's performance of one of the characters was quite a hit. We have seen his portrait in the part, and learn that some of his most therein are becoming proverbial among those who look to the forcible expression, rather than the elegance or refinement of a phrase. By all accounts, things are going on prosperously at this little band-box of a theatre.

WOMAN

It is pleasing to contemplate the theme of female excellence. The heart of man warms with emotion as he hears of the noble deeds of woman—as he views her quiet goodness—as he marks her conjugal devotion, her fidelity, her firmness of principle, the thousand little tendernesses clinging around her heart, animating her to please by all the winning grace and attractions that can fix affection; nor relaxing after marriage in the cultivation of those powers which first commanded admiration, because she has secured her victory. He loves and admires her when thus true to the amiable impulses of her nature. But, if captivating as the freshness and poetry of her early feelings, when the fragrance of her own spirit falls on everything like dew, how much higher does she erect herself in his esteem when the hour of trial comes, when adversity overtakes those she loves, and the appeal to her sympathies is the strongest that can be made, because it comes through the channel of her affections. Then see what a power of endurance she exhibits; what fortitude, what energy Qualities which, amid the sunshine of prosperity, lay silent and unperceived, for want of occasion to call them forth now appear to view with the hope-reviving influences which we may suppose a near and friendly beacon would have upon the sinking heart of the shipwrecked mariner. Difficulties which crush the hearty spirit of man, and subdue his strength to the weakness of a child, are met by her with a courage that seems to increase proportionally to its demand. With a self-sustaining energy, she counteracts the impression of grief in her own heart, and roused by her love and constancy, she turns to her partner, now dearer than ever from the touch of misfortune, to console, to invigorate, to assist; shedding a benign influence upon his existence, which causes him to feel, amid all his misery, that happiness still remains for him while blessed with the affection of such a friend and ministrant; that labor, however rude, cannot degrade him while he is encouraged by the esteem of a heart so noble and so true.—American Couriee.

HUSBANDS AND WIVES.

A Swiss journal furnishes us with the following romantic tale of real life:—"A married couple, who had for several years lived in a state of anti-conjugal harmony, determined to part, and made an appointment with each other to meet at a notary's to sign the deed of separation. To arrive at the office of the man of law they had to cross a lake, and, as it happened, they both embarked in the same boat. On their passage a storm a rose and the boat was upset. The husband, being a good swimmer, soon reached the shore in safety. On looking round to see the fate of his fellow-passengers, he distinguished his wife, still struggling for her life, but in imminent danger. A feeling of his early affections returned to him, and plunging again into the water, he swam to her and succeeded in rescuing her.—When she recovered her senses, and learned to whom she owed her life, she threw herself into his arms, and he embraced her with equal cordiality; they then vowed an oblivion of all their differences, and that they would live and die together"—American Courier.

SOURCE OF SOCIAL HAPPINESS.

As regards public happiness, statesmen and politicians too often forget that though good political institutions conduce to it, yet that they are but one means to the attainment of this end, and that more than these are requisite to make individuals and nations happy. The cultivation of good will, kindness, humanity, and all the gentler affections, are far more influential in the promotion of private happiness than the justest balance of the political constitution can be; so that though the value of civil and religious liberty is great, and has a large influence on national well-being, still it alone does constitute hapiness; and therefore, it seems to me, that those writers who devote their energies to the task of endeavoring to soften and improve the social affections, do incomparable more to promote the benefit of communities than those who have only in view what is more strictly designated "the public weal."—Curtis on Health.

TO MAKE HOME HAPPY.

Nature is industrious in adorning her dominions, and man, to whom this bounty is addressed, should feel and obey the lesson Let him, too, be industrious in adorning his domain, in making his home, the dwelling of his wife and children, not only convenient and comfortable, but pleasant Let him, as far as circumsances will permit, be industrious in surrounding it with pleasant objects, in decorating it within and without, with things that tend to make it agreeable and attractive. Let industry make home the abode of neatness and order: a place which brings satisfaction to every inmate, and which in absence, draws back the heart by the fond associations of comfort and content. Let this be done, and this sacred spot will become more surely the scene of cheerfulness and peace Ye parents, who would have your children happy, be industrious to bring them up in the midst of a pleasant, a cheerful, and a happy home.—Waste not your time in accumulating wealth for them but plant in their minds and souls, in the way proposed, the seeds of virtue and prosperity.—Christian Citizen.

DEATH.

Death comes equally to us all, and makes us all equal when it comes The ashes of an oak in a chimney are no epitaph of that oak, to tell me how high, or how large, that was; it tells me not what flocks it sheltered while it stood, nor what men it hurt when it fell The dust of great persons' graves is speechless, too; it says nothing, it distinguishes nothing. As soon the dust of a wretch whom thou would'st not, as of a prince whom-thou could'st not look upon, will trouble thine eyes if the wind blow it thither; and when a whirlwind hath blown the dust of the churchyard into the church, and the man sweeps out the dust of the church into the churchyard, who will undertake to sift those dusts again, and to pronounce—This is the patrician, this is the noble flower, and this the yeoman, this the plebeian bran.—Donne

CHIEF JUSTICE MANSFIELD.

This great lawyer, probably with a view to prolong his own days, was always anxious when old witnesses were in court; to know their customary habits of life. It so hapened that two very old men by the name of Elm were one day the objects of his inquiry. 'You are a very old man' said his lordship to the elder brother, 'I suppose you have lived a temperate life? Never drunk any thing but water, my lord;' said Elm. 'Nor you neither I suppose' said the judge, addressing himself to the younger brother, 'When I could get nothing else, my lord,' was the reply. 'I always took my glass with my friend.' 'Well then,' replied his lordship, 'all we can say is, an elm will flourish, wet or day."—The Examiner.

Power of the Voice over Children

It is usual to attempt the management of children either by corporeal punisment, or by rewards addressed to the senses, or by words alone. There is one other means of government, the power and importance of which are seldom regarded I refer to the human voice. A blow may be inflicted on a child, accompanied by words so uttered as to counteract entirely its intended effect; or the parent may use language in the correction of the child, not objectionable in itself, yet spoken in a tone which more than defeats its influence. Let any one endeavor to recall the image of a fond mother, long since at rest in heaven. Her sweet smile and ever clear countenance are brought vividly to recollection; and so also is her voice; and blessed is that parent who is endowed with a pleasing utterance.—What is it which lulls the infant to repose? It is no array of mere words. There is no charm to the untaught one in letters, syllables, and sentences. It is the sound which strikes its little ear that soothes and composes it to sleep. A few notes, however unskilfully arranged, if uttered in a soft tone, are found to possess a magic influence. Think we that this influence is confined to the cradle? No, it is diffused over every age, and ceases not while the child remains under the parental roof. Is the boy growing rude in manner and boisterous in speech? I know of no instrument so sure to control these tendencies as the gentle tones of a mother. She who speaks to her son harshly, does but give to his conduct the sanction of her own example. She pours oil on the already raging flame. In the pressure of duty, we are liable to utter ourselves hastily to our children. Perhaps a threat is expressed in a loud and irritating tone; instead of allaying the passions of the child, it serves directly to increase them.—Every fretful expression awakens in him the same spirit which produced it. So does a pleasant voice call up agreeble feelings Whatever disposition, therefore we would manifest in the tone in which we address him. —Church of Eng Mag.

STEEL PENS.—Who does not remember the time when a steel pen cost as much as a dozen quills? Who is ignorant of the marvelous reduction that has taken place in the market value of these bits of steel? Sixpence a piece, sixpence a dozen, sixpence a gross—thus have they come down in value. All this could not have been done but for the application of machinery. Men's hands employed in cutting, and pressing, and shaping, the pens, would never have permitted this cheapening to have gone to such an extent. And yet there are actually more men employed in the manufacture than when machinery was less used. The machinery, in fact, has created a demand, which requires large numbers both of machines and men to supply. Some of the steel pen manufactories of Birmingham are very large establishments, containing ranges of highly-finished machines, and giving employment to large numbers of workmen. One of these manufacturers (Gillott), in his advertisements, states his yearly produce at a million of dozens; and there is no reason to doubt that it does reach that extraordinary pitch—The we Land Live in.

JERUSALEM AT SUNSET.—We generally resorted to the city as the sun declined. Solemn, sepulcheral, is the character then impressed on the mind. Here is a city still to the eye extensive and populous, but no voice arises from its wide area and the hills and valleys around. The evening breeze rustles among its hoary trees sweeping sadly the bleak rocky surface of the ground. The red light glances over the city, touching its domes and minarets with a last dying gleam, and the dreary hills are broken into grand masses of purple and vermilion, while the glen below, where sleep millions of the sons of Isreal, and the sad graves which shrouded the agony of Christ, are sinking into the shades of night.

Such is the hour to view Jerusalem, alone, seated under some ancient tree, memorial of her past burden of glory and guilt. Then looking eastward over the far horizon of Moab and the desert, glowing in the sun's last rays, complete the indelible impressions of a scene that for its associations is unequalled in the world. Our survey of Olivet would be incomplete without visiting Bethany, (which is, in fact, at its eastern extremity,) the village to which Jesus so often retired to visit the hospitable family of Lazarus. The path continues from the crest of Olivet, and, as we lose sight of Jerusalem, presents us with a succession of pleasing landscapes. The approach is through the open cornfields: the white roofs of the sequestered village are seen among groves of olives, which mark nearly the extremity of cultivation, before we reach the solitudes of the desert. There are, on the right, the remains of a building of the middle ages, and on the bleak hill beyond the more extensive ruins of a castle, or convent, overlooking the Dead Sea and the Moab mountains. In the village is shown a tomb which tradition has selected as that of Lazarus. The pilgrim will linger about this pastoral spot, recalling the walks through the corn-fields, where Jesus plucked the ears of corn by the wayside, or imagining the sister of Lazarus coming forth to meet him, and conduce him to the tomb of his friend. Of all the walks about Jerusalem, this to Bethany, over the Mount of Olives, is the most picturesque in itself, and the most pleasing in itself and the most pleasing in its recollections.—Bartlett's Jerusalem.

An Ourang-Outang Hunt in Borneo

The next day between nine and, ten A. M. Williamson and myself started for the lake, in Rajah Ali's canoe accompanied by a second, containing the two pangerans, who were attended by numerous dyaks.—We had not proceeded, however, above ten minutes, before an ourang-outang was descried seated amid two branches of a high tree, on the bank of the stream. Startled by the noise, he made off before we could land, and a hot pursuit commenced, the animal being from time to time discovered, as he slowly passed from tree to tree in advance of us whilst we straggled through the jungle beneath. Having thus crossed a slight ridge of elevated ground, we were stopped by a dark, deep, ugly-looking swamp, and the chase likewise paused, and from the top of a tree kept up an occasional grunting bark. Our hesitation was only momentary, for throwing off my trousers and shoes, (which I repented.) I took water, followed by Rajah Ali and many Malays and dyaks, and soon found myself struggling up to the shoulders, with the rifle in one hand and the ammunition, in the other. As we advanced a little the water luckily shoaled to the waist, and I had time to look for the game, which was stationary in the position he had taken when last seen.—Rajah Ali was by my side, and firing together at about forty five yards, it was evident that one or both balls had taken effect, for the huge monster went more and more slowly from one tree to another whilst we kept loading and firing as fast as our situation allowed; then wading here and there, we enjoyed the full excitement of the chase. The wood rang with shots and the shouts of the dyaks, as, waving their spears and brandishing their swords, they rushed from one spot to another to gain a view of the devoted brute. At length a fortunate shot from my rifle through his head brought him from the summit of a tree, crashing though the branches with a heavy splash into the water. The chase was finished; the height of the animal was four feet one inch, and it was said not to be a large one.—Journal of Mr. Brooke, (the Rajah of Saraivk.)

GRATITUDE OF A FISH.

At the meeting of the Liverpool Literary and Philosophical Society, held on Monday, some most extraordinary statements relative to the instinct of the brute creation, were made by a visitor, one Dr. Warwick. From the following specimen we should think he might venture on an extension of the Arabian Night's Entertainments, with every prospect of success. He said that when he resided at Dunham, the seat of the Earl of Stamford and Warrington, he was walking one evening in the park, and came to a pond where fish, intended for the table, were temporarily kept. He took particular notice of a fine pike, about six pounds weight, which, when it observed him, darted hastily away In so doing it struck its head against a tender-hook in a post, (of which there were several in the pond, placed to prevent poaching,) and, as it afterwards appeared, fractured its skull, and turned the optic nerve on one side. The agony evinced by the animal was most horrible. It rushed to the bottom, and boring its head into the mud, whirled itself round with such velocity that it was almost lost to the sight for a short interval. It then plunged about the pond, and at length threw itself completely out of the water on the bank. He (the doctor) went and examined it, and found that a very small portion of the brain was protruding from the fracture in the skull. He carefully replaced this, and, with a small silver tooth pick, raised the indented portion of the skull. The fish remained still for a short time, and he then put it again into the pond. It appeared at first a good deal relieved, but in a few minutes it again darted and plunged about until it threw itself out of the water a second time. A second time Dr. Warwick did what he could to relieve it, again put it into the water. It continued for several times to throw itself out of the pond, and with the assistance of the keeper, the doctor at length made a kind of pillow for the fish, which was then left in the pond to its fate.—Upon making his appearance at the pond the following morning, the pike came towards him to the edge of the water, and actually laid its head on his foot. The doctor thought this most extraordinary, but he examined the fish's skull, and found it going on all right. He then walked backwards and forwards along the edge of the pond for some time, and the fish continued to swim up and down, turning whenever he turned: but, being blind on the wounded side of the skull, it always appeared agitated when it had the side towards the bank, as it could not then see its benefactor. On the next day he took some young friends down to see the fish, which came to him as usual, and at length he actually taught the pike to come to him at his whistle, and feed out of his hands. With other persons it continued as shy as fish usually are. He (Dr. Warwick) thought this a most remarkable instance of gratitude in a fish for a benefit received, and as it always came at his whistle, it proved also what he had previously, with other naturalists, disbelieved, that fishes are sensible to sound.—Liverpool Paper.

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Liberia Herald.

An extract of the account of the war expedition marched against the Kings of New Cessters and Trade Town, and the Spaniards residing in those territories, for the purpose of buying slaves, as given by J. C. Minor, Adjutant of the first Regiment.

MESSRS EDITORS:— Sirs, permit me to lay before your readers, through the columns of your erudit paper the following account and proceedings of the expedition marched against the Kings and Chiefs of the New Cess and Trade Town territories.

The horrors of the battle field have already been most beautifully described by able writers:—the appearance of the mangled slain—the groans of the dying—the roar of cannon—the clash of arms and the tramp of horses: consequently it would be a needless waste of time, for me to attempt any thing like a description of those scenes. The the dead and the dying are said to be laying in vulgar heaps, and the mingled crowds of the wounded weltering in their gore; far away from their homes, friends, relations and old companions dear.

It was determined upon as far back as the early part of 1848, by the Liberia Authorities to have the Spaniards, who were residing in the territories of New Cessters and Trade Town, removed, and their slave factories broken up. These determinations, however, were not fully carried out until this last March. They were ordered by the Executive, more than once to desist from their nefarious traffic and to leave our territory; but they obstinately refused to obey the mandate, and so continued the prosecution of their object.

Shortly after the despatch of these orders to the Spaniards, an opportunity offering, the President left for America and Europe, a journey which he had contemplated taking some months previous. Thus matters remained for a while. The Vice President sent written orders to the Spaniards to leave, assuring them of what the consequences would be, if they did not go away, and that speedily; but they disregarded them, and still maintained their position: for they had began to grow in the belief that they could not be removed.

After the return of President J. J. Roberts from his tours in America and Europe, which was on the 29th of January last, in Her Brittanic Mjesty's ship Amazon, on business of importance in behalf of the government of Liberia, relating to the acknowledgment of the Independence of the Republic of Liberia, by the sovereign powers of the earth, as an independent nation. He issued orders through his Aid de Camp, Colonel N. M. Hicks, to General J. N. Lewis, to have an expedition gotten up, of 350 men, to march against the Kings and head men in the New Cess and Trade Town territories, and the Spaniards residing in their dominions, and to break up the slave trade which had been carried on there for years. The orders was then distributed by the General's Aid, to the Colonels of the first and second regiments, B. P. Yates, and Wm. L. Weaver, and by their Adjutants to the Captains of companies. The companies in the settlements in the County of Monsterrado was ordered to parade their companies in their respective towns on Saturday the 24th of February last, for the purpose of getting up volunteers. The number of men required from this county having been enrolled, orders was then issued for the volunteers to meet in Monrovia on Monday, the 5th of March, at 6 o'clock A. M. to be placed under martial orders, and to make preparations for starting.

On Monday the 5th, of March, the volunteers assembled in Broad Street, at the hour appointed, and after the line was formed, they were laid off into four companies and commanded by Captains F. Payne, W. J. Roberts, H. W. Erskine, and T. Robertson. The companies were then paraded until about 8 o'clock A. M. and then dismissed to meet at 4 o'clock in the afternoon. At the hour of 4 P. M. the troops assembled, and after the line was formed the men were drilled by the Commander-in-Chief until 8 o'clock at night, performing many manœuvers pertaining to camp movements; after which the line was dismissed to meet the next morning at 6 o'clock.

On Tuesday morning the 6th, the companies met at the appointed time, and the line having been [illegible] were drilled three hours, and then [illegible] to meet at 11 o'clock; for when they met [illegible] would be no more dismissing of the [illegible] Monrovia, until the contemplated [illegible] fought. During the hours allowed [illegible] men were passing and repassing [illegible] ets in a hurried manner; and the [illegible] of those who were to remain, (as [illegible] eled to remain on account of in- [illegible] ry, and their countenance sad, [illegible] filled to overflowing. At the hour [illegible] drum was rolled, and the line [illegible] er going through several manœvers, [illegible] were marched to the M. E. Church to [illegible] from the Rev. B. R. Wilson. [illegible] church being over, the line was [illegible] and marched a short distance from [illegible] ared in a hollow square in front of [illegible] Hill: the President stood in the [illegible] surrounded by some of the [illegible] officers, and gave a short but ap- [illegible] of which, the following paragraph [illegible]

[illegible] conscious gentlemen that the [illegible] are all in the field is a [illegible] same Almighty Arm that defended and protected the colony in its early settlement, against her savage foes, will sustain the Republic; that the rights of our country—justice and humanity demands our services in the field."

The President having finished his remarks, and the hour for the commencement of our embarkation was drawing nigh; the regiment was marched to the wharf, and at the hour of about 1 o'clock P. M. the embarkation of the men on board of the French steamer Espadon, Captain Villemai, was commenced. The steamer had been here some eight or ten days, waiting the pleasure of His Excellency, to assist in conveying our soldiers to the battle field. At the hour of 6 o'clock P. M. the embarkation of the troops was completed. At 9 o'clock that night, the anchor was weighed,—the steam raised and the steamer got under weigh; and ran pleasantly along down the coast, the men amused themselves by looking at the massy engines of the vessel, as they went up and down, and the huge wheels as they flew swiftly around, until they were overtaken by sleep. At 4 o'clock the next morning we were off Grand Bassa, and at day-light the steamer ran into the harbor and laid too, until the embarkation of the troops from Grand Bassa County on board of the schooner Herald was completed. The Herald sailed from Monrovia three days previous, with stores for the expedition and about 25 of the Congoes, to await the arrival of the steamer. While the steamer was laying too, General Lewis communicated with the Herald, probably the commander of the second regiment, as he was on board. There was a despatch sent on shore by the President also. The embarkation of the second regiment being over, and the steamer having taken the Herald in tow, and the Herald the schooner Perseverance, we set off again for New Cessters, it being about 9 o'clock A. M: and at 12 o'clock we were off New Cess; the Herald was loosed from the steamer, and then she stood away for Trade Town. While on the way there, we espied two vessels in the distance: one of them was at anchor, the other under sail making for the harbor. On arriving there, which was about 3 o'clock P. M. they were ascertained to be English vessels, the Ellenjenkinson and Clydeside of Liverpool. The Erjenkinson was consigned to Mr. Wm Lawrence, who have resided for some time at Trade Town, and in its vicinity, in the employ of some English merchants, as factor. Colonel Yates visited both of these vessels, on business of importance. The object of his visits having been accomplished, he returned to the steamer, and after having made a report of his proceedings to the officer entitled to receive such representation, we started for New Cess again. And while the steamer was swiftly gliding along up to New Cess, with the waters foaming at her bows, and heavey surges rolling back from her enormous wheels: and our men and officers in fine spirits, amusing themselves with what they saw around, except the two or three who were sea-sick; we saw a large number of natives emerging from their hiding places, headed by one or two persons dressed in civilized attire: one of whom was mounted on horse back, marched merrily along the beach,—leaping, jumping and throwing their bodies into various motions, and brandishing their muskets and spears in the air, as if inviting us to come, or bidding defiance to our landing. "Hold on brave boys" was the responce of some, "we will call and see you tomorrow morning." The person who was mounted, was supposed to be Don Francisco, the chief of the Spanish barracoon. One of our party, Mr. Richard Cannon, who is notorious for merriment, said, speaking to the rider, "never mind my hearty, I want your horse, and I will have him before I leave the country."

The natives and their conductors had supposed that our army was going to land on the south side of the New Cess river, (which I believe was the general's first intention to do); the beach along that part of the coast being very rocky, and the surfs are most always in a bad state for landing, and especially so in times of war; besides these, the mountainous rocky ridges running along the margin of the beach which would have afforded the enemy decidedly the advantage over us; consequently they had made every preparation to give us a warm reception, and if possible defeat us. But those who are well acquainted with the landings there, were of opinion that the landing of the troops on the north side of the river, would be attended with more safety. The steamer anchored off New Cessters the same afternoon about half past 5 o'clock; and the United States ship Yorktown anchored off New Cessters near the steamer at about 7 o'clock on Wednesday, the 7th of March, which vessel had been at Monrovia from the third of March waiting to company the expedition. The Yorktown sailed from Monrovia, the day after the steamer. The night passed away pleasantly with all hands.

On Thursday morning the 7th, General Lewis gave orders for the landing of the troops; and after an early breakfast the boats belonging to the Steamer and Herald was lowed down and manned, and filled with soldiers as thick as they could stand, and proceeded on to the shore:—the boats with many of the officers from the Yorktown was in company, this was all very well, as the whole of them made a grand display at sea. As the boats with the soldiers neared the beach, the natives made thier appearance from behind the high rock and thick bushes, that are sprinkled along the margin of the beach, with their muskets glitt'ering in the sun, and opened fire on us at once. Our oars-men cease a little from rowing til a few rounds of bumbs was fired at the natives from the steamer, who were gathering to oppose our landing which soon made them retreat, and that in haste. Two of the steamers boats had brass pieces mounted in their bows, to act in concert with the steamer's guns, in order to render our landing more safe, each of them was fired several times at the enemy, which disapointed them of their expected victory. The first two boats that got ashore, (one of which was the flag boat), was swarmped in the surf, and most of the men that were in them, with their arms and amunition got soakingly wet; for bout that time the surf was runing very high. The natives saw our situation, and knowing too full well, that no firing of shot from the vessel could effect them, without killing of our own men, was determined to take advantage of it, as they kept as much as possible to the windward of us, and so kept up a brisk fire; but they were most surprisingly disappointed. Our rifle squad, under Command of Captain Wm. Draper, who were in one of the boats, ordered their oarsmen to pull back beyond the surfs, and then opened a sharp fire on the enemy, which made them keep back until enough men could get on shore with dry amunition to protect the landing of the rest. The brave hearted men who landed first through the surfs boldly presented the wet muzzles of their muskets to the enemy, which was as terrifying to the natives as the fire. On reaching the beach, the flag was immediately planted, and three hearty cheers given. After a number of the soldiers was landed General Lewis ordered a detachment to be left at the landing place to protect the landing of the men, amunition and stores, and then marched off down the beach with the rest of them, to take possession of a Crootown, not far distant, which was done without any opposition. The surf continued to get worse and worse, so much so, that the landing of the troops had to be postpond until the next day. We know that General Lewis yielded to the opinion of the knowing ones with regared to the landing, from the fact that the soldiers was landed on the north side of the river. The detachment, with the rest of those who were landed afterwards, joined the general's party:—the general gave orders for the Captains to quarter their men; and the officer of the day had the guards posted around the Camp. During the remainder of the day, and throughout the night, the enemy continued to fire their random shots at our camp, but to no effect.

On Friday morning the 9th, the landing of the troops was commenced and soon over with. The soldiers were then paraded about in the open space that the natives had cleared off for farming. The astonished natives beholding us from the opposite side of the river, where they were gathered together in a large body, and having never seen so many Americans that distance from their homes before, and certainly not in martial array, they were forced to cry out in their own vernacular, "Ese," which means how fine they look. We remained encamped there until Saturday morning without sustaining any loss from the enemy. As it had been contemplated, from the many threats that had been reported to have been made by the natives and Spaniards, that many of our men would have fallen in the first attempts to land, but it was not so.

On Saturday morning the 10th, there were about 50 armed men landed from the steamer, under command of the first Lieutenant, and two brass pieces, to assist in protecting our troops while crossing the New Cess River, the great rallying point of the combined tribes. Our tents was struck, and we took up the line of march to cross the river, and to proceed to the barracoon. The natives had discovered that our conveyance across the river was to be by canoes, and consequently was sure of certain victory. On our arriving at the crossing place, the thick bushes was well scoured with rounds fired into them from the cannons on board the steamer as well as from those on shore, besides volleys of muskets; and our troops crossed over without the slightest hurt from the enemy, notwithstanding hundreds of them had been in our front all the morning, anxiously awaiting our attempt to cross the river. As soon as possession was taken of the enemies ground, which was on an eminence, near the landing, Captain H. W. Erskine of the Monrovia Artillery had his two brass field pieces loaded and fired, and three hearty cheers was given; and with one accord, the place was named in honor of our General, "Lewis's Hill." While a detachment was waiting to protect the shipping off of the French colors, two or three parties went out in search of the lurking enemy. One of the parties found a twelve pounder mounted on an inferior carriage, but sufficient to have done our army considerable damage, could the enemy have made what sportsmen call a raking fire, and a few cans of grape shot was near by, which it appeared they had just left. Both the gun and the carriage were thrown into the rivar. The other party found considerable valuable plunder, among which was a barrel of rum, but our commander ordered it to be broken and the contents throwed away.

We have been informed that just before the crossing over of our troops, in addition to the large number of natives who were waiting to attack us, that a formidable force headed by Don Francisco, had just arrived; but being awed by our appearance, and terrified at the roaring of the cannon and the whisling of balls, they were forced to leave their position and take refuge in the distant woods.

The camp that we had just left bore the honorable appellation of "Camp Roberts," in honor of His Excellency, President J. J. Roberts, who was present and witnessed the scene.

While we were yet waiting, we saw a murky smoke in the direction of the barracoon: it was at once conjectured to be the slave factory on fire, others contradicting, said not so. At about half past 2 o'clock, we started for the barracoon, and after about three hours steady march, through an uncultivated waste, we arrived in site of the barracoon which had been consigned to the flames, and which was reduced to ashes. At first site, the pic quiet guards under command of Capt. G. R. Ellis, who led the advance, opened a tremendous fire, and rushed up to surround the mud wall that enclosed the once stately buildings, supposing that the enemy was in there. There was nothing remaining but the bodies of some mud dhubed houses, and some pigeons; the unfortunate occuapants had fled and taken refuge on a distant island called Poro Reco, carrying along with them such of their goods as could be conveyed with litle difficulty. The General gave orders and our tents were pitched. We remained there until Monday morning the 12th. On the Sabbath the 11th, we listened to a very fine discourse delivered by Capt. D. B. Warner, our Quarter Master: and those who are acquainted with his stile of preaching, may easily judge of the masterly manner in which it was managed, and especially the occasion for which it was delivered, before a set warriors far from home in the wilds of Africa.

In the concluding remarks of the account of the expedition, I will endeavor to give you a description of this wonderful barracoon, that has been so much talked of: and will, as far as practicable, notice some of the circumstances that happened.

"REVIEWER" REVIEWED.

Messrs Editors:—Sirs, when contemplating the full and grand purpose of man—his creation, and its design; not with a principal that would seem to evade the rules of justice so emphatically enjoined in the moral law. I behold him as an intelligence created for the purpose of glorifying his Maker on earth, and by his acquired abilities, endeavor to advance those of his less favored brethren, in the same scale of importance by teaching, writing, &c.

While reading the "Luminary" of June 13th, a paper published for the purpose of facilitating the prosperity of the Missionary cause of the M. E. Church, in these ends of the earth, by disseminating the truth of the gospel of Christ, among the sable sons of Africa, teaching mercy, &c: I unconsciously came to an article signed "Reviewer." The spirit of which I found to be for no other purpose, than to create a spirit of wrangle—discanting in a most unchristian, and ungentlemanly manner, upon an article said to have been published in the February number of the same paper on Christian Perfection.

The article alluded to, did appear in the "Luminary," but why without the author's name, I know not, but I am confident the author did not withhold it upon his own protestation. But his name was withheld, and by whom? It must be the Editor of the "Luminary," from the fact of its non-appearance; therefore we conclude, that this clandestine act by those concerned, was to assail the gentleman without any provocation, and we further learn that the article was submitted for publication upon request—how, low and degrading, in any individual thus to endeavor to take the advantage of his fellow. But I will proceed without reserve, only in some small matters to the field.

The article on Christian Perfection, as I before remarked, was submitted for publication on request, for the purpose of aiding in filling up the columns of the "Luminary," with wholsome matter, for which its undressed principles are avowed.

Mr. Editor, I perceive within the short space of a month, there have appeared two great, and very extraordinary men, "Reviewer" and "Observer," which will at all events give us twelve this year. I am apprehensive also, that this rapid increase of D. D's. and L. L. D's, posterity will not be able to remember them, or those in the future, any other employment, but to commit the catalogue to memory. Let one of these great men make a speech, he is at once extolled as a great man. Does he but string a queer sentiment into rhyme, he becomes still greater, and in his train he marches on, with immortality in view; and looks back at his pursuing crowd with all imaginable self-satisfaction.

Making no pretence whatever to divinity, I will treat the subject generally, leaving out all Scripture, Latin and Greek, quotations. But should my antagonist urge it to a demonstration, so as to bring into the field some of his more refined peers, then the author of the piece will present himself to the consideration of the many readers of your paper.

Some men when once they secure what they consider a circle of admirers, they may be as ridiculous, and impotent as they may think proper, but ignorance being the great beacon of their admiration, it all passes of, and they next consider it as an elevation of sentiment, or a mesmerized freak; though he transgresses the common rules of good breeding and morality, or mistakes a tea-spoon for a snuff-box, his admirers will readily admit that his paramount thoughts are fixed on some more important objects. And like the Tartars Lama, he is always seated in a dark corner, so he can regulate well the motion of his hands and lips. However, this is but the prelude to his apotheosis;—he immediately dispatches a set of vile emmissaries like himself, and they go about crying up his piety. He now becomes an idol, he receives the addresses of his emmissaries—being a god, he is ever and anon fed by his priest with immortality's pondrous spoon.

Reader all that this god has now to do, is only to keep close, and send his emmissiaries now and then, cautioning them to be hearty in his praise, statesman or author—he is immediately set down on the list of fame by his fiendish admirers, continued to be praised while it is fashionable to praise. These great men always fancy themselves known to the world generally complimenting each other upon their extensive reputation. How amusing it is to see two of these domestic prodogies of learning mount the stage and give and take praise from each other, but let one pronounce panegyric he is called an ingenous fellow, until the other divides the reputation by producing a similar, when both will march off with the same hurrah.

The same degree of unmerrited and undeserved adulation, that attends these great men while living, often follows them to the tomb.

For you my friend who Reviewer has endeavored to review so critically, though you may have no humble admirers to attend upon you, and do not much care whether you be a great man or no—strive to preserve common sense.

CITIZEN OF THE WORLD.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA LIBERIA, JUNE 29, 1849

From the Windward.

The U. S, ship Decatur, Captain Byrne, arrived in our roads on the 26th, inst:, seventeen days from Porto Praya, bound on a cruise in the Bight of Benin. The U. S. brig Bainbridge arrived at Porto Praya the day before the Decatur left, to sail for windward in a few days. Commodore Cooper had left for Madeira and the Canary Islands, with the Portsmouth (his flag ship) and the Yorktown.—All well.

The Decatur communicated with H. B. M. brig Water-Witch, employed in the blockade off Gallenas.

Late English papers received at Porto Praya, state that the French government had landed a considerable force on the shores of Italy, with a view of restoring the Pope to power, and that they had already had an unsuccessful brush with the Roman people. Doubtless Napoleon's troops will be re-inforced, and as the Austrians were crossing the northern frontier of the Papal States for a similar purpose, we may expect to hear of the speedy and entire restoration of Pius the Ninth.

This is really a strange state of things. The old Pope was the first to put this republican ball in motion throughout Europe. It not only rolled him out of temporal power, but rolling over Tuscany, Sardinia, Austria and France,—rolled all their Emperors, Kings and Grand Dukes after him. The people of Rome established an elective republic government for themselves,—so did those of Tuscany. The Austrians and Sardinians obtained a more liberal form of government, and we supposed that France had become the twin sister of Roma, if not in the origin, at least in the prosecution of this great enterprise—and therefore we cannot disguise our surprise that Frenchmen should unite to force the Romans to accept a chief magistrate, whom they have by a large majority, refused.

The Grand Duke of Tuscany had been restored, and had resumed the occupancy of his palace at Florence.

Immigrants.

The barque "Clintonia Wright," J. D. Raffle master, arrived on the 7th, inst:, 47 days from New Orleans with 20 imigrants sent out at the expense of the American Colonization Society. These immigrants excepting an aged couple, who are from Mississippi, came from Kentuckey. The barque was fitted out for the accommodation of 80 immigrants—but 60 expected from Tennessee did not make their appearance at New Orleans on account of the prevalence of cholera.

The St. Paul's.

Extensive improvements are in progress, on the banks of this beautiful river. Four brick houses of respectable dimensions are nearly finished, and preparations are making for the erection of several more. Six months ago, we were not aware that at this distance of time, we would have the pleasure of noticing improvements of this kind. Long since, we predicted, that in a few short years, the most desirable parts in the County of Montserrado for residences, would be on the banks of this lovely river. Already the attention is rapidly going in that direction. Independent of the richness and fertility of the soil—the picturesqueness of the wild forest, boldly towering in the distance, which gives an enchantment to the scene, entirely indescribable;—and apart from the sublime gradeur which prevails as far as the eye can discover:—there is not in our opinion a more healthy location on the western coast of Africa. We need not speak as to the soil, if any one doubts the favourable descriptions which have been given of it, by experienced judges, of its richness and fertility, we advise all such to travel in that direction, and examine the beautiful farms teeming with luxuriant vegetation, and which will well repay the husband men for their labor and toil.

We reitterate the call we have frequently made to the idlers in Monrovia, to throw aside their indolent habits and betake themselves to the cultivation of the soil, —they may continue to wander about the streets, but in the end they will be obliged to resort to it for an honest support, or steal their neighbors' property, and meet with the punishment justly due to rogues

To Correspondents.—We are willing to publish all the communications sent to our office—but we must remind our correspondents of the necessity, in future of sending them at least one week before our time of issuing; otherwise they may not be put in type. Several communications are now on hand, and will appear in our next number.

Liberia Lyceum.—At the annual meeting of this institution, after going through with its ordinary business, the following officers were elected in accordance with the provisions of the constitution.

President—B. R. Wilson, Vice President J. W. Prout, Recording Secretary E. J. Roye, Corresponding Secretary, D. B. Warner, Treasurer David Moore.

The Liberian Cutter "Lark."

This beautiful armed vessel, our readers will remember, arrived in our waters on the 17th, ultimo. Her arrival had been anxinously looked for. It will be recollected that she is a present from the British Gov. ernment, given to us to assist in destroying the slave trade on our coast, and for the protection of our revenue. H. M's. government spared no expense in fitting her up, and we hope she will prove immensely serviceable to our government. She was fitted for our use, at an expense said to exceed in amount twenty eight thousand dollars—the guns were manufactured for her and the word "Liberia" is inscribed upon them. She is of the burthen of one hundren and ten tons—a size fully adequate to the present exigencies of the government. On the 21st: May, she was delivered to our government, and on the morning of the 22nd: at 8 of the clock; the Liberia flag was hoisted on board, and was saluted by the U. S. Brig "Bainbridge," A. G. Slaughter, Commander, with 21 guns. This is not the first time that we have received national courtesie from Captain Slaughter, and we are confident that when the "Lark" is referred to in days to come, as being the first Liberian vessel of war, his name will be intimately associated in connection with that fact. The people of Liberia will always entertain grateful recollections for the many civilities, extended to our government by the officers of the U. S. Navy.

The "Lark" will be manned with our own people, her compliment of men was obtained without difficulty. It is proposed however, to employ a naval officer to take the command, so that our people may be taught discipline, gunnery &c. &c.

The President has received an application from an officer of the Royal Navy for the command, which was favorably considered, and we believe will be acted upon,

Manna River

It is with pleasure we record the fact of our government having procured sovereignty over the whole of that district of country known as "Manna River." This acquisition, if viewed in connection with the slave trade, may be considered as a very important affair. Its proximity to the Gallenas, the notorious slave mart, and the disposition of the people to abstain entirely from the traffic in slaves,—and their willingness to join in with any measure for the extermination of the accursed traffic in that neighborhood, gives to this accession an importance of more than ordinary character.

It is to be regretted however, that the limited resources of our government will not permit, at present, any disbursement of money to the cheifs in that neighborhood, to gain their favor and assistance toward the abolition of the slave trade, and it is hoped, that the philanthropists of the christian world will take a proper view of our wants, and come forward with the helping hand, and enable us to wipe off the curse of the slave trade at the Gallenas. In the meanwhile we advise our people to establish trading houses at Manna River—and in this way measurably supply the wants of the people, and they will not be forced again to sell slaves.

George Robbin, the King and owner of Manna river was here a few weeks since. The object of his visit was, to place his country and people under the jurisdiction of our laws; and we are gratified to learn that the Executive entered into an arrangement with him.

Elder A. P. Davis, of Grand Bassa, is here on a visit to the Baptist Churches, in this county. His visit is greatly appreciated, as the churches, since the departure of Elder B. J. Drayton for Cape Palmas, have suffered materially for want of a suitable minister to administer in matters immediately affecting the welfare of the churches. Mr. Davis has entered upon his duties in the true christian spirit, and has already baptized at Louisianna, on the St. Paul's six persons who had long waited for the arrival of a proper person to solemize the sacred ordinance.

The Falucca, which we have had occasion before now to speak of, has succeeded in taking off 300 slaves from Gallabah, a place in the vicinity of Sherbro, and made her escape off the coast. It was supposed that she intended to take her cargo from New Cess—but in this we were mistaken—her visit to that part of the coast was only a pretence to draw the attention of the British cruisers in that direction.

The President left here on the 28th, ulto: in the Lark for the leeward counties, and to visit several of the African Chiefs, with whom he had business to arrange of a public character. While on this visit, the President will give notice to those foreign traders who take delight in evading our revenue laws, that their property will be liable to confiscation; and themselves punished, should they continue to vioalate those laws.

The U. S. brig Porpoise Commander A. G. Gordon, sailed in company with the Lark. Captain Gordon on every occasion tendered his services to the President, and expressed a willingness to serve him in any way he could for the benefit of the government. The Porpoise and Lark parted company at Cape Palmas—the Porpoise left on a cruise to the Bight of Benin.

The Twenty Sixth

We are pleased to learn that the Town Council have made arrangements for the National Celebration. This is as it should be. We would with pleasure, give our readers an outline of the manner it is proposed to celebrate the day, but we have not had an idea yet, of the plan intended to be pursued. Suffice it to say, however, that from the intelligence and experience of the members of the council, we have good reason to believe that every thing will be done with taste, and in grand style.

Mr. Richard L. Stryker has been selected to deliver the oration. The selection is a good one.

Our Wants

We had the pleasure of receiving by the Liberia Packet, a box of type, sent to us by Rev. Wm. Mc Lain, Washington City—U. S. A. We take this occasion to thank Mr. Mc Lain for his kind present. The proprietors of the Herald, derive but a pittance from the publication of the paper, not enough to pay one fourth of the printer's bill:—nevertheless, they have continued the paper, depending for encouragement upon the friends abroad. The office is now several hundred dollars in debt, and unless we receive help from our foreign friends, we must stop the publication of the paper.

We are in want of paper, type, &c., &c. The: the supply we received by the Packet was very oppertune, it will only go a short distance towards filling our sheet —the quantity received is enough "for seven columns, and leads sufficient to display about two and a half columns of editorial."

We sincerely hope, that the friends of Africa, in England and America will help us in this our time of need.

Major Dixon E. Brown.—It is with heartleft sorrow, that we are obliged to record the demise of this estimable citizen. An affectionate and interesting family sorrowfully mourns his loss; and his country has again to lament the departure of another of her favored sons. Major Brown was an ornament to the circle of friends and acquaintances in which he associated. He was truly and earnestly devoted to the interests of his country.

The deceased immigrated to this country in the year 1829, and up to the time of his death, maintained an exemplary character. He had filled several important public offices, with credit to himself, and to the satisfaction of the government. For the last two years he held the high and respectable office of Attorne General.

When on the late military expedition to New Cess and Trade Town, Major Brown was always attentive to his duties—he was brave without a fault, sagacious in council, and ready at all times for the most perilous duty.

Messrs Editors, can you tell me what's gone with my goat? I lost a very fine one on the 16th, inst: You will oblige yours M.

Institute a strict enquiry, and if you cannot find it, some person or persons must have eat it. In that case you may as well demand of the thief restitution.

"Observer" With an Observation.

We notice in "Africa's Luminary" the annexed quoted paragraph.

"——The pleasure of hearing the Rev. J. W. R. deliver a very pleasing discourse, not more delightful, because it was the first effort we heard him make, than for its pertinent simplicity."

Mr. "Observer" consider your ways, and take heed. It may have been an effort, but did you not realize something exhibiting the character of one who desired to approve you of a propensity which prompted you to conduct yourself unworthy the confidence of your-fellow associates, and class you with those who the scriptures recognizes as "casting pearl before swine." You acknowledge receiving the hospitality of the "White House," &c. Then, why in your discription speak so tauntingly of the "first effort"—and thereby intimating that there were no simplicity evinced in the discourse—for I will assure you if he, the Rev. J. W. R. bore the character of a gospel minister and Elder also, in that department—preach to his congregation the unadulterated word of life, calling them to repentance, and holding forth the inestimable blessings accruing from a hearty repentance:—how can it be possible that this "effort" as you so unmannerly styles it, be unworthy of your consideration, so as to cause you to treat it with so much indifference; and like the creature that oft returns "to its vomit," consider the mastication of the matter set before him more worthy, than that which is calculated if well attended to, to cause you never to become hungry or thirsty in a day, which fast is approximating. Speak evil of no man says the scriptures—and more especially of "Ministers" &c. The "first effort" which was no doubt enhanced by the sudden appearance of a storm, which while it disgorged its liquid streams, caused some persons that was within, to seek shelter from its fury without; while some that was until then without the church, hurriedly attempted to seek shelter within". What conclusion shall we draw from this quaint sentence; was it that individuals placing no confidence in the speaker—sought occasion on the coming up of this storm, to rid themselves of the hearing of the Rev. J. W. R. and those without an excuse for coming in by this circumstance, if I may be allowed the phrase? Mr. "Observer" your remarks, I must say, are without grounds, and by the public unsolicited, as I suppose upon that faith they were presented,—your considering them to be amusing.

It is not the 'first effort" we heard him make, and his character is unassailable by you.

Yours, &c.

TRUTH

What is the reason, Truth, that men admire
Dark Falsehood so, as if she were thy sister?
Of thee they weary, but they never tire
Of her—unnumbered lips have daily kissed her,
As if she were a bride,
While thou stoodest mourning by her side.

Man love thee not—the worse for him hereafter;
Return unto the bosom of thy God,
Laden with tales of him; if his false laughter
Has mocked thee, thou hast power to use the rod,
Surely the world is taught
Elisha was not mocked for naught.

Come o'er my threshold, Truth! Sit by my fire,
And tell me stories of the past! How thou
Hast shouted "Victory" on the martyr's pyre,
And cooled the scorching fever of his brow.
To thee my heart will cleave,
Even while I wonder and believe.

Of Galilee thou canst word me stories:
Though thou shouldst weep thou wilt be proud to tell
How this discoverer of starry glories
Leant on his breast when Folly barred his cell.
Thy shortest, tale of sorrow
Will make me strong in the conscience for the morrow

And of the future tell me. Thou hast lips
Which prophesy the excellence of such;
Those who go "down the sea in ships"
Shall not go wilfully. O break the crutch
On which weak Falsehood leans,
And there will be no plea for battle scenes!

Come o'er my threshold, Truth! Sit by my fire,
And we will chat like friends. Then I shall lift
My forehead to the heavens a little higher,
In faith thou art the Almighty's gift.
For whom the hosts of seraphs were appointed.

Thus will I speak, my brethren, for Truth's sake;—
Shrink not in cowardice when Truth shall ask
A sacrifice. Stand up erect, not quake
When tyrants scowl. Shake off the liar's mask,
And brave the world's disdain;
For [illegible] is born—to die is gain.

CHARITY.

"If thy brother be waxen poor, and fallen in decay with thee, then shalt thou support him: yea, though he be a stranger or a sojourner, that he may live with thee."—Levit. Chap. 24th, v. 35th.

When the finite mind of man contemplates the greatness of the Omnipotent—when it considers the immensity of creation, called into existence by the fiat of the Almighty, how important are all its ideas of His power and greatness! Man, in the strength of his pride, cannot create the lowest thing in the scale of nature, nor with all his skill and science, can he make a grain of sand! How low, then should be his pride and vanity, when he considers that our globe bears no more comparison to the immensity of the creation, than a grain of sand to the earth we inhabit, and that he bears not the comparison to the Almighty, that a mite does to the whole creation. But man, puffed with conceit, seems to think that this, our beautiful world, was made for him individually, that charity is an unmeaning word—that futurity will do very well to amuse children, and to frighten the simple, but He, the lord of the creation, has nothing to do with the misfortunes of others—that circumstances should father his faults, and that as long as he gratifies his passions, he fulfils the intention of his Creator. Is man necessary to the Almighty? Charity would answer that He who protects and feeds the widow and the orphan, created man in his spiritual likeness, that through righteousness he might enjoy everlasting life, "through acts of charity in this world, to inherit a habitation with the blessed in the next. 'If thy brother be waxen poor, and falling in decay with thee, then shalt thou support him.'"

Maimonides says, in relation to the first part of the text, that there are eight degrees, or steps, in the duty of Charity. The first and lowest degree is to give, but with reluctance or regret; this is the gift of the hand, and not of the heart. The second is to give cheerfully, but not proportionably to the distress of the sufferer. The third is to give cheerfully and proportionably, but not until we are solicited. The fourth is, to give cheerfully, proportionably, and even unsolicited, but to put it in the poor man's hand; thereby exciting in him the painful emotion of shame. The fifth is, to give charity in such a way that the distressed may receive the bounty and know the benefactors, without their being known to him. The sixth which rises still higher, is to know the object of our bounty, but to remain unknown to them. The seventh is still more meritorious; namely, to bestow charity in such a way that the benefactor may not know the relieved object, nor they the name of their benfactor. Lastly, the eighth, the most meritorious of all, is to anticipate charity by preventing poverty; namely: to assist the reduced brother, either by a considerable gift, or a loan of money, or by teaching him a trade, or by putting him in the way of business, that he may earn an honest livelihood, and not be forced to the dreadful alternative of holding up his hand for charity; to this the scripture alludes in the above passage.

"Yea, though he be a stranger or a sojourner," i. e. of a different religion or nation. In the address of Jesswant Sing—Rajah of Jondpore to Arengzebe, he says: "Your royal ancestor, Akbar, whose throne is now in Heaven, conducted the affairs of the empire in equity and firm security, for the space of fifty-two years presenting every tribe of men in ease and happiness; whether they were the followers of Jesus or Moses, of David or of Mahomed were they; Brahmins, were they of the sect of Dharius, who deny the eternity of matter, or of that which ascribes the existence of the world to chance, they all equally enjoyed his countenance and favor, insomuch, that his people, in gratitude for the indiscriminate protection which he afforded them, distinguished him by the name of Juggot Grow—'Guardian of mankind.' If your majesty places any faith in those books of distinction, called divine, you will there be instructed, that God is the God of all mankind, not the God of the Mahometans alone. The pagan and the Musselman are equally in his presence. It is He who gives existence. In the temples, in his name the voice is raised in prayer; in a house of images, where the bell is shaken, still he is the ojject of adoration. To villify the religion of the Almighty—when we deface a picture we naturally incur the resentment of the painter, and justly has the poet said, "presume not to arraign or scrutinize the various works of power Divine." Had other nations possessed the charity of him whom they would have called an infidel, a barbarian, humanity would not have groaned at the oceans of blood shed in the cause of religion as if religion could exist without charity, or charity abide in the dwellings of bigotry, "That hemay live with thee." What inference should we draw from that passage? Should it not teach us to respect the opinions and consciences of others; to share with them our political rights—to enter into bonds of friendship with them, although of different faith? But how different it has been understood by the mass of those who profess that the foundation of their religion is charity, without which their good actions would count as nought. Fathers have bled through the charity of their children; children through that of their parents: brothers have been proscribed by their sisters; sisters by their brothers. Kings have waded in the blood of their fellow beings, and all through religion! through charity! "True charity," says an able writer, "is an active principle; it is not properly a single virtue, but a disposition residing in the heart as a fountain whence all the virtues of benignity, candor, forbearance, generosity, compassion and liberality, flow as to love the Lord with all our heart, with all our soul, and with our might. It teaches us to love our neighbor as ourselves. It teaches us to assist the distressed! to succor the widow—to protect the orphan. It teaches us to love all mankind, to have respect for their opinions, to hide their faults, to return our thanks to the giver of all good, by relieving the wants of others by the bounty he has blessed us with. It shows us what we are—what we would be, without the charity and mercy of the Most High. In a word, without charity, this world would be a desert, futurity, curse and mankind without hope.—The Ladies Companion.

A CHINESE JUGGLER.

From the Dublin University Magazine

The emperor of all the jugglers, magicians, necromancers, and conjurers appeared; he commenced operations by placing his box in the centre of the room; he then stripped off his jacket, thus appearing in a state of nudity from the waist upwards, having a white cloth twisted round his loins. He next took his long tail of plaited hair, and twined it round his head, and being thus prepared, he opened his box, and took therefrom an ordinary basin or bowl, of about eighteen inches in diameter, closed the lid of the box, leaving it exposed completely to our view: he then walked round the room, allowing each individual seperately to inspect the basin and handle it—the whole of the time talking in his native language, which we afterwards learned was a species of incantation. We were all sufficiently satisfied that the basin was an ordinary one, perfectly empty. He then placed it on the floor, about five feet from the box, untwisted the cloth from round his waist, which was in size about a yard and a half long, by one yard wide, and which he threw over the basin, spreading it out, continuing during all the time his mumbling. In about half a minute, he raised the cloth from the basin, exposing it to view: when lo, and behold! to our astonishment, it was filled with limpid water, and a fish of three or four inches long was swimming about in it! He took up the bowl, and handed it to each spectator, as he had previously done, and we satisfied ourselves that there was no deception, but that the water was indeed veriable, and the fish a living one! How this was accomplished we leave it to others more learned in necromantic arts to solve, but this is certain, that there was no false lining or bottom to the basin; and it was impossible to have changed the vessel, or to have put anything into it, as the performer did not approach it from the time of placeing it upon the floor until after he had withdrawn the cloth, and we had seen the limpid water in it. After we had sufficiently satisfied ourselves, by examining the contents of the basin, he replaced it in the box, and took therefrom a green flower-pot, filled with mould, which was about twelve inches in height and eighteen inches in diameter. Holding this is one hand, and exhibiting what appeared to be an ordinary seed in the other, he handed them round for inspection after the previous fashion; he then made a cavity in the mould, and placed the seed in it, covering it carefully with the earth; he afterwards set down the flower-pot where the bowl had previously rested, covered it in like manner with the cloth, and recommenced his mutterings, which occupied about ten minutes, after which he withdraw the cloth, and we beheld a young and tender plant in the flower pot, about two inches above the mould; this was of a beautiful bright green colour, with the leaves folded about the stem, one within the other, and apparently a healthy plant, having all that freshness peculiar to one which has just burst from the parent earth, but of what botanical species we are not in a position to determine. This was handed round by the enchanter, and examined by all, with the same feelings and expressions of suprise, but with no less care and accuracy, than the water and fish which had preceded it. He again placed it in its previous position, recovered it with the cloth, and recommenced his incantations, which continued for about twenty minutes; during which period, we observed the cloth gradually rising in a conical form over the spot where it covered the flower-pot until it had risen about a foot and a half, when the cloth was again withdrawn, and to our increased amazement, we beheld the tender plant grown into a small shrub, regularly formed, clothed with verdure, and having its branches covered with buds and leaves; and again the same examination was resumed—we were as equally convinced of the shrub being a bona fide one, and of the impossibility of deception, as we had been of the truth and accuracy of what we had seen on the two former occasions. The replacing recovering remuttering, were all severally renewed, and after the lapse of half an hour, the cloth was once more removed, and need we say that the amazement of the spectators was considerably augmented, by discovering that the shrub, was now clothed with blossoms and flowers in appearance resembling those of the China aster!—New York Observer.

"Letters from New York," by Mary Ch'd]—Chambers Journal.

Let science, literature, music, flowers, all things that tend to cultivate the intellect or humanize the heart, be open to "Tom, Dick, and Harry;" and thus in process of time, they will become Mr. Thomas, Richard, and Henry. In all these things the refined should think of what they can impart, not of what they can receive. As for the vicious, they excite in me more of compassion than of dislike. The great Searcher of hearts alone knows whether I should not have been as they are, with the same neglected childhood, the same vicious examples, the same overpowering temptation of misery and want. If they will but pay to virtue the outward homage of decorum, God forbid that I should wish to exclude them from the healthful breeze and the shaded promenade. Wretched enough are they in their utter degradation; nor is society so guiltless of their ruin, as to justify any of its members in unpitying scorn.

And this reminds me that in this vast emporium of poverty and crime there are, morally speaking, some flowery nooks and "sunny spots of greenery." I used to say I knew not where were the ten righteous men to save the city; but I have found them now. Since then, the Washington Temperance Society has been organized, and active in good works. Apart from the physical purity the triumph of soul over sense implies in abstinence from stimulating liquors, these societies have peculiarly interested me, because they are based on the law of love. The pure is inlaid in the holy like a pearl set in fine gold. Here is no "fifteen-gallon-law," no attendance upon the lobbies of legislatures, nor of the heats or manœuvres of political party; measures as in the moral world as machines in the physical world. Serenely above all these stands this [illegible]—her trust in Heaven, her hold on the human heart. To the fallen and the perishing she throws a silken cord, and gently draws him within the golden circle of human brotherhood. She has learned that persuasion is mightier than coercion; that the voice of encouragement finds an echo in the heart, deeper, far deeper, than the thunder of reproof.

The blessing of the perishing is on the merciful God who cares for them, and rest upon the Washington Temperance Society. A short time since, one of its members found an old acquaintance lying asleep in a dirty alley, covered with filthy rags pinned and tied together. Being waked, the poor fellow exclaimed, in piteous tones, "Oh don't take me to the police office—please don't take me there." "Oh, no," replied the missionary of mercy; "you shall have soap to your feet, and a decent coat on your back, and be a man again. We have better work for you to do than to be in prison. You will be a temperance preacher yet."

He was comfortably clothed, kindly encouraged, and employment procured for him at the printing-office of the Washington Society. He now works steadily all day, and speaks in the evening. Every week I hear of similar instances. Are not these men enough to save a city? This society is one among several powerful agencies now at work to teach society that it makes its own criminals, and then, at prodigious loss of time, money, and morals, punishes its own work.

The other day I stood by the wayside while a Washington procession, two miles long, passed by. All classes and trades were represented with appropriate music and banners. Troops of boys carried little wells and pumps; and on many of the banners were flowing fountains and running brooks. One represented a wife kneeling in gratitude for a husband restored to her and himself; on another, a group of children were joyfully embracing the knees of a returned father. Fire companies were there with gaily colored [illegible] trappings. Towards the close came the hydrogens, containing the men who first started the temperance society in the Washington line. These six individuals were a carpenter, a coach-maker, a tailor, a blacksmith, a wheelwright, and a silverplater. They held their meeting in a carpenter's shop in Baltimore, before any other person took an active part in the reform. My heart paid them reverence as they passed. It was a beautiful pageant, and but one thing was wanting to make it complete; there should have been carts drawn by garlanded oxen, filled with women and little children bearing a banner, on which was inscribed, WE ARE HAPPY NOW! I missed the women and the children; for without something to represent the holy influence of domestic life, the circle of joy and hope is ever incomplete.

But the absent once were present to my mind, and the pressure of many thoughts brought tears to my eyes. I seemed to see John the Baptist preparing a pathway through the wilderness for the coming of the holiest; for like unto his is this mission of temperance. Clean senses are fitting vessels for pure affections and lofty thoughts.—Littles' Living Age.

The Bee—That within a small body should be contained apparatus for converting the "various sweets" which it collects into one kind of nourishment for itself, another for the common breed, a third for the royal glue for its carpentry, wax for its cells, poison for its enemies, honey for its master, with a proboscis as long as the body itself, microscopic in its several parts, telescopic in its mode of action, with a sting so sharp that, were it magnified by the same glass which makes a needle's point seem a quarter of an inch, it would yet itself be invisible and this, too, a hollow tube—that all these varied operations and contrivances should be inclosed within half-an inch in length, and two grains of matter, while in the same "small room" the large heart of at least thirty distinct insects is contained—is surely enough to crush all thoughts of atheism and materialism.—Quarterly Review

For the Liberia Herald.

Messrs Editors:—Sirs, please permit the following remarks to occupy a humble space in your interesting sheet, by doing so, you will oblige your humble servant,

In view of the great importance of the cause of God, I may be allowed to say or remark, to the members of our denomination, that a full attendance is required, at the meeting of our next Association, which, according to the notice published in your last number will be held at the Church in New Virginia, as the importance of the time seems to it. Send your delegates with full and good instructions, and also money to carry out the demands of our Redeemer's Kingdom, for you are aware that we cannot do without means. Come brethren, there is no time for us to fold up the arms; the enemy is defying the cause of our good master. Look around yourselves, and behold the vast number of precious souls, that are to be saved by our united influence,—exertions, and christian examples. The past have already told us, that we have done but little worth speaking about, for ourselves, and for the benighted sons of this almost deserted region. Experience tells us, we can do a great deal, if we can only procure the proper idea of the matter. To carry out the design of the great One, it is necessary to be armed, having on the whole panoply of meekness, patience, honesty and perseverance, and then we shall be able to fight with undoubted courage:—It is the supreme Being, we must look to for aid—up unto him, let our prayers ascend, as he is always ready to give good gifts, unto all who love and fear his name. Let party spirit, animosities, a spirit of resentment, (if there are any) recede before the light of peace, and "Christian Union." To do good, all of us must, enter into the work like men, and with all our hearts, forming one unbroken front, move against the enemy; and if we are united in love, down must the throne of Satan fall to the ground.—It is expected that the churches forming our Association, will not forget to come up with full reports, on the condition of their Sabbath Schools, Bible Classes, Temperance Societies.—Let us have the full number of children, in the Sabbath Schools' department, now, particular, as it is one of the most important auxiliary, to the gospel, and it is hoped that the proper attention will be paid to it:—not only ours particular, but all in the State. Let it be remembered by all, that our hope is in the children. The time has arrived wherein, the people of this country, are to make known to others, our doings, desires, and willing co-operation in the mighty work of redemption. I take this occasion through this medium, as I am aware that most of you, for the sake of news, will sit and sped an half hour, to read the paper; and whilst you read about the things of "Mammon," will you not let the things of "Christ" find a place in your hearts? May we, while we are looking at our infant Republic, "self-poised and erect," on this shore, not forget that the cross of Christ, still stands erect, in a world of confusion and crime, to draw many from darkness to light. It is in behalf of said cross, and he that died upon it,—this mighty instrument in the hands of God, to Africa, saving Liberia, have been permitted to be crowned, and to be called a nation. Thanks be to the Supreme,—to Him let all the honor and praise be redowned.

The christian and moral influence of this country have already been felt in a great degree, by the surrounding untutored tribes. Some have accepted of the peaceful terms of the gospel, and are now sitting in the harmonious enclosures of "Mount Zion," singing the thrilling song of redeeming Love. It is highly necessary, that christians or followers of the cross, in this land have, or strive to cultivate, correct views of the principles of the great theme—to understand clearly our position as a people.—"A city set upon an hill" which giveth light all around, in the very midst of "African darkness." The forming of the Devil's agents are seen and felt all around us, which makes it expedient on our part, for a continual trimming of our lamps. Much are required of us, as little as we may think of the matter.

Who are to lead in the civilization and christianization of Africa? Is it the business of any other people on earth, save ourselves! In fine; who have the civilized world decided upon, would be the proper instruments? The answer is, the coloured man.—The benighted Africans our brethren; this have already been proven satisfactorily, to the most scrutinous. Now, nothing is left, to cause any inquiry about who shall do it.—Who have the best right? The most money, time, labor, talent and influence? Let all put their qualifications (no matter how weak, or strong,) together, and form one common christian stock, and great will be the success of both church and state. Christendom hath already declared that her help may be relied upon, by the glaring manifestation of past favours, which are now in existence among us. The scriptures assure us that "Ethiopia shall stretch out her hands unto God." The fall and fading of Africa's glory—its shame, and long unparallel degredation—its groanings and sighings—its long oppressions under the reign of the prince of darkness; being covered so long with the sable pall of midnight superstition, is to me like a reed planted in the earth which is not quenched, except it dieth. So it is with this country; it have been buried under all the above named disadvantages, for a long time. How may I say without being extravagant, that this country (Liberia) is like the cracking of the kernel, on the shooting forth of the tender stem from it! In '47, the earth swelled, cracked, and out shooted the young and tender stem from the ruins of Africa's corruption, If the analogy is admited, then every care is necessary to have it grow strong, and become valiant; as it grows it needs watering—particular attention must be paid, so as to keep away the worms which destroys the root. May this not be applicable to the treacherous individuals, who are always ready to sap the foundation of any good thing. If proper care is taken, it will flourish "like a tree planted by the rivers of waters, that bring forth his fruits in his season." Its branches shall spread, and the birds of the air will find lodging therein. Heaven grant that the benighted sons and daughters around us, will share of its benefits.

According to my view of the subject, now, nothing more is required than a unanimity of feelings; cheerfully we must put our shoulders to the wheel, and our hearts and prayers in the work. and with joy, the triumphal car will onward move, to signal victories. The savages will stop and listen—they will wonder—they will enquire, why is this, and how come it? Why are they so loving, so united? Being under all these interesting considerations, the magic will become so strong, that though they in their vain imaginations, may be elated at the idea, of subduing and crushing us, by the whiling of the deathly tomahawk, the throwing of the battle axe accompanied, by the hideous war-whoop, all shall be in vain. The Lord being on our side.

By being consistent in all we do, in civil and religious matters, the news will be carried to central Africa, till at last our fame will be known, to the more remote parts of this vast peninsula, as being a righteous people: be it remembered that, "Rightousness exalteth a nation." Very likely, providence intends this single "Star," to be like unto the invincible army of Israelites; when they were passing through the wilderness, scattering its influence, subduing idolatrous nations, and tribes, and bringing them under subjection, till at last; they all tremble, fear and quake, at hearing the name of the "Great Jehovah" the commander of the Israelitish army. He is the same to day, no variation or turning with him,—hath the same fullness of power, to subdue the sinfull, and idolatrous monarchs, and tribes of this vast continent. If we are the honoured instruments in his hands as the children of Israel were, should we not then girdle about our loins with truth, peace, temperance, self-denial and rightousness. So as we may not murmur because of the way, and see that we fall not out of the way, because of contentions: let us secure all the aid possible, for the campaign, that we may do our duties now; teach our children what they should do, so when we shall have fallen in the field, they may be fully able to fill our places. Let us not forget the great evils, which have been the cause of other nations sad downfall; they are laid down in large letters, and should be as a "sign post" in every national hall, every public house, every family, yea, every heart. They are pride, foolish ambition, intemperance, an abuse of virtue, envy, malice, oppression of the poor, and grinding of the needy. Oh! what "rocks," "stags" and "whirlpools; people of Liberia, fly from them—christians, pray against them. These being shunned, the gospel of the Messiah, no doubt, will run and be glorified, if not, great will be our misfortune. The christians composing this country's battery, against the invasion of treacherous foes, their movements are important in the highest degree, important, to be made a matter of deep consideration. We has just launched out (in the prime sense of the term) upon the wide, and deep ocean, of civil and religious responsibilities and freedom. Hence, every step we shall take, will be noticed by our friends, and our foes.—our proceedings will be discriminately observed, by all. Then, how cautious ought all of us to be, more particular, the church in the discharge of her high, and distinguishable calling. May not the case of the inhabitants, of Sodom and Gomorrah, be an example for all other enlightened, and prosperous nations, that succeeded them? Have not the sign post been put up giving warning to all who are likely to steer that way, saying follow not after Sodom, for her ruin is irretrievable. There have been some that have met up with the like fate, not exactly, the same kind of fuel. The crimes, I have no need to mention them. Read the history of those nations, and they will speak for themselves. It is for rulers, to have them for their guide, whilst holding the reins of government. I do not bring forth these remarks, as a source of reprimand, for what you have done, and are doing contrary to good reason and justice, if you have done any thing, I leave you to the remorse of a timely conscience. It is expedient to be on the lookout, for now is the time the enimy, will seek his chance to deceive, when all appear to be full of excitement, elated by the recent glorious intelligence. Let excitements die, and go to work, camly, and soberly. The anvil, hoe, plough, trowel, jack-plain, square, shoe bench, pen, yard-stick, scissors, needles, Doctor book, law book, and the Bible, bid them a hearty welcome. Let us try and find out what virtue there is in them, to keep away disgrace, and endeavor to raise the country to honour and renown. In my opinion, there is no time to idle away, what cannot be made in the reel, make it up in the jig, as is commonly said, so it is done in justice. May I remark that the efficient school master is much requried. The farmer, though in particular, agriculture, is the back bone of any country, none can exist without it,—without it, we must in a great measure fail! The young men, who are now doing nothing, go to farming, idle away no more time, as you have done, your fortune is in the soil: demand it, and she will give it to you, yea, it will come bountifully. There cannot be a strong and durable mer[illegible] without a well established system of agriculture:—agriculture, and commerce, goes hand in hand, the one is supported by the other. It strikes me, that Elephant tusks, Camwood, and palm Oil, decreases, as the number of paltry merchants increases. And if it fails to bring those demands, as it heretofore have done, and we have nothing else permanent to rely upon, such as the staunch farmers, what will we do, if the angry wind of hunger blows? would you not say, perish in a great degree, we must! Yea, the fabric will shake tremendously; for the want of the pillar agriculture, that never has yet deceived any country, which have relied upon its strength:

Again, the enlightening and conversion of the heathen, have of late years considerably engaged the attention of the civilized world. It is astonishing to see and hear of the mighty, Spirit which is infusing itself among the people of America and Europe; to have the dark regions of the globe, lighted by the beams of the "Sun of Rightousness."

The Bible have been translated into several foreign tongues, tracts, and other valuable english writings, have also been prepared in the like manner, for the use of the heathen. These things are encouraging, and need be encouraged—and be commended by every lover of christianity. The opposers of religion, has been struck with astonishment, to behold, the rapid advancement, of the Redeemer's Kingdom. And they instead of continuing to be its opposers, have come over on the "Lord's side;" and are now some of its bright, precious, and courageous advocates. Thank the Lord, for that much of his power. It is ardently and prayerfully wished that this great work, will be carried on and prosper, and that all the world, will join in the triumphant song. The heathens of our country within our doors and jurisdictions, has a claim upon our attention, the debt we owe them is immense; we are here, having the honourable title of being a christian people; we claim the entire advantage over them, as regards the refinement of manners, custom, order of doing business, and every thing else connected with civilization and religion. Being humane, generous, and kind, as must from those beautiful traits flow; which is the decided consequence. Is it not obligatory upon us, to give a portion of our good things to the needy? According, to the virtue of our high calling; the claim of superiority, it do. If christian religion, be the true and only saving religion, then how important it is; for the millions of this shore; to know some thing about it, especially those, that are around us, within our reach. Their instruction and improvement, forms an object unworthy of the notice, and immediate attention of the government. The voice of humanity, loudly deplore, and bewail the condition of our African brethren. What heart is it, that is not touched by the sad condition of these people around us, coming directly under our notice? I presume, none. They are, you know, treacherous, idolatrous, superstitious, deceptious, foolishly vain in their own imaginations, malicious, envious, and cruel. Why is it? The answer, is, they know not the true and living God; have not the least glimmering of christian civilization. They are men, and truly, they can be made useful in both church and state. I may safely affirm, that legislative interference is often employed in matters of less magnitude; but we may rest assured, that the government of this country, from what we know of it, the character of most persons, that will likely make a figure in that department, will at least smile on the design of benevolent individuals, and smooth the way for the carrying out of the purposes of the cross, as well as of the things of "Mammon." The government, under all due consideration, is obliged to administer justice to those laws already passed, as a guaranty of the natives' rights, must be enforced—due regard must be paid to them by every member of the community:

The government, to give full vent, or parly so, to the cause of God, and its own, has the authority to open, or to have open roads to the interior of the country. This will certainly expedite the interest of the missinary, and the good news will go much sooner. The government, are enpowered to treat, with far back tribes, for their trades; and if it be carried out, what reasonable objection has any one to the missionaries, going in company with the envoy, extraordinary to treat about heaven's highest riches, where they are seeking corruption? The goverment in a circumstance of the kind, which all, I presume desire, will be as a protection to the cross. I think no one will doubt of the propriety of striking our course now, into the interior. The sea coast has its supply, we may say, for the present. To speak of trade, perhaps that of the interior is more valuable: reson say it is. As from these comes, all the Camwood, Palm Oil, and Ivory. It is to be regreted, that we have not had roads of any length, only those formed by extreme necessity, by the single traveller: say a foot-path. Missionaries, and traders, heretofore, were obliged to wade through water, if they had any call in the interior; say from 20 to 30 miles or more. To prevent this, and to facilitate the comforts of the missionary and others. The government, as one that has power, means, and influence, can with some ease throw open roads, to some distance, say, one hundread miles or more, I mean, good transportable roads, of any one, may be considered safe, as regards open molestation,—well regulated "tolls" is necessary. In my opinion highly so, as there are many small rivers and creeks to pass over,—and ove them bridges must be constructed, and the pubic receive a just and honest return for trouble assumed. If a system of this kind be carried out, which we hope will very soon be. Then that bulk of inhabitants in the interior, that have only heard of our name and character slightly, will be induced to come in, and take an observation of "Liberians fash" and, we can of them. The "trade goods" the Bible, and the "man of God, (ardent spirits excepted) will go together. They will then find out the true characteristics of our institutions, our motives, and christian desire. No doubt, they will be struck with amazement, and wonder at our superiority, as these are now among whom, we often have intercourse. Will they not feel it equally as much, and inquire as much, of the good way, in civil and religious matters, as those around us, are continually doing? Will they not have the privilege to sing the song of free-grace, as well as those around us have done, and are now still prolonging the echo! Will they not have the privilege, to be taught the book, the science of learning, in schools taught by men and woman, appointed and supported by the government. Missionary and benevolent societies, and, ever by the christian of this land? Undoubtedly they will. May the time hasten on! This being done, who knows the result? Central Africa will catch the news! It will burn like fire among dry "stubbles." It is holy fire itself, and the end will be this: The Star which is now seen just clearing the exalted top of yon distant mountain, and its reflections piercing its way through the dark clouds of long oppression, idolatry and superstition, by the help of the Allwise Providence! shall rise higher and higher, shine brighter and brighter, its beams become warmer, and warmer, until the whole country shall be covered with its light and warmth, and every stubborn heart and will melted down under its cheering and healing influence. The public has a part of the good and great work to accomplish; and who can doubt it? Common reason would not. If the prejudices of heathens against christianity are strong, they are sustained in them by facts of the most glaring kind, and of a stubborn character. The judge of our religion, as being to them unknown, by what they consider the means of judging. The general demeanor of nations professing to have it. It is a fact that a history of the wrongs of christian nations, upon the heathens, would bring at once in existance, a volume of the most daring and glaring crimes. On this shore, what a catalouge of high handed wickedness, would be found in the countries of India in the West Indies in the South and various parts of North American, and yea. our country, Africa, which, to the reader, reflector, and observer have suffered most. Appearing that it will never recover; can we deny the charge of having done our brethren some injustice since we have been here? Being honest, we cannot. For instance, a lack of interest on their behalf, we have not; and do not teach them faithfully the word of 'Life' in our families, Sabbath Schools, and which would bring us guilty, if the line were brought close to the plumit. It is deplorable to behold, what oppression, injustice, and monstrous outrage, the defenceless inhabiants of other uncivilized climes, and this have been oblized to suffer, and have suffered, from nations professing to the just, humane, and pacific characteristics of christianity; may I not say, that africa is suffering, bleeding in consequence of injuries done. Is it not a fact, that nations, that have been favored most with the light of science and truth, improved their superior advantages, to the injury of their fellow creatures less imformed! This is another glaring, yea burning fact, a truth, and a wall which cannot be easily shuned. It is known that millions have fallen—perished a sacrifice, and the remnant only survived to hate, abhor, and blaspheme the christian's name, from father to son forever. The Christian name, what have it not undergone? enough to have extinguished it long since, were it not founded upon the durable "Pillars of heaven"—and supported by the strong arm of the Mighty Omnipotent. We as a people desire not to hate, but to forget old things, and to commence new ones. We are called a nation, being based upon christianity,—humanity—equality and justice as our grand ground work. So far, we have been respected as such.—It is not for us, to fall into the great net of abominable faults.—If we are favored with light, let us with all the vigor of our souls, endeavour to use it to the advantage of our benighted brethren; if possible, heaven design us as the instruments, in the hands of more powerfull and wealthier nations, to carry forth the truth of Divine Revelation, and to diffuse entire christian information throughout this vast country, as in part mitigating some of their wrongs done it, (if the expression may be allowed). Then, Oh! then, let us look up,—let us go before as pioneers, if worthy. Doing the rougher portion, it is hoped that our children will be able to do the finer part; build colleges and occupy them; public bridges, rail-roads, magnet telegraph, ships and above all, plant more corn, rice, cassava, coffee, and arrowroot than we do now.—We must strive to impress the belief on the minds of the numerous tribes, of the entire wish and warm desire of the people afar-off, to do them good, at the same time, prove ourselves not to be wolves in sheep's clothing. The brightest glory, that the Republic may expect to beam upon its nationality depends on its attention, regard, and love for the aborigines—their elevation, we being instruments in the hand of God.

May we not hope, that this infant nation, is reserved to this happy destiny? Such a hope, can only be grounded on the idea of our cleaving wholly to the christian character. If we do this we shall not only enjoy the smiles of heaven, and the solid and lasting benefits of divine protection, but we shall look on the poor savages, on our borders, as our unhappy brethren, and shall not only treat them with clemency, but make every possible exertion, for their instruction and improvement. According, to the rapid growth of benovolent societies, in favor of this country, it speaks as if the time of reparation has surely come. 'But, alas! what amends can be made for past ages and for innumerable millions! To take a retrospective view, one would decide at once, no good can be done. The stain, the hatred—the sins, are unpardonable. But no reflection, prophecy gives a contrary aspect to the whole affair. "The solitary places, shall bud, and blosom as the rose." The pages of the sacred annals throw a volume of light over the whole dark, past offences, and bids the American and English philantropists, to go on, to take courage and step not on the way. That the benevolence of foreign countries, have not, and are not doing good,—good of the most important kind, cannot be asserted from honest lips. Things are too glaring. Their schools, churches, books, are proofs of the most stubborn kind, for such, Liberians are grateful, for we have received, and are receving, the benefits accruing there from. By the unabated dexterity of American benevolence, and the interposition of providence together. Our course has been slow and sure, and to the regret of our enemies, a happy Republic have been established, which are to the unspeakable joy of our tried friends. Tell it, will the barbarous tribes beleive the report? "A FREE INDEPENDENT REPUBLIC; SELF-POISED AND ERECT" on the deluged shores of Africa,—unspeakable event.

I must say in conclusion, that it is necessary for us to be so arranged in our affairs, agreeable in manners, and attracing by our Godliness that the natives will find in this country, an asylum of rest an escape from oppression. Here, let them buy, and build, and plant.—let them spread and flourish, pursuing interest, religion, and happiness, in every mode of life, which enterprize can suggest and reason justify; and let them be exhonorated from the toils of their superstitious monarchy. At the present period, they cannot put their hands on the "Ark—they need be reformed, but we pray for the anticipated and glorious season, when we shall join in the grand procession, when the "holy ark" shall be carried from tribe to tribe, hamlet to hamlet, and because of its awfullness may it be hoped, the Devil's bush, the "gree-grees" and other superstitions, shall fall before it.

I Remain Yours Respectfully

For the Liberia Herald.

An extract of the account of the war expedition marched against the Kings of New Cesters and Trade Town, and the Spaniards residing in those territories, for the purpose of buying slaves, as given by J. C. Minor, Adjutant of the first Regiment.

Messrs Editors:—Sirs, according to the concluding paragraph of the first part of my account of the proceedings of the expedition to New Cesters and Trade Town, I now propose to lay a continuation of it before your readers.

Sabbath, March 11th: the religious ceremonies of the forenoon, which was held under a largre shady tree, (without the walls, of which I will speak in time and place,) being over, the men were marched back to their quarters. In the after part of the day a counsel of war was held at Head Quarters. The announcement of the decision was publicly made known only by the subsequent movement of the army. It may not be out of the way to mention just here, that a counsel of war was held at "Camp Roberts" on Friday, the day before we took up the line of march for the barracoon; the decision of which was carried into execution.

It was reported late in the afternoon on sabbath, while we were yet at the barracoon, that a huddle of the lurking enemy was seen on the opposite side of the river, on the slope of a hill fringed with small growth, interspersed with large trees. The General had a white flag hoisted upon the wall, in a conspicuous place, where they could not help seeing it, as an emblem of peace; or rather allowing them a chance of coming to terms, but they would not venture near.

We remained encamped within the walls of the barracoon until the next morning, without molesta- from the enemy; nor did they attack us while on our march there.

Monday morning, March 12th, General Lewis directed Captian D. B. Warner, who is expert in such matters, to take the dimensions of the mud wall, which had been reared for the notorious purpose of keeping in security those who were to be transported to foreign climes into slavery. The result of his measurement is as follows.

The wall which was made entirely of well tempered mud, was 442 feet long—228 feet wide—8 feet high and 2 feet thick, which encircled the ruins of a town which had occupied the space of more than two acres of ground. The process of making the wall seems to have been tedious and slow. The builders, after working the mud probably for hours at a time, would then take it and put it into a ridge of the proper thickness, and leave it for several days to dry; and so the work was carried on until the wall was completed. The wall was well calculated to defy the attacks of the African warriors. There was a gate at each end of the barracoon.

This once unhallowed place, dedicated to the nefarious traffick in slaves, by its monstrous predecessors, now dedicated by prayer and supplication to the Triune God; was named "Camp Lewis," in honor of our General. Now the gospel of the blessed Son of God have been preached there, in hopes that the future residents will be aiders in the promulgation of the gospel of peace, and be engaged in honorable trade.

The town had been composed of a large framed house, about 40 feet by 25, two stories high with an airy piazza on either side, overlooking the whole enclosure and the praire that surrounded it, which was said to have been well set off with costly furniture. Two large thatched houses had been built for the accomodation of the slaves. One of them was for the slaves to sleep in at night, and the other for them to sit and repose by day. On both sides of the enclosure, stood a row of the broken bodies of the once elegantly arranged houses, which had been occupied by the keepers of the slaves, and others who were constantly in attendance on the Spanish lords, with many other buildings.

The unoffending free men of the woods have been seized by surprise and torn away from their homes —their families and their all, and carried to the barraccon, sold for slaves, and forced by their atrocious keepers to sing the song of merriment, to please their Spanish lords: while on the other hand, those who would not sing to the delight of their sovereign, would be either severely whipped, or put to death.

This once famed establishment was situated not many yards from the river, near the mouth of which, we crossed when going thence, which in addition to the land route, it afforded a convenient water course, either for the transportation of slaves to the beach to be shipped off, or for the conveyance of merchandise to the factory. But, alas! those stately buildings have been consigned to the flames—and the towering walls that have so often struck terror to the hearts of the kings and princes, throughout that vast extent of country, have been raized to the ground; and now there remain no middle wall of partition; and nothing remains but a monument of ruins.

At the hour of 12 o'clock the army took up the line of march for the beach. We arrived at the beach early in the afternoon. On nearing the beach, the army was espied from the Espadon and Yorktown, two boats was immediately despatched from the steamer to communicate with General Lewis; President Roberts came on shore in one of them. The place where we arrived at, was some distance below the mouth of the river, where we started from, and there being no town there; for all the towns about that part had been reduced to ashes by the flames, and no very comfortable spot for pitching tents; consequently, the army was marched along down the beach, until we arrived at Peter's town,—a distance of some two or three miles, accompanied by the President. The General and his army were courteously received by Peter's brother, who stood next in authority, and who assinged the General a comfortable housefor his quarters, and then the whole town for the camping of his army; for Old Peter had fled for refuge in the foliage that shaded his native soil. Before he took his flight, he had a white flag hoisted at the entrance of his town, and left orders for not a gun to be fired at the Liberians, nor for them to be interfered with in any way by his people; though he had threatened previously to receive us in the contest of war; he being a Crooman, and have for many years been engaged in the slave trade, had determined to oppose every movement that had a tendendy to interfere with the traffick. The steamer and Yorktown weighed their anchors, and ran down and anchored off the town where we were. Some of the officers from the Espadon and Yorktown visted the shore, to learn of the success we had.

The men having been quartered; and the bustle having subsided for a moment; messengers were despatched from Head Quarters with communications to the Royal Princes Joe West and Wee. The messengers returned the same evening, but without satisfactory responces. Some further interchanges of communication was had, but it proved abortive. We remained encamped until Thursday. A counsel of war having been held:—and it having been determined to march to Joe West's town, and to learn the reason why implicit obedience could not be had to the majesty of our laws.

On Thursday the 15th, inst: about 11 o'clock A. M. our tents were struck, and we took up the line of march for Joe West's town. As we journeyed thither, we passed through several towns:—each town was deserted by its timid inhabitants; but at the entrance of (these were not barricaded towns,) each of them had a white flag flying, pronouncing the residents to be friends and not enemies. In orde to prove their real friendship, at one or two places the flag was nailed to the post. Finding no one to commune with, we passed on without destroying their habitations. Here and there marks of husbandry were to be seen, but the greater part of that country is an uncultivated waste. There in that dense woods the Leopard, the Tiger-cat the wild Bull and the wild Boar, and all the ravenous beasts that prowls the forest, finds a home; and with ease eludes the fowlers snare. The bore-constrictor have a place there too. While on the way we were frequently cheered by the warbling notes of the melodious songsters of the woods. Occasionally the deep hoarse voices of the Whor-whor and Do-do, could be heard from the dense and almost impenetrable forest. None of the feathered tribes were recognized as old acquaintances. We arrived at Joe West's town in the afternoon without having been molested by the way. On arriving there, and finding no one to oppose, we entered and took possesion of the town. The General gave orders for the men to be quartered; which was done, and a strong guard posted, for we were a good distance from the beach. On entering the town, there was a note fastened to a post under the truce flag that was flying at the gate, addressed to His Excellency, President Roberts. As far as I have been able to learn, the purport of the note was as follows:

"Sir, here is my town take possession of it, do as 'you please—eat all of my bullocks, rice, cassados 'and every thing else that you may find; but I beg 'that you will not burn my town.—I cannot come to 'see you—you have too many warriors around you."

Joe West could not associate the idea of seeing so many Liberians;—he entertained the most frightful abhorrence for the Congo boys who were with us. He had been told that the Congoes ate all the natives who fell victims in the contest when we first landed, which report he believed with all his heart, and therefore he would not venture to come to see the President, to make a compromise of matters.

The note spoken of was written by one Peter Harris, a native youth who was reared in the schools patronized by the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions; and one with whom much pains have been taken; yet, notwithstanding all this, he is a heathen. Shortly after the quartering of the soldiers, a messenger arrived from the place of Joe West's concealment, bearing a flag of truce, with a despatch for Head Quarters.—Several messengers were sent to and from the places necessary to be communicated with.

We remained in quiet possession of the town until Friday night the 16th: when the whole army was put in motion. It having been determined by the council of war held during that day, to send a detachment of 100 men to Poto-reco's, the place where Donfrancisco and his suit had selected for refuge. The island of Poto-reco, says our informant, derived its name from an old Crooman who lived there, whom the Spaniards named "Poto-reco," in honor, I suppose, of some favorite whim of theirs, because he had always given his time and influence to the slave trade. According to the determination, about 9 o'clock at night the brigade was formed, and the requisite number of men detailed therefrom. They where formed into two divisions—the first under the command of Major D. B. Brown, and the second under Major S. A. Benson.—General Lewis headed the detachment and left for the island at half past 9 o'clock.

It may not be a miss to mention that Joe West's town was surrounded by a barricade built of huge logs, sufficient to defy the sudden surprise of the African warriors. The midnight warriors might arrive there, and at the crowing of the cock, as the custom of the African is, to break forth with unearthly yells, to surprise the inmates and cause them to become an easy prey; but alas! it would not be so at Joe West's barricade; for those who might attempt to force their passage through, would have been disputed inch to inch, and themselves become captives to captivity.

As soon as the detachment left, by the direction of the President, the gates of the barricade were opened, and the field pieces placed at the principal gates, and the men stationed around on the inside of the barricade. This was done in case the natives attempted to attack the barricade, with the idea of overpowering and taking prisoners, those who were left in charge of it, that they might themselves be surprised and taken prisoners. The understanding was, that if the General met the enemy either on the way, or at Poto-reco's, and they were too powerful for him, he was to have had a sky-rocket sent up, as a signal for assistance. A strict watch was kept throughout the remainder of the night, in the direction the detachment went, for the stary signal but it did not appear. In the morning the men resumed their quarters, anxiously awaiting to learn the result of the detachment.

On Saturday the 17th the detachment returned about 12 oclock, in fine spirits, bringing with them a horse, a cow, a large bell, some muskets, a quantity of rice, and some other articles of value, as the result of their enterprise. Of course the General reported the whole of his proceeding to the President for his concurrence. The horse had been kept by the Spaniard to take his morning and afternoon ride on, to view his self-supposed vast domains.

As I did not go with the detachment, I will give some of the particulars as they were given to me by one of the party.

The detachment left the camp about 9 o'clock on Friday night: and our informant says that they arrived on the banks of the river opposite to the island of Poto-reco, about 3 o'clock in the morning; judging from the way they travelled, although the pathway was a zigzag up and down hill one, interspersed with quagmires, that the distance is about 18 miles. They arrived and remained silent for a short time without the notice of watchful keepers of the island; during which time their plans were concerted: nor was their arrival apprehended until one of the party swam across the river after a large canoe to cross the men over to the island if possible, without arousing the islanders. But this could not be done; for no sooner had the bold adventurer struck the opposite shore, and laid hold of the canoe, than the timid occupants became alarmed and apprehensive that danger was near. The adventurer succeeded in eluding the watchmen's sight, and swam back to his company. Remaining a while, all things became quiet; the watchmen having hailed several times and no one responded, nor was the signs of any one being near heard, therefore the islanders comforted themselves with the idea that it was some of the finny tribe playing about: for they had judged it was impossible for the Liberian warriors to have reached that secluded spot. A second attempt was made by the adventurer and he succeeded in getting the canoe and brought it to his party. The men got in it immediately and started for the other shore; when lo! to the view of the astonished islanders, appeared a huge canoe filled with Liberian war-men making for their shore. They instantly cried out war is coming: and in a moment the whole island was in consternation:—a fire was opened upon them by the men in the canoe, and kept up for some minutes. The enemy fled for safety:—one took to the bushes—others to the stream of water. The captors succeeded in capturing the effects of the islanders without sustaining any injury or the loss of a single man. This is somewhat astonishing:—it is very seldom, if it ever was done that a march through an unknown waste, as was this, and against an almost unkown tribe, without sustaining some injuries:—but it is certainly true—too true to be made a joke of:—believe it who will—deny it who can. Amidst the shouts of the affrighted islanders, one was heard to say from the top of his voice; "Wee, me Wee." Now Prince Wee of the New Cess country, is the one who sold the whole of that territory to the Liberian Government, and it was supposed that this was the same individual, thus playing the left-handed game.

The captors destroyed at that island, 18 punchions of rum—a great quantity of costly furniture and then consigned the buildings to the flames —tons of salt, rice, condage &c. &c. which was soon reduced to ashes. They returned to the camp in triumph. The island was called "Brown's," in honor Major D. B. Brown, who had charge of the assaulting party—Major Benson was associated with him and gallantly seconded the plans of his leader.

On Sabbath the 18th, the Spaniard who had been living at Trade Town, made his appearance at the gate, accompanied by some messengers from Prince Bouyar;—their arrival at the gate was announced by the sentinel:—admittance was granted, and they were conducted to Head Quarters. He was interrogated by the President and General Lewis, through interpreters, to which he endeavored to give satisfactory answers.

The Spaniard said in the course of his remarks, that if he had been in any way, the cause of giving the President and the army so much trouble, that he was sorroy for it:—he said also, that as soon as heard that the General and his army was in the country, he wanted to come to them, and give himself up to him from the fact that he believed he would be safer among the Liberians than he was among the natives;—but, that Prince Bouyar, of Trade Town prevented him, because he had there at the time, a large quantity of goods, which had been left in his charge by his employer, who had taken passage on board of some vessel, which Prince was afraid would be captured by the army:—therefore he had him put into a house; and in order to make surity doubly sure, he had a watch set at the door of the house where the Spaniard was.—The Spaniard also said, that if he could write English, he would have written to the President, and acquainted him of his condition:—but he could not, and therefore was obliged to wait the motion of his Princely protecter. The interrogating remarks having been gone through with, the Spaniard was delivered to the officer of the day for safe keeping.

It was not until after the return of the detachment from Poto-reco's, that Prince would allow the Spaniard to come to our camp, or even communicate with the President. He having been convinced by the visit made to that place, that a march to his Princely palace, stood next in order, and that destruction was sure.—And finding that his threats were of no avail, and that he could no longer afford protection to his slaver—his subjects and his country, in order to preserve his town and palace from the conflagration which it was doomed to, he sent messengers to our camp, to effect a compromise at Head Quarters:—which compromise resulted in part in the understanding that Prince was to deliver to the President the next morning at Trade Town all the slaves that were there.—Other matters were to be settled at the meeting place. The Spaniard's goods were not called in question; because the President had previously told one of Prince's messengers that he did not want the goods; —but the slaves.

In the forenoon of Sabbath we listened to a very fine discourse delivered by Captain D. B. Warner.

Joe West's barricaded town consisted of about 140 well constructed houses. Some of them were finished with imitation of civilized taste:—with well arranged apartments, piazzas, &c.

During our encampment at Joe West's town, some six or eight of the slaves escaped from the custody of their unfortunate kidnappers, wended their way to our camp, and sued for protection:—admittance was granted, and the arm of protection extended. One of them was an intelligent looking youth, who had been brought from Elmina, in a clandestine manner,—who also went with Peter Harris, as one of the conductors of the detachment to Poto-reco's.

The religious exercises at the camp, being over, the brigade was formed, and we took up the line of march for Old Peter's town, at the beach, leaving Joe West's town as we found it, where we arrived that afternoon, and quartered. On our arrival we found the Steamer and Yorktown, riding at anchor. They communicated with the President, and some of the officers visited the shore.

For the Liberia Herald.

Messrs Editors:—Another anniverreay of the national existence of this young Republic has taken place. Yesterday, the 26th instant, the glorious morn.' of the natal day that gave birth to a free and independent state in the bosom of dark and benighted Africa; was usherd in with the usual signs of memorable events viz: the thundering of the great guns at Central Fort Hill.

As the gray light of the morning slowly chase away the gloomy darkness of the night, the weather gave every sign of a real rainy day, which has a double meaning in this tropical country. Thick and dark clouds which obscured the glorious face of the "king" of day," and were emptying themselves of the vast reservoir of water with which they seemed to be so bountifully supplied at this season of the year, but ere the time arrived for the display of our national banner with its beaming STAR of Hope, the face of nature exchanged its gloomy aspect for the joyfull smiles of the "new married bride," As the sun would participate with a nation's joy As our lone star at 8 o'clock was unfurled to float on freedom's air, gentle zephyrs kissed the sweet emblem of Africa's hope and peace, the placid heavens and the bright shining sun smiled at the sight.,

At 10 o'clock the troops under the command of our gallant Col. B. P Yates assembled in Broad Street from whence they marched to the government square and then to Central Fort Hill, and made ready for firing the national salute. At half past twelve o'clock, the time appointed, 21 peals of sulphurous thunder told the tale that a "Negro Republic" had existed for two years and still survives.

The troops then returned to the government square and escorted His Excellency President Roberts and suite to the M. E. Church, where we were entertained some two hours, listening with rapturous enthusiasm to the eloquent oration of R. L. Stryker Esq., and the elegant performance of the Monrovia choir, under the direction of F. Payne Esq. We can truly say we had "a feast of fat things." Our ladies and gentlemen composing the choir acquitted themselves with the greatest credit.

"What has been done may be done. The performance of our friend, Mr. L. ought to inspire in the heart of every young person in this Republic, new and unconquerable desires to imitate his noble example. The writer of this article, would willingly enter into a few historical details of the eloqnent oration of yesterday, if it was not for the fear of exciting insidious feelings; but let it suffice to say that the oration was written in a pure chaste style, and delivered with power and effect: all were pleased; yea, enrapturously delighted; if we are allowed to judge from the enthusiastic commendation which involuntarily burst forth from every heart.

The day closed with a public tea at the Government House, given by John W. Barbour, Esq.

A LADY.

Monrovia, July 27th, 1849.

VALUE OF HONOR ON A DEATH BED.

A distinguished character had an extraordinary mark of distinction and honor sent him by his prince, as he lay on his death bed. "Alas!" said he, looking coldly upon it, "this is a mighty fine thing in this country; but I am just a going to a country where it will be of no service to me."

FACILITY OF COMPOSITION.—Gibbon says of his famous history of the "Decline and Fall"—I will add two facts which have seldom occurred in the compositon of six, or at least of five quartos. My first rough manuscript, without any intermediate copy has been sent to the press. Second.—Not a sheet has been seen by any human eyes excepting those of the author and the printer, the faults and merits are exclusively my own.

MONROVIA LIBERIA, JULY 27, 1849

The Twenty Sixth.

Our space will only permit us to say, that the celebration of our national day went off in fine style. The uniform companies under Col: Yates paraded opposite the Government house at 12 of the clock, and after the firing of a national salute—received and escorted the President and other civil officers to the M. E. Church, where religious services were performed—and to hear an oration. Every thing went off in grand style—the religious exercises were to our mind truly appropriate and interesting. The orator, Mr. Richard L. Stryker, performed his duty to the admiration of every one—his address was composed with taste, and a kind of excellence, which, with the flowing eloquence it was delivered, facinated the hearts and minds of all who were present.

As usual, the day ended with a fine supper served up under the direction of Mr. John W. Barbour.

Immigrants;

The bark "Huma," chartered by the American Colonization Society, has arrived at Sinoe, from Savannah, Georgia, and landed her immigrants. The number landed we hear, exceeds 180.

Hon: J. W. Prout.—It is seldom that we are called upon to record a death, so sudden and lamentable as that of our worthy citizen, Jacob W. Prout. The announcement of his death peralized every mind. Half an hour before the sad tidings reached our town, the deceased was in excellent health—bouyant spirits, and in lively conversation with several of his friends and acquaintances.

On the morning of the 18th, inst: the deceased was called upon to make a medical visit to a sick gentleman on board the bark "Foam," then at anchor in our roadstead—(for he was a practitioner of medicine, and had been in successful practice for many years), and to obey this call of humanity, he left the wharf in a boat belonging to the Foam, and was drowned in attempting to cross the bar, which was on that morning unusually rough. We had been on terms of intimacy with the deceased for more than 20 years—indeed, ever since he arrived in Liberia from the U. S.—he had filled many important public offices with credit—was gentlemanly in his deportment—interesting in society, and one of Liberia's favored sons.

Mr. Prout was a member of the Liberia Senate, he had been elected to serve an unexpired term of four years, which would entitle him to a seat in that body until December 1851.

President Roberts has appointed Nugent M. Hicks Register for the County of Montserrado, in place of Jacob W. Prout, deceased.

Messrs Editors:—Sirs supposing you capable of answering all intricate questions; please inform the public through your columns, as they are anxious to know, what has become of the "Liberia Soap Manufactory?" The company avowed their purpose of supplying this market with this essential article, at a "reduced price," and thereby keep in the Republic large sums which have been "expended" for soap. My object for requesting the solving of this problem, is, that the article is greatly in demand, and as their house have been a joint company, who agreed to furnish it at a reduced price, and thereby prevent a continued going abroad of funds that might through the assiduousness of this company, remain in Liberia; and feeling interested for the general commercial political benefit of our country. I therefore question your dictatorial honors respecting it, as in your paper appeared the high and well toned notice. This is merely an inquiry hoping to obtain an answer through the columns of the Herald.

Yours Respectfully.

ENQUIRER.

Passing over all that "Enquirer" says as to our ability to "answer all intricate questions"—and the pleasantry he indulges in styling us "dictatorial honors," which we suppose he penned while in a merry humor.—We come to that part which refers to the "Liberia Soap Manufactory." We published the notice announcing the formation of a company for the manufactory of soap, and did so with great pleasure, believing then, as we do now, that a business of more general benefit could not be entered into. It was a matter of deep regret, when it was known that the company had ceased to exist; and up to this time we are ignorant of the causes which led to its annihilation. Surely, no one will pretend to say, that the business could not be made profitable—the most limited calculator knows better. In soap making as well as in other branches of industry, it requires attention and close application to the business, to make it profitable.

We have heard it intimated that the manufactory, will, again commence operations—that it was only suspended, "for causes, over which the manufacturers had no control"—We hope this is true, and that the people of Liberia will soon hear the gratifying intelligence, that the soap manufactory has recommenced business.—HERALD.

Messrs Editors:—Sirs, I beg leave to publish a few remarks through the medium of your excellent periodical. Hearing frequent and anxious queries respecting the ultimate result of the last election, and being anxious myself to elicit something satisfactory to the public mind. I have concluded to make my views public, hoping some person more competant will give us right-views if we are wrong.

The subject resovels itself into different heads which I will try to treat in their proper place,—and,

1*st*: Query; whose fault was it that the returns came in unconstitutionally? In order to get at this difficulty which lies in the very threshhold of our argument we will have to commence at the foundation. Our constitution ordains that each branch of the Legislature shall be the judges of their own elections; and that the returns of all elections shall be made to the Secty of State, who is to count the tickets of the Senators and Representatives, and notify those who are apparently elected, they are to meet and organize themselves accordingly; Senators & Representatives. In our last election there was but one legal return made, and hence the Secretary of State cannot count those tickets which were never sent to him. He must according to the law cite those with the highest number of tickets, and therefore throw into the shade some of the candidates whose number of votes were they retuned would entitle them to a seat in the Representative Hall. Now some hold it to be disfranchising those citizens of their constitutional rights to leave them out of the legislature when the majority of their fellow citizens elected them.

The framers of our constitution in order to prevent confusion and misconstruction named the day of the election, and knowing the vacilating disposition of some legislatures, they left nothing concerning election of great moment out of the constitution. They made no proviso for blunders in the returns, nor indeed should there be any; they like wise masterbuilders endeavored to lay the foundation deep, strong and durable, so that future generations in centuries to come may continue to add to this great pyramid, whose broad base covers the whole extent of this Republic until their concentrated efforts, they cause its refreshing shadow to cover the whole of Western Africa, resuscitating the thousand of its tribes, and incorporating them into this same pyramid. It was therefore right for them to leave no flaws, to have it as perfect as imperfect humanity could make it. Their work is done and WELL DONE. Therefore under these views it is impossible to have the election run over.

Others suppose that for an election to the decided by one return which is the only constitutional one would be in effect saying those candidates who would have been entitled to a seat had their tickets been sent in, are eligible, yet they are not competent, and therefore in order to keep them out, the constitution is rigorously adhered to. This opinion makes me doubt in reality the competancy of the man who contends for his seat in the face of his country's supreme law. If for the sake of a biennial seat in the Legislature I am willing to break through constitutional bars, I am certainly not fit for legislating on the same instrument that I have trampled under foot; on the other hand, if I contend for the seat ignorantly under the meredian blaze of the constitution, then I am incapacitated from ignorance. I cannot for my life see why a man should think his privilege contracted when his constitution lays down one course, and quite a contrary one is pursued in attaining to that privilege. But it was not the candidates fault I confess.—I know that the sovereign will of a major part of the people have solemnly declared at the polls that these men are their choice, and such a declaration should be heard, when, it is sent in constitutionally it will be heard, and regarded when legally reported. Here you see the great bull: have been hughing out suitable stones for this superstucture but have only sent the dimensions without the materials, the work must go on, and if materials are not sent when the people declare they must be, those on the spot when equally as good, must be worked into the vacancy or else the major part would fall. Bring your materials to the spot by having such conveyance directors, as know and will attend to their duty. No fellow citizens it is not disfranchising, but an error committed by those who should have sent your views in legally.

The framers of the constitution left a small part of the arrangements for the elections to be made by the legislature.

Accordingly the legislature in January '48 at their first session, enacted that for each town and settlement, one judge and two clerks should be appointed by the monthly court setting, next proceeding the election, (I quote form memory as I havent the constitution and laws by me) who were to meet on the constitutional day at such an hour etc etc. The court in their prudence appointed all the judges (I speak of this county) from among the conservators of peace, I am not aware in the absence of the laws whether the legislature limited the judgeship of elections to magistrates I am of the opinion not tho'. However, the court could have done better in all the appointments with a very few exceptions. It is evident that the court supposed no one should know more of the constitution and laws, as directed to be printed by the legislatue in '48, than these sage elders of the people, in asmuch as each one was entitled to a copy at the Government expense. Still the judges with all this light before them will not own that they are to be blamed. Some fault the sheriff whose duty is as plain as a sunbeam: he is to organize the election, keep order, and carry in the returns to the state department after the judge has sealed them. It is therefore none of his fault, he has faithfuly performed what was commited to him. Others childishly complain that the court did not instruct them how to make their returns mirabile dictu. The court made up of magistrates, to presume to instruct their brother magistrates, who perhaps the next month would set in the capacity of this same court and Probate a contested will of some deceased citizen, whose property is worth thousands, to receive instructions from their equals, on so plain a law as that of election, composed in plain english, and contained in a dozon lines! no.—NO: this is a vain subterfuge behind which you can only thrust your head, when like the simple ostrich, your whole person is exposed to view. DOES ANY ASK WHOSE FAULT WAS IT?—Then ask the legislature who appointed only one jugde of the Presidential election, ask the judge who presided in the election, and let them deny if they can, their egregrious error, and if they confess that they done it through ignorance, then we will contend that they, being of the Supra vulgar family; and should hold no such commissions. The idiea of such nondescript officers setting in judgement nearley every day, week, and month, upon their fellow citizens is indurable and were it not for the hope of a change at our next legislature one could not keep in. At that time we beseech the executive to appoint all the offices from among those citizens that can read understandingly, which we think is sine qua non in a justice of the peace. Now fellow citizens I propose.

2*nd*: Only that as the error cannot be remedied as you would wish, that is as it stand it must be governed by squire Moore's legal returns, and therefore leave out some of your candidates, who were elected but not returned, as they cannot sit without infringing the Supreme law, to which they would have to take oath to preserve sacred, the only alternative is to give away to reason and justice, right is just, and ought to have precedence. It will be infinitely better for a few to suffer now than millions hereafter, better never be a legislator than to have this superstructure rent asunder, and crushed up into a hundred little anarchies: no let it be constitutionally done, or none at all—or else, let all the candidates withdraw their names leaving the House of Representatives vacant. Then the executive can come to your assistance, Proclaiming the House vacant and order an election for filling vacancies. I can conceive no other method for solving this knotty problem satisfactory to the people, and at the same time keep within bounds of the constitution, otherwise he will be compelled to see that the state department act constitutionally and leave some elected candidates out.

I have already lengthened this communication without saying all I wished; I will reserve what I have to say on office seekers whose desideratum is the love of honor and money. To such I shall have a few words to say in future, should I be spared. I mean those who are positively in competant for these offices, in these times which demand the best talents we can command. Please ask these ignorant magistrates to learn their duties or resign. Understand me one and all I have said and say again there are few exceptions who are like oasis among the magistrates.

Yours &c &c.

POETRY.

From the Examiner.

The following lines were written on reading the Poem, "The Wants of Man," by the Hon. John Quincy Adams, when it was first published, in 1841! They have never seen the light, and if the Editor of the Examiner chooses to give them a place in his interesting and valuable paper, they are at his service.

March 21st. 1848. F. W. H.

"I want the voice of honest praise
To follow me behind,
And to be thought in future days,
The friend of human kind:
That after-ages as they rise,
Exulting may proclaim,
In choral union to the skies,
Their blessings on my name."

J. Q. ADAMS.

Then, patriot, pure and uncorrupt!
In a degenerate age,
This wish, at least, shall be fulfill'd
For bright on history's page,
In glorious companionship
With those who lov'd their race,
And sought its highest happiness,
Thy name shall have a place.

Give to the miser gems and gold!
Wine to the bacchanal;
For pleasure's giddy votary
Light up the festive hall!
Let him who toils for place and power,
Attain his loftiest aim;
What are they all, when weigh'd against
Thy bright untarnish'd fame?

I look far down the stream of time,
Our land, the young, the free,
Hath long been cover'd with the moss
Of hoar antiquity.
No deep, dark forest waves in pride
Through all the wide domain,
But crowded cities skirt the hills,
And fill the laughing plain.

And hurrying on with eager step,
The thronging millions pass,
Fleeting as shadows o'er the sun,
Or dew drops on the grass:
O, er all the boundless continent
Like leaves in autumn shed,
The wise, the great are laid to rest
With the forgotten dead.

And many a name that once was borne
On fame's loud trump afar,
Comes dimly up, as from a cloud
Beams feebly forth, a star.
But thine, a halo pure and bright
Encircles it around;
With double immortality
Thy virtuous life is crown'd.

A Tale of the Carbonari.

(FROM THE GERMAN CHRISTMAS EVE.)

A French officer, a man of ardent but gloomy temperament, formerly attached to the staff of General Moreau, had quitted the service after the court-martial instituted at Paris against his General. He had not been personally compromised in the conspiracy, but being strongly tainted with republican principles, he left France at the first foundation of Napoleon's empire, and went on his travels; making no secret however of his abhorrence for the chiefs of an absolute government, and glorying in the name of a malcontent.

After having traveled for some years in Greece, Germany, and Italy, this officer (whom I shall call Colonel D'Aguesseau) established himself in a village of the Venetian Tyrol, where his moderate fortune and quiet simple habits enabled him to enjoy a life of retirement.

He had little or no communication with his neighbors, but gave himself up to the study of natural history, and to other scientific pursuits; casting from his mind the stormy subject of politics, and in fact living a life of literary leisure.

About this time the secret society of the Carbonari was making rapid progress in the Italian States, even to the shores of the Adriatic. Many inhabitants of the village in which Colonel D'Augesseau had fixed his habitation, was zealous members of this secret association, and longed to enrol their taciturn and mysterious neighbor among their body; being fully aware of the French officer's implacable enmity to the imperial government, and to "the great distroyer of liberty," as he called him, who was at its head.

These crafty Italians accordingly devised a plan by which, without arousing the suspicions of the Colonel, they might effect their object, and for that purpose they agreed to form a hunting party, which was accidentally, as it were, to fall in with D'Aguesseau in some of his solitary rambles.

The project was successful, the meeting was effected, and little inducement was necessary to draw out the opinions of the French officer, when he found himself surrounded by the worshippers of liberty, which was still his own idol, whose magic name still thrilled through his heart; and made the memories of youth spring up freshly before him.

This meeting was followed by others whence ensued the desired and expected result. The melancholy recluse now felt his bosom glow with the delightful sensation of brotherhood in sentiment. The next step was to accede to the proposal of the now confessed Carbonari to join their ranks; and he did so with an enthusiastic pleasure that had long been for him an unknown feeling.

The symbols of the order, with the tokens of brotherhood, were soon after taken. They consisted in an engagement to be at any moment at the disposal of the society, and to die rather than betray their secret.

From the time of his affiliation, the Colonel's outward mode of life; continued as usual, but he secretly awaited the moment of action, when he should be called upon by his brethren to assist personally in the great cause.

The enterprising character of the Venetian Tyrol offers a strong contrast to the indolent nature of their countrymen in Southern Italy. Like the latter, however, they are extremely suspicious, and fearfully revengeful.

Soon after D'Aguesseau had been thoroughly enrolled in the society, some of its members began to look on him as a dangerous person, and one likely to betray their secret. Many affirmed that the fact of his being a Frenchman was alone sufficient to make him an object of suspicion and, as the police were known to be more on the alert than usual in their efforts to unmask the conspirators, they maintained that it behoved them to put the new member to other tests besides the simple formalities of taking the oath.

To this requisition those members who had introduced the Colonel and answered for his fidelity made no objections, and at once acceded, being firmly convinced that his sincerity would stand any trial.

Matters were in this state when news arrived of the defeat and sufferings of the French army at Leipsic; and this served to redouble the ardor of the Carbonari.

Three months had now passed since the affiliation of the French officer; and, as he had heard nothing from his brethren in the interval, D'Aguesseau was beginning to conclude that the duties expected from him must be very trifling indeed.

One day, however, he received a mysterious letter, requiring him to repair on the following night, to a neighboring wood. He was to be at a certain spot at midnight, armed only with his sword, and to remain there until he should receive further orders.

The Colonel obeyed these commands of the letter; was exact to the hour; and remained at the spot until daybreak; when, concluding from his not having seen any one or heard anything particular, that a test of obedience and patience was alone the object, he returned home. This opinion was confirmed, when a few days after, a similar mysterious communication and order were followed, on his obedience; by the like result.

A third command, after another short lapse of time, was issued, and obeyed by the Colonel; whose perseverance was still not exhausted, after many hours' attendance at the appointed spot.

At length just before daybreak, D'Aguesseau could distinguish in the distance the clashing of weapons, and a sudden impulse seized him to advance in the direction from whence the sounds, proceeded. They appeared to become fainter as he approached; and at last, by the struggling drawn, he could perceive that fearful crime, even that of murder, had been committed. A man lay before him bathed in blood, and the Colonel saw, with horror, that two murderous-looking ruffians stood over the body! On advancing, however, with the boldness of his nature, to seized the assassins, they darted away with the speed of lightning, thro' the thick foliage, and were soon lost to pursuit.

The Colonel immediately returning, stooped down to examine the body, and found that the unforunate victim still breathed. In raising him in his arms, however, four gens-d'armes appeared on the spot, and the dying man, making a last effort to speak muttered some words as to his assassin, pointing out D'Aguesseau, as he spoke, to the notice of the officers of justice. Immediately two of the gens-d'armes seized the Colonel, and bound his arms: the other two supporting the apparently breathless corpse of the murdered man.

D'Aguesseau was now hurried on to a distant village where he was conducted to the house of a magistrate, and, after undergoing a private examination was immediately sent to prison.

Pitiable, indeed, was the situation of this brave man, thus wrongfully suspected, and deprived of liberty, in a strange country, without friends, and not daring to appeal to his own government, on account of his well-know opinions. Appearances were all against him, and apparently corroborated by the testimony of the dying man.

D'Aguesseau's firm soul shrunk not, however, from looking into his horrible and hopeless position; and he had already resigned him to meet, as a man and a Christian, a horrible but undeserved fate.

Meanwhile a special commission had been assembled before which the Colonel was commanded to appear; but he could only repeat the testimony which he had advanced before the first magistrate, and which had failed in bringing to his mind a conviction of the deponent's innocence.

Upon the Colonel's solemn asseveration of total ignorance of the muder he was asked how it occurred that he was found armed, at midnight, and in a lonely wood? D'Aguesseau could only answer that he was conscious appearances were against him, but that he could not explain the circumstances that had led to his being in such a situation at such an hour.

His mystery and silence on this point appeared to condemn him irrevocably in the minds of the commissioners, who unanimously found him guilty, and passed sentence of death on him; remanding him to prison untill the execution of the sentence, was to be carried into effect in a few hours, justice being rather summary at that period in these parts. A priest was introduced into the convict's cell, whom the Colonel received politely, but to whom he declined confessing.

At length the executioner entered to lead the prisoner to the scaffold; but, on the way to the place of execution the mournful procession was stopped by a Colonel of gensd'armerie.

This man was known by the name of Boizart, and was the terror of all evil doers in Italy. He was a person whom every one knew by repute. His name was familiar to Colonel D'Aguesseau, but he had never before seen the person who bore it.

Boizart, having commanded a halt, took the prisoner aside into a private apartment of the court-house, near which he had met the train, and thus addressed him:

"You see, my friend, that everything is against you, no one can save you from merited death but myself. I will do it, but upon one condition. I know you are one of the Carbonari. Name your brother-conspirators, and the nature of their dark machinations, and your life shall be spared, as the reward of your information."

"I will not!" answered D'Aguesseau, firmly.

"Consider well: life is precious!"

"I will not!" repeated the Frenchman. "Lead me on to the place of punishment while I am still an innocent man!"

The procession again moved on; they reached the scafford, where the executioner was already prepared for his fatal office. D'Aguesseau mounted the ladder with a firm step Colonel Boizart following, imploring him to save his own life, by revealing even the names of his brethren without their secrets; but he was inexorable.

"Never!" said the brave man, kneeling down to receive the death-blow.

Immediately the scene changed! Boizart, the executioner, the gens-d'armes, the priest, the spectators, all advanced, admiration in their hearts, acclamations on their lips. They bore the hero in triumph from the scaffold, all having played their parts to perfection! The assassins of the wood, their victim, the judge, and all, having been a deception! The most suspicious among the Carbonari were now convinced that there existed at least one man and be a brother, who carried his sense of honor to the highest pitch, and esteemed life itself of no value, in comparison with the sacredness of an oath!

NATURAL LAWS ARE UNBENDING,

AND DEMAND TO BE KNOWN AND OBEYED.

Existing politics show, halting between the notions of the enlightened and unenlightened man, leaves us only puzzled. We know not how to regard the phenomena of the world, and our own relation to them. Many sink into a kind of fatalism which paralyzes the faculties; others ascend into fantastic dreams which exercise a not less baleful influence. Some of the disastrous consequences are sufficiently conspicuous; but many more blaze and expend themselves in privacy, known only in the circles where they have been so fatally felt. The entire conduct of a large portion of society; and more or less that of nearly all the rest, is regulated, or rather cast loose from regulation, by the want of definite ideas regarding that fixed plan of the divine working, on the study and observance of which it is evident that our secular happiness mainly altogether depends. Even acute men of the world are daily seen acting to their own manifest injury, in consequence of their utter ignorance of any system of law pressing around them. With the great bulk of society life is merely a following of a few inferior instincts, with a perfect blindness to consequences. By individuals and by communities alike, physical and moral evils are patiently endured, which a true knowledge of the system of Providence would cause to be instantly redressed. Daily health and comfort, life itself, are sacrificed through the want of this knowledge. It is not in the heyday of cheerful, active and prosperous existence, or when we look only to the things which constitute the greatness of nations, that we become sensible of this truth. We must seek for convictions on the subject, beside the death beds of amiable children, destroyed through ignorance of the rules of health, and hung over by parents who feel that life is nothing to them when those dear beings are no more; in the despairing commiseration of the selfish who have acted through long years on the supposition that the social affections could be starved hurtlessly; in the pestilences ravaging the haunts of poverty, and revenging in spreading contagion, the neglect by the rich of the hopelessness of their penury on diseased stricken neighbors; in the canker of discontent and crime, which eats into the vitals of a nation in consequence of an unfraternizing absence of acquisitiveness by those possessing the most ready natural resources and standing in the most fortunate positions; in the ruin and desolation and misery which follow wars entered upon in the wantonness of pride, greed, and vanity. Doubtless were the idea vividly present in the minds of all men, that from laws of unswerving regularity every act, thought, and emotion of theirs helps to determine their own future, both by its direct effects on their fate, and its reflection from the future of their fellow creatures, and this without any possibility of reprieve or extenuation, we should see society presenting a different aspect from what it does, the sum of human misery vastly diminished, and that of the general happiness as much increased. GETTING OVER HARD NAMES

An old toothless clergyman used to be much bothered by the lesson in which the names of Shadrach, Meschach, and Abednego so often occur. At last he adopted the expedient of calling them "these three gentlemen;" reading thus: 'So the king commanded these three gentlemen to be cast into the fiery furnace."—The Examiner.

the remembered and the forgotten

On an evening not long past, I had been reading one of those faultless poems, which Pope has dedicated to St John, and which Time has dedicated to Eternity. I was pondering more especially upon the verses which conclude the essay and upon the strange reversal which their prophecy has met with. The poet, in a transport of admiration and love pours out, with a sincerity which is proved by their ardour, these glowing verses to the most admired man of his age:

"O! while along the stream of time thy name
Expanded flies and gathers all its fame

LIBERIA HERALD.

THE MODEL GENIUS.

There is, generally, in every family a Wonderful Child. It comes in with the dessert. It is an infant Babbage's machine. One penny on the head, and off it goes. Its extraordinary powers of recollection are almost 'too painful (as the guests too frequently experience) for recital.' It runs through Paradise Lost in a minute. Dr Watts, Wordsworth, Grace Cowper, are all stowed away in its little head. You can have any piece of poetry you like by asking for it. It plays the piano also. You must hear the Battle of Prague. It does the 'shrieks of the wounded' so naturally; and, before you go, do listen to its singing. But —run and change your dress first, my dear. Thus ends the first act of the Wonderful Child. Ten minutes are supposed to elapse—which is a good half hour, when a child changes its frock—and enter La Vivandiere. Why, I do declare! it's the very picture of Miss Lind—and, as I live too, it plays the piano! The likeness is perfect. How prettily it sings!—why, it's the Rataplan, Well! I'm sure, its quite astonishing in a child so young "How old is it, pray?" "Only seven next Michaelmas!" "You don't say so? On my word, it's perfectly marvelous! Will you sing it again, my dear?" And once more is the Rataplan drummed through only more loudly than before; when nurse appears, most opportunely, to take the clever little darling to bed.

End of act the second. The gentlemen dawdle up stairs to coffee, when there is the pretty little dear again! Its fond mamma could n't let it go to bed without its showing the company how nicely she dances the Cachuca. It goes through this very juvenile dance, castanets and all, in a style that elicits one unanimous conviction that Taglioni would n't have done it better.

Then its drawings are displayed, and a wonderful portrait of papa, it took when he was asleep, with the spectacles on his forehead. Well! you never saw anything like it. But this is not all. Just have the kindness to ask it what is the cube root of seventeen? Positively you could n't unless you had heard it "Only seven years old, did you say? "Not quite—only seven next Michaelmas." "On your word—it's a perfect marvel!" It can tell you, also, what gunpowder is made of! and pray look at the wonderful foliage of that tree —it did every leaf of its little self—is n't it extraordinary, now?

At last the Wonderful Child has exhausted it's Admirable Crichton stock of talents: but before the company retire it must recite a few lines of Young's Night Thoughts, and it will be sure to mind its stops. There—that will do —it's a dear good girl—and now it can go to bed, and be sure to get up the first thing, or else it will never learn its pretty lessons in time. The nurse carries it off, and all the company are in loud ecstacies about its extraordinary gifts, till they leave the house; then, oddly enough, they all unanimously confess to one another that that child of Mrs. Peacock's is a most "horrible bore."

These extraordinary gifts, however, which are most hospitably received one minute, and most harshly turned out of doors the next, are acquired but by the very hardest study, as the sickly appearance of the Wonderful Child too plainly betrays. Its cheeks are pale, its lips almost colorless, and its sunken eyes never shows the smallest ray of mental light at the recital of the grandest sentiments, but main tains one dead stare all the while, as if the book were before it, and it was afraid of missing the next line; the same when it is dancing or singing the gayest songs. It laughs even by rote In fact, there is no childhood about it; it is a living mummy, bound hand and foot in rolls of precocious accomplishments. It is very clever and very unnatural.

The Wonderful Child, as it gets older, grows, even more wonderful. It knows Latin, is learning Greek, sings French, German, Italian Swedish, Swiss—draws, paints, composes writes verses, and studies astrology out of the garret window; when one cold chilly night it takes cold, is confined to its bed, and dies very suddenly. Its parents are quite heart stricken, but they staunch their tears with the dry comfort that the 'little thing was far too clever to live." No one likes to tell them that if they had not made it so very clever, it might porbably, be living at the present time. They preserve its daubs and scratches and rhymes, and have a cast of its wonderful head taken, little dreaming that it was the weight of that wonderful head that bent its slender body to the earth.

This is too often the fate of the Model Genius. How many clever children have been mortally wounded, if the truth were known, at that Battle of Prague!—Vincennees Zette.

OLD AND YOUNG MEN.

BY MRS. S. MOWBRAY.

"Our years a fruitless race without a prize,
Too many, yet too few to make us wise;
To say the truth, though in its early prime,
And when unstained with any grosser crime,
Youth has a sprightliness and fire to boast,
That in the valley of decline are lost;
The fruits of ageless fair, are yet more sound,
Than those a brighter season pours around."

Cowper.

The ancients were so certain that with the aged alone is wisdom, that they regarded as utopian, every supposition of youth excelling in anything that required the exercise of either judgment or prudence. This mistake seems to have originated principally in the difficulty then existing of acquiring knowledge otherwise that by experience.

But if such was the error of olden times, the belief of our own day has verged on the opposite extreme. Youth now, as if determined on making ample amends for its long minority, assumes to itself the whole field of enterprize and fame, as if the arduous pursuits of these departments were wholly incompatible with matured knowledge and lengthened experience. Surely this sentiment is equally absurd, and the design of this article is to illustrate the folly of both these impressions, and to convince, by undeniable facts, the advocates of each that eminence has been attained in almost every kind of excellence, by very old as well as by very young men. And indeed this is one of the most remarkable peculiarities of human character, its capability of acting from apparent intuition, as well as from reflection or experience.

D'Israeli says of the pleasures derivable from the cultivation of the arts, sciences, and literature, that "time will not abate the growing passion for these pursuits, since old men still cherish an affection, and feel a youthful enthusiasm for them, when all others have ceased to interest." Dr. Reid, to his last day, retained an active interest in his various studies, and particularly in the revolutions of modern chemistry. In advanced life we may resume our former studies with a new pleasure, and in old age enjoy them with the same relish with which more youthful studies commence. Professor Duglad Stewart relates a remark of the celebrated Adam Smith, that "of all the amusements of old age, the most grateful and soothing is a renewal of acquaintance with the favorite authors of youth.

Socrates learned to play on musical instruments in his old age; Cato, at eighty, thought proper to learn Greek; and Plutarch almost as late in life, Latin.

Theophrastus began his admirable work on the Characters of Men at the extreme age of ninety. His literary labors were only terminated by his death.

Sir Henry Spelman neglected the sciences in his youth, but cultivated them at fifty years of age with eminent ability and success. His early years were chiefly spent in farming, which greatly diverted him from his studies; but a remarkable disappointment respecting a contested estate, disgusted him with these occupations; and then, resolving to attach himself to regular studies, and literary society, he sold his farms, and became a learned antiquary and lawyer, Tellier, the Chancellor of France, learned logic merely for an amusement, and to dispute with his grand-children.

Dr. Johnson applied himself to the Dutch language, but a few years before his death.

Ludovico Monaldesco, at the extraordinary age of 115, wrote the memoirs of his times, a singular exertion, noticed by Voltaire, who is himself one of the most remarkable instances of the progress of age in new studies.

Some of the most delightful works of Blair, Fenelon, Young, Massillon, and Fontenelle, were written, at a very advanced age, and every student of the Bible must feel that the book of Proverbs, with its profound wisdom and universality of adaptation, is a labor of advanced age—whilst nothing less than a youthful imagination could have conceived and executed the inimitable designs of Raphael or Corregio.

Alexander subdued his enemies in Greece, took possession of the neighboring countries, conquered the whole of Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, and Persia, and a large part of India, besides countless smaller kingdoms, and died at Babylon at the age of thirty-two years.

Hannibal was made general of the Carthagenian armies at the age of twenty-two. By the time he was twenty-eight, he had driven the Romans from Spain and Gaul, and crossed the Alps, and by the battle of Cannæ had brought Rome itself into imminent danger of subjection.

Buonaparte, at the age of twenty-seven, was made general of the French armies, after which he subdued the whole of Italy, passed into Egypt, invaded Syria, returned to France, was made First Consul, crossed the Alps, gained the decisive victory of Marengo, again subdued Italy, and was eventually crowned Emperor—having gained many of his most brilliant victories before he reached the age of thirty-five.

Cortes pushed his way up from obscurity, and obtained the command of the expedition to Mexico, and by his consummate boldness and address, at the age of thirty-five, became master of the mighty Aztec Empire. The younger Pitt was appointed chancellor of the exchequer and prime minister of England, at the age of twenty-four. Burke laid the foundation of his reputation for eloquence as a writer and speaker, as early as his twenty seventh year. Lord Bacon had conceived his design of overthrowing the philosophy of Newton had made his most important discoveries before he reached the age of thirty. Lord Byron composed many of his finest poems before his thirtieth year; and Burns, who died at the same age, published some of his most exquisite compositions before the age of twenty-seven.

The Rev. Sylvester Larned, at the early age of thirteen, was chosen by his fellow students at the Academy of Pittsfield to deliver an oration on the anniversary of American freedom. It was a subject of great surprise how this remarkable boy could, by a glance of thought, range through the whole field of knowledge, and without any apparent effort, outstrip all his cotemporaries.—His subsequent brilliant career, and lamented death, are too well known to require from me a repetition in this place. I might go on to narrate many other instances of precocious genius, as well as of vigorous intellect in old age, but enough has been said to prove that no one rule can be applied universally either to the development or the decay of the mental faculties. We admire the manifestation of genius and energy in early youth, but when, as in the case of the venerable Adams, the patriot and the sage of Quincy we see the tree that in extreme youth was covered with blossoms, still bringing forth fruit in old age, we involuntarily before the majesty of this more than Roman virtue, and confess that such a hoary head is indeed a crown of glory.

Salt as a preventive of Rust—Sir John Sinclair, one of the best agricultural writers that England has ever produced, has the following remarks upon the subject: It (Salt) has a tendency to prevent Rust or Blight in Wheat.—In the course of a most extensive inquiry into the causes of the rust or blight in wheat and the means of its prevention, it appears that Mr. Sickler, a farmer in Cornwall, was accustomed to manure his turnip land with the refuse salt from the Pilchard fishery; and that any ground thus treated was never liable to the rust or blight though it infected all the neighborhood.

This important circumstance is confirmed in recent communication to the author, from the Rev. Robert Hoblyn He used one ton of old salt, with one ton of fresh fish, mixed with earth and from twenty to thirty tons of sea sand, and his crops, he states, were always good, and never infected with rust

It is probable that the salt is the only article in this compost that could be of material service in preventing the rust, by its checking putrefaction, the result of too frequent a repetition of corrupted manures. It is well known that the rust does not attack plains in a state of perfect good health. Its general cause is the over-fullness or over luxuriance of the plant, from its being glutted with rank and unwholesome food.

MORAL USE OF THE SEA.

BY REV. DR. BUSHNEL.

The sea has yet another kind of moral and religious use, which is more direct and immediate. The liquid acres of the deep, their mighty anthem round the world, may be even the most valuable and productive acres God has made. Great emotions and devout affections are better than corn, more precious luxuries than wine or oil.—And God has built the world with a visible aim to exercise his creatures with whatever is lofty in conception, holy in feeling, and filial in purpose toward himself. All the trials and storms of the land have this same object To make the soul great, He gives us great dangers to meet, great obstacles to conquer Deserts, famines, pestilences, walking in darkness, regions of cold and wintry snow, hail and tempest—none of these are, in his view, elements of waste and destruction, because they go to fructify the moral mind. As related to the moral kingdom of God, they are the engines of truth, purity strength, and all that is great and holy in character. The sea is a productive element of the same class What man that has ever been upon the deep has not felt his nothingness, and been humbled, for the time at least, of his pride? How many have received lessons of patience from the sea?—How many here have bowed, who never bowed before, to the tremendous sovereignty of God? How many prayers otherwise silent have gone up, to fill the sky and circle the world, from wives and mothers, imploring his protecting presence with the husbands and sons they have trusted to the deep? It is of the greatest consequence, too, that such a thing as God should have images prepared to express him, and set him before the mind of man in all the grandeur of his attributes. These He has provided in the heavens and the sea, which are the two great images of his vastness and power; the one, remote, addressing itself to cultivated reason and science—the other, nigh to mere sense, and physically efficient, a liquid symbol of the infinitude of God We ourselves are upon it resting in peace, or quailing with dread, as if wafted by his goodness, or tossed by the tremendous billows of his will.—The Southern Baptist

A Beautiful Allegory.

When God created man he commanded his angels to visit him on earth, and guide him in his ways, so that he might foretaste the bliss of life to come. But lustful man sought after sensual joys in preference to those of heaven, and growing greedy of worldly fruits, began to quarrel with his brethren for the possession of them; and the guardian angels wept among themselves. But when the strong oppressed the weak, and took from them by force the produce of their soil, justice rose up sorrowing, and leaving earth flew back to heaven And when the weak overcame the strong with falsehood and deceit, and got from them by cunning what they feared to take by force, truth rose up sorrowing, and leaving earth flew back to heaven. And when the injured went forth to slay their injurers, and crimsoned the plain with their brother's blood peace rose up sorrowing, and leaving earth flew to heaven. Thus each bad act scared some good angel from the world, until forgiveness the most beautiful of all—alone remained behind.

And when she heard anger and revenge whisper dark deeds in man's ears, and counsel them to repeat the wrong that had been done to them, she rose up sorrowing and said, "I will not leave the earth. While my sister angels were here, might I have rested in my Father's bosom, for man needed me not But now that they have fled, I will seek to make him listen to my voice, telling him that, as he cherishes forgiveness here, so will forgiveness cherish him hereafter." So the loveliest child of heaven remained on earth; and peace and love, repenting, flew back and followed in her train, —The Good Genius that turned every thing into Gold.

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Liberia Herald.

Messrs Editors:—Sirs, permit me to give you a few extracts from my Journal, which I hope will be agreeable to your readers. I have thought for some time, that it would be gratifying to our friends in remote parts of the world, to hear of our prosperity, and our needs also. And though many of us, neither spare ourselves, nor our money to assist ourselves; yet, the number thus willing appear to be insufficient to meet our demands. In the whole of Liberia, we have twelve Baptist Churches duly organised and established. Six of them are in Monsterrado County; and the other six are in the counties of Grand Bassa and Sinoe, and Cape Palmas. All the churches, except one in the County of Grand Bassa, have Pastors watching over them. But in Monsterrado County, not an Ordained Minister at present resides there.

This will show the necessity of my visit to the Churches in that county, without further explanation. After a consultation with the Superintendent of the affairs of the B. F. M. S, B. C. it was thought advisable, under present circumstances, to visit the churches as often as possible. Accordingly, I set out on a tour on the 13th of June, on foot by way of the beach. It was comparatively good traveling for the rainy season; yet, the distance, and frequent showers of rain encountered, rendered travelling disagreeable and greatly fatiguing,

We arrived at Marshall, Junk, on the 15th, attended to some important matters of the church, held a two days' meeting, and passed on to Monrovia, which we reached on the 20th. On the 21st, preached to our brethren.—Friday 22nd, held a consultation with the Deacons and Licensed Ministers; when it was thought best that I should remain at Monrovia until after the Sabbath. I paid as many pastoral visits as I could, and preached Sabbath day. It was further conluded at the consultation that I might commence the most important duties needed in the church at Millsburg; accordingly, I started up the St. Paul's on the 26th:—to announce my arrival. I preached at N. Georgia the same night, and informed them of the object of my visit; they appeared to be much gratified, especially when they were informed that I would return, and put to rights the affairs of the church. On the 27th preached at Virginia, and announced in like manner the object of my visit. On the 28th reached Louisanna; preached there on the 29th, and 30th; held a two days' meeting at Millsburg, in which the church manifested much interest, by regular and timely attendance on the meeting. One person had been received as a candidate for baptism, but died before I reached there. Other important business attended to during the time of the meeting;—left the brethren comforted. Saturday afternoon, the 30th, left for Louisianna, in a very heavy shower of rain, which prevented our having meeting there till sabbath morning, the first of July. A very interesting time sabbath morning, —after morning preaching, we repaired to the water side, near brother Seamour Jackson's house, where I solemnly immersed seven persons in the presence of the assembly. It was truly a time of solemnity and rejoicing—and what added yet more to the impressiveness of the scene, six out of the seven, were Congoes, recaptives of the "Pon's." In the after noon, I preached, and delivered the usual address and charge, and gave the right hand of fellowship to those just baptised:—and administered the sacrement to the church, and to a goodly number of the brethren and sisters, who had come from Millsburg. I observed during my discourse, that the brethren enjoyed it like hungry men at a feast. In meeting around the Lord's Table, to partake of his broken body and shed blood, it was truly a melting time. Here our joys were mingled with tears; and deep feelings manifested by all. In singing the hymn after supper, the brethren and sisters left their seats in an orderly manner, and gave each other the hand of sweet fellowship, in token of perfect union At this place also, one of the candidates for baptism died before I reached the place. In view of the destitute state of all the churches, in Monsterrado County, will not some of our brethren come over and help us? After the afternoon services, brother Richardson went to Virginia, and preached there at night; but I remained at Louisianna till Monday morning, 2nd of July, when I left. and joined brother Richardson at Virginia, from there we went to New Georgia, where we settled some very important church matters. Left all well. Returned to Virginia and had a two days' meeting according to previous arrangment, the meeting was well attended throughout, not only by our brethren, but by other order of christians: here I had none to baptize; but dedicated four children to God, after our order, administered the sacrement of the Lord's supper to a large number of our brethren and sisters, the number being increased by the coming of some of our brethren from Millsburg and Louisiana. This was truly a high day to the disciples of Jesus; and the exercises were enjoyed as a feast of fat things to them. Left this church after the A. M. service, according to previous arrangement, to attend services of the church at New Georgia, and among other things preached the funeral sermon of our beloved sister Morrell Had a very heavy shower of rain, between Virginia and New Georgia. Left New Georgia Monday morning the 9th. quite a pleasant morning. Saturday 14th commened a meeting at Monrovia; I preached Saturday morning from Mic. 6. ch—& 8th vs In the after noon, Rev. H. W. Ellis from Matt 28. 19—20 vs: and Rev. B. R. Wilson in the evening, from the second chapter of Paul's Epistle to the Eph. and latter clause of the 15th vs. We had full and anxious congregations; and may be called a union meeting. For the brethren of each denomination, took their respective turns, in preaching, exhortation prayer &c. Preaching Sabbath morning by brother Richardson, after which, the whole assembly from the church repaired to the banks of the river, where, had already assembled a large number of spectators, and on board of boats to witness the baptizing of the candidates. It is some what strange, Mr. Editor that tho' persons speak so contemptably of true baptism, yet, they will leave their favorite walks to witness the beautiful and impressive scene. Good behavior and attention at the water. The spirits of the brethren and sisters, appeared much revived. Baptizing over; &c. met for the afternoon services, and never in all the days of my life. have I preached to a larger, and more respectable, and attentive audience. After preaching, I delivered the usual address to the church, and charge to the candidates, or the persons just baptized, and gave the right hand of fellowship in behalf of the church. At seven o'clock, the church met to commemorate the death and suffering of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ: and I do not remember of ever enjoying such a season. To see, between one, and two hundred sit around the sacrimental board at one time, and nearly all, in mournful grief and tears; what! but an adamant could fail to be moved? The old and experienced part of the church said such a time had not been witnessed within the last 20 years. And indeed, such was the state of deep feeling, and indication of good results from the meeting—that a meeting commenced the next day, Monday and was protracted till Tuesday night.

DISCOVERIES.

All the churches in the county of Monsterrado, need a good undershepherd. A spiritual guide, one to preach not-himself, but Christ crucified, one who will learn and study the scriptures. A good school teacher is needed at all our stations, save two. Though three places are occupied in Monsterrado county; some stations are unavoidably unoccupied for want of suitable teachers. Supply the stations of our mission, in the above particulars, with suitable persons, and they will thrive like the lillies of the valley. No schools at our station at Monrovia: none at Louisiana; none at Millsburg. I further discover, that it would not only require a good man, to command respect and attention at Monrovia, but he should be sufficiently informed, to lead the members of his congregation, to instruct them, and when he enters the pulpit, the church can feel assured, that the minister is able to "rightly divide the word &c"

And, further, as our conversation, taste, judgement, views, choice of things, are in a very great degree, regulated by the amount of information we possess; so I find at Monrovia: that their general information puts it out of the power of any one less informed than themselves, to instruct them. Among the best informed in our Republic are members of the church at Monrovia; now many of the members of both sexes, persons of extensive reading, to such, the old sermon from the new text can neither instruct, nor comfort. Weight of character in order to be useful in matters of discipline. How can an individual, correct, rebuke, reprove, in righteousness," "if he is not upright himself?" He should fully understand the doctrine, he imparts to others steadfast in the faith: not moving according to circumstances but according to truth. With the hope that the God of churches, & missions may supply every station, and bless all the churches.

I subscribe myself a fellow companion in tribulation.

For the Liberia Herald.

Messrs Editors:—Sirs, you will indulge me with a short space in your columns to repeat in part what has already been said: but we deem it not out of place to repeat it, and repeat it,—and then repeat it again. On the 6th, day of March last, the good French steamer "Espadon" Captain A. Villemaine, received our army on board, all cap apis for the campaign a gainst the illustrious Chiefs of the New Sesters country. While the columns were being formed to embark, every bystander's eye beamed with joy and seemed to say go and prosper and may the God of Heaven be with you. —By half past 5 of the clock that day all was on board, and we sailed, and in less than two days had possessed ourselves of that land which hitherto had been deemed impregnable. We had a jolly set of boys, all life ready and willing to obey their officers, in which every true hearted Liberian takes great pleasure. It is my candid opinion; that if the French government had tried for a half century, they had not found a gentleman better adapted to the enterprize, nay; if they had prolonged the search to 2 3-4 of a century, the final conclusion would have been thus.

Forty ages behold us, Captain Villemaine and officers are yet without rivals.

Are there any who having a knowledge of the campaign, so base as to dispute my remarks? I trow not. With what fatherly care did Captain Villemaine and officers watch over the army so very comfortably situated on board of his ship. The undivided attention of his Surgeon, and Assist Surgeon to our sick not afar off but approached them with hasty steps of affection, a proof of a sound conviction, that we were all made by the same God. Thrice blessed Liberians stop and catch the sound of these words. "One God made us all."

In a word they knew and respected us as men. Not all the Galvanic Batteries in the world can shock from our minds the name of Captain Villemaine and officers of the Espadon. Nor if the sweet sounds of the celebrated Paganini's Violin were coupled could effect any more, but on the contrary would but serve to sooth us more deeply in favor of Captain V, and officers, and their good ship the "Espadon." No! let their names be written in letters of gold, and succeeding generations will repeat the story; and if we are faithful, not puffed up, Heaven, will assist them in "speaking the speech as we pronounced it, trippingly on the tounge." For the air is so magnificent that they cannot saw it. The reader will bear in mind that the magananimous conduct of Captain Villemaine and officers did not cease on our leaving ship board, with a view to taking up our abode in the tented field, nay, it glared with equal brilliancy there for he was at anchor off every point that danger seemed to threaten.

We are more than pleased to see that both England and France are bent on driving from our shore each and every brigand, whose sole object is to enrich themselves with the blood of Africa's sons. Their very purposes are murkey their countenances desperately wicked. They effect a serenity in their hellish smiles which might appal the Devil were they not of his craft. What a sorry set of "soidisant" Dons a mere puff of eolus blasts.

Should the "Espadon" call at Monrovia "Enpassen" from the southward, we will hail her return with cheerful and grateful hearts, and shall ever wish her success.

I am truly Yours

N. M. HICKS.

For the Liberia Herald.

Messrs Editors.—Sirs permit me to reply to an article that appeared in the "Herald" of June 29th Signed "Solicitor." The writer of the piece in question, seems to be much chagrined at the "Quoted Paragraph" found in "Africa's Luminary" of June 13th and in order to express his indignation thereat, he has poured forth his collected bile unsparingly—intending the filthy mass for "Observer." This malice aforethought, was certainly uncalled for, and deserves animadversion. If "Solicitor" is so unenviably obtuse, or so wantonly mischievous, as not to understand, or wilfully misinterpet the "first effort" that he might thereby be employed in ejecting such impudent and ungentlemanly gabble in a public Jounal: all that may be said to him is:—Go on thou magpie, as thou canst peep knowingly in a marrow bone, and when thou hast furnished thy peculiar propensity to superabundance —then, stop! "Observer" will here, inform the public that in no part of the article written by him, does he wish, or did he intend, any sentence, clause, phrase, or word, to be construed into an expression of contempt, detraction, or insult towards the Rev. J. W. R. his family, or any thing with which he is connected; but vice versa. This will no doubt suffice.

But why "Solicitor," should make himself a stipendiary press, is not known: unless indeed, it be to make a display of his charlatanry in a foul puff upon one who desires no dealings whatever with such a buffoon. The expressions "casting pearls before swine" and "to its vomit," are out of place, and means nothings if intended to apply to "Observer" as he was much delighted with the Rev's—discourse, and was edified thereby: but on the contrary, if we may judge of swine by their dirty and mean practices, and habits; then, "Solicitor" fills the measure of a Hog completely, as his calumnious debut was unprovoked, and of the lowest and most degraded kind,—remarkably characteristic of the beast! "A pigmy will be a pigmy still though perched on Alps!"

"Solicitor" quotes from scripture "speak evil of no man, especially ministers," &c: what he means by this quotation is not known, unless it be to condemn himself; for nought is said by "Observer" that can be considered derogatory to any man, by persons of sense. "Solicitor" of course excepted.

This our ass, clothed in a lion's skin, will remember that scripture likewise says of characters like himself. "But these as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed, speak evil of the things that they understand not; and shall utterly perish in their own corruption;" &c. and again;

"A double minded man is unstable in all his ways," such a one as will appear friendly to your face, and when you turn from him, will bite at you like a viper, though he be biting a file! No excuse can shield such fool hardiness. "Solicitor" says, "THEN, why in your description speak so tauntingly of the 'first effort' and thereby intimating that there were no simplicity evinced in the discourse." The poverty of this "Hero's pretensions are really to be pitied. It is advisable that he would look again at the article of "Observer" especially that portion of it, which he has quoted for Hypercriticism; and see if he cannot there find an acknowledgement of the Rev. J. W. R's worth: it is there said, that the discourse, was very pleasing, and delightful,—"not more delightful, because it was the first effort, we heard him make, than for its "Pertinent simplicity!" Again, after quoting the Paragraph concerning the storm, and persons going in and out of the church at the time; he asks "What conclusion shall we draw from this quaint sentence," &c. This question will be divested of some of its singularity, when upon reflection it is remembered that "Solicitor," asks it! The "quaint sentence" only admits of the conclusion intended, and that is;—persons who were in the church at the time of the storm, and who lived near by probably, went home to see if their chattels were secure from the weather,—and also to get umbrellas' for the purpose of accompanying their families home with, after the church services were over; as they certainly made their appearance at the church again, in a short time; and with umbrellas too!

If it had not been for these attempts to roar, this creature might have passed for a lion; as he would not have been noticed; but in attenpting to play the whole farce, he brayed, instead of roaring, and thus the long ears of the Peculiar animal were discovered!

Thus the premises of "Solicitor" being neither sea, nor dry-land, the fabric he has attempted to rear, has sunk, together with the builder; and it is advisable that hereafter he would either build something that will stand long enough to be looked at; or else not go to the expense and trouble, of making an attempt to build anything.

In conclusion, it may be necessary to say, that this reply to "Solicitor," would not have been made, had not the wisest of men said "Answer a fool according to his folly lest he be wise in his own conceit."

With this cursory glance. I now take leave o "Solicitor," forever: and leave him to revel among his kindred spirits,—the swine!

Yours with Peculiar considerations:

OBSERVER!

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA LIBERIA, AUGUST 31, 1849

Acquisition of Territory.

It will be gratifying to our readers to learn that within the last month or two several important tracts of territory,—including the political jurisdiction of the same, have been ceded by the aboriginal Kings and Chiefs, to this government. The entire territories of Grand Cape Mount, Sugaree and Manna, on the north west, and the territory of Grand Cess on the south east, are now integral parts of the Republic of Liberia. The aborigines of those tracts have incorporated themselves with us, and are subject to, and entitled in common to all the benefits and protection of the government and laws of this Republic

This intelligence is indeed gratifying, as, in the first place it places under the immediate and uncontroverted jurisdiction of the Republic—with the single exception of a small tract of country in the Kroo district, which the Republic, as yet, has only a pre-emption right —all the intermediate points of coast lying between this place and our extreme jurisdiction on the south east.

Secondly the Liberian Authorities will be able to abolish speedily from among the tribes occupying those tracts, the barbarous customs, which for centuries, have been so distructive to human life, and which have so debased the natives, that they are now but little removed from the brute creation. Now the whole power and influence of the government may be successfully exerted in introducing among them the blessings of civilization and christianity.

Thirdly; these and other cessions, which the authorities, we are credibly informed, expect soon to obtain, will enable the government to carry out, in a few years, another great and vastly important object;—that of dotting as far as possible; this western border with civilized and christian communities, to the end of effectually abolishing the slave trade. And in forming settlements, no time should be lost. The question of the propriety of withdrawing the British squadron from this coast, is now under serious consideration in England, and as far as we are able to judge, public opinion in Great Britian, seems to favor it. If so, and the squadron be withdrawn; the traffic will be revived, and vigorously prosecuted at every point where slavers can gain access. It is therefore, fondly hoped that no impediment will be thrown in the way of the Republic, acquiring all the territory lying between the She Bar River and Cape Palmas—which includes the principal haunts of the slavers, and the districts where the slave trade is still successfully being carried on. And may we not also entertain the hope that our friends abroad, especially in the U. S will aid us in this great effort?—We feel that we may.—We therefore, in behalf of our fellow citizens, earnestly solicit pecuniary assistance from the friends of humanity in every country.

Resignation.

Daniel B. Warner has resigned the office of Secretary of State.

For four weeks we have had dry weather—not enough rain has fallen to moisten the earth, which is very unusual for this season of the year. The consequence is, that the growth of vegetables is much retarded, and the rice that had not ripened will be materially injured. We hope that there may be but a very few farms of "late rice."

Rice is now coming in plentifully, and within a fortnight's time has fallen in price, twenty five cents on the bushel.

Military Appointments.

The President has made the following appointments.

James B. Mc Gill to be Lieutenant Colonel of the first Regiment, in place of Jacob W. Prout deceased

Francis Payne to be Major of the first Regiment, in place of Dixon B. Brown, deceased

Nugent M. Hicks, to be Brigade Inspector, with the rank of Major.

On the evening of the 1st, inst: the Hon. D. B. Warner delivered an interesting and appropriate address, before the members of the Liberia Lyceum, on the life and character of the late Rev. Elijah Johnson The Hall of the Lyceum was well filled with ladies and gentlemen who had come together on the occasion.

and joined in the deep interest which was manifested while the orator was delineating the character of him, who may be styled the "Father of their country." Every circumstance connected with this remarkable patriot cannot be otherwise than deeply interesting to the people of Liberia. To his unwearied exertions and cool bravery in a great measure, may be attributed the success of the arms of the small band of patriots who first effected a landing on Montserrado's Mount.

Twenty seven years ago, Elijah Johnson with his brave band of pioneers, who left the land of their birth, to seek a home where they and their decendants might enjoy the blessings of liberty, free and untrameled, landed on this hill with their wives and children. Scarcely had they completed temporary huts for their shelter from the weather, ere they were startled by the shrill war hoop of the savage warriors, which announced the proximity of the enemy to their encampment. The sound of the savage war instruments interrupted the solemn quietness of the hour which preceded the dawn of day, and conveyed awful forebodings to the minds of the brave adventurers. For a moment their energies were paralized—but it was only a momentary feeling, for the next minute found them rushing to the deadly conflict—they fought for their lives, and for the lives of their families—and for a home for their oppressed brethren. Elijah Johnson was conspicuous on that morning—he was seen at every point of attack; cheering on his comrades, himself leading in the front, infused greater determination in his followers to fight to the death. (Other chiefitians there were on that memorable morn.; but it is not our purpose on this occasion to name them, it is sufficient to say that they distinguished themselves equally with him, who is the subject of these brief remarks). The battle raged with increased energy 'till the rising of the bright luminary of day, which cheered the somewhat drooping spirits of the liberty seekers, and dampened the ardor of the enemy, for their fire slackened, and then soon ceased and with loud yells and execrations the enemy made a hastily retreat leaving some of their dead behind—and our brave pioneers rushed to their huts to embrace their families and to offer up to the God of battles their feeble thanks and praise for His benign interposition, in having so miraculously preserved them from the fury of the thousands of their savage enemies. But there was no time for rejoicing—the commanding voice of Johnson was again heard calling to his comrades to prepare for another struggle—the enemy was sure to return, and likely in greater force—and already the little band numbered less—it had suffered in the struggle. In a very few days the enemy did return to the attack in greater force, and obstinately contended for victory—at one time they seemed on the point of gaining the victory, but the cheering voice of Johnson was heard above the din of battle, a new impulse appeared to have seized the minds of his comrades, they rushed on their enemies with cannon and musketry, and carried death and dismay into their ranks—the enemy fled in every direction. It was the last battle,—it was fought on the morning of the 1st of December 1822. As in the first battle, so did Johnson appear in the last —full of hope, and courage, and ever on the alert to encourage his compatriots.

The Election.

The full returns of the late election did not reach the State Department for some weeks after it was over, owing to the inconvenience of travelling at that season of the year, which will partly account for the result of the election not being sooner heralded by us. We now give the result.

Joseph J. Roberts was unanimously re-elected President. Anthony D. Williams, Daniel B. Warner, Beverly R. Wilson and Nathaniel Brander were the candidates for the Vice Presidency Neither of them had a majority of the votes. It will therefore be the duty of the Legislature to "elect from among the candidates having the three highest numbers of votes, one to act as Vice President for the ensuing term." Williams, Warner and Wilson, had the highest number of votes.

Hilary Teage elected Senator for Monsterrado County.
John Day " " " Grand Bassa "
James N. Lewis, " " " Sinoe "

Representatives for Montserrado County.
Edward J Roye,
John H. Paxton
Sion Harris,
Debrick Simpson.

Representatives for Grand Bassa County.
Charles Henry,
Samuel S. Herring,
Edward Lyles.

Daniel Mc Farland, Representative for Sinoe County.

The Liberia schooner "Lark," Reid Cooper, Lieutenant commanding, returned to port on the morning of the 22nd: from a cruise to leeward. She brought full despatches from Grand Bassa and Sinoe.

The immigrants landed from the "Huma" at Sinoe, were getting on finely. The fever had not gone very hard with them. Those of the immigrants who had had an attack of the fever, were convalescent, and were busily employed in building their houses. Four buildings some of them two stories high had already been raised.

Judge Benedict, Hon: E. Morris, and B. V. R. James Esqr: and Mr. Francis J. Webb were passengers in the Lark.

The Lark sailed on the 28th: for a cruise in the neighborhood of Grand Cape Mount and the Gallenas.

To Correspondents.—"Citizen of the World" is received, but for want of room, his communication is necessarily delayed. We would be much obliged if "Citizen of the World" would recall his communication and alter it some what, so as to make it less personal, and less liable to create angry feelings. If this is not done, we will be compelled to have the auther's name, before publishing the communication.

"Alpha" has been received, but too late for this number of the paper. We are not favorable to the matter he writes about. Missionary responsibilities and doings, in our opinion need not be commented upon by him, unless, indeed, he is a contributor to the missionary fund, which we presume is not the case, as all the missionaries in Liberia, so far as our knowledge extends, are employed and supported by societies in the United States And "Alpha" has not the right to interfere in the premises, if the missionaries, as he says, do ail to do what is expected from them, &c., &c. Now tho.' we would prefer an article on a different subject, we can have no particular objection to publishing the one sent us by "Alpha." It will appear in our next.

Correction.

When the President solicited Her Majesty's government for a small armed vessel to protect our commerce, the Cutter "Mercury" was named, and ordered to be fitted up immediately for our government—but, subsequently it was ascertained that she would not answer so well; and the schooner "Lark" was selected, fitted up and sent out. She is a very handsome schooner, and not what is termed a cutter.

Schooner Herald.

This vessel was purchased last year for the use of our government, but finding her copper much worn, and her sails and rigging in such bad plight, as to need an entirely new fitting out, to do which, would require an expenditure of some three thousand dollars. It was thought advisable, under these circumstances to sell the Herald, and the President seized the first opportunity that offered, and sold her for two thousand dollars. Daniel B. Warner, Esq. was the purchaser.

The schooner Lysander arrived from New York, on the 25th inst: by her we had the pleasure of receiving letters and new. papers. It will be gratifying to our readers to learn that a fe in contemplation among their friends in the United States, to establish a college in Liberia. This is really good news, and we hope the day is not far distant when the plans of our friends will be carried out, and steps be taken to have the institution built.

The Rev Wm. McLain Secretary of the American Colonization Society, under date 30th June, writes. "You will be pleased to learn that in several quarters, measures are in progress for establishing a college in Liberia. The work will be slow and hard, but it must be done! It is now high time that the preparatory department was in operation, under the management of able and well-qualified teachers and with funds at command, for all necessary purposes."

We propose making further remarks on this subject in our next.

The American Colonization Society since January, 1848, has sent to Liberia eight hundred and fifty one emigrants.

Gatherings from American Papers.

James K. Polk Ex-Presiden of the United States died at Nashville Tennesse 15th June last of chronic diarrhea. He was the Eleventh President of the United States—"He died at the age of fifty four years, seven months and thirteen days!"

In many parts of the United States, the cholera is busily at work.

Father Matthew the temperance apostle had arrived at New York.

The French troops had besieged the city of Rome.

Disturbances had again arisen in Paris;—the cholera is making most frightful havoc in that city," upwards of eleven thousand deaths had already occurred, and in one day there were about nine hundred cases and six hundred deaths, reported.

England had again been visited by the cholera—several cases had occurred in Manchester and other parts of the country.

We notice the death of Major General Gaines of the U. S. Army.

The papers have commenced already to abuse General Taylor and his administration. It seems that the general is an honest man, and not inclined to be led about by parties—this will not suit the American people.

The Liberia Packet arrived at Baltimore 1st: July —and was expected to leave for Liberia 1st: Augt.—She would bring out immigrants.

The New York Herald gives an account of a riot in that city on the evening on the 10th: last May. The civil authority it seems could not maintain the peace—and the military was ordered to their support. The military fired a few rounds into the midst of the rioters, and they dispersed in every direction. There were "22 deaths occasioned by the firing of the musketry and near 30 wounded, some of which are not expected to live."

Value of Human Excrement.—Bous singault says that the excrements of a man for one year contains about 20 pounds of Nitrogen, a sufficient quantity for the growth of 600 lbs. —15 bushels of Wheat, Rye or Oats, or for 1000 lbs. of Barley. And as they can be disinfected and rendered pleasant to handle, by admixture with peat ashes, all farmers who have peat upon their estates should see the valuable fertilizer at the head of this paragraph be not wasted but that it be treated so as to be rendered tributary to the improvement of his land.

If the peat in the process of being burnt into ashes, be so burnt as to prevent the fire from bursting out, a large proportion of the mass will be a carbon, which will act as a fixer of the volatile part of the nitrogen of the excrement, and by arresting loss by evaporation, give the property of lastingness to it as a manure, thereby enhancing its value.

Kind Words do not cost much.

They never blister the tongue or lips. And we have never heard of any mental trouble arising from this quarter. Though they do not cost much—1. They help one's own good nature. Soft words soften our own soul. Angry words are fuel to the flame of wrath, and make it blaze more fiercely. 2. Kind words make other people good natured. Cold words freeze people, and hot words scorch them, and bitter words make them bitter, and wrathful words make them wrathful. There is such a rush of all other kinds of words in our days, it seems desirable to give kind words a chance among them. There are vain words, and idle words, and hasty words, and spiteful words, and empty words and profane words, and boisterous words, and warlike words. Kind words also produce their own image on men's souls. And a beautiful image it is. They smooth and quiet, and comfort the hearer. They shame shun out of his sour, morose, unkind feelings. We have not yet begun to use kind words in such abundance as they ought to be used.—Paschal.

A Piece of Family History without a Parallel.—On the 27th day of January, 1849, and in this our goodly thriving city of Norwich, is living an aged gentleman, the progenitor of five generations, all now living. He was born on Sunday, his wife was born on Sunday, and his eldest child on Sunday; and he had a child born every day of the week, commencing with Sunday morning and ending on Saturday night. All the first born of the five successive generations were born on Sunday; all are males, and all bear the same name, and are now living. Of these the last-born is the son of the fourth or fifth (we do not know which) child of her parents. The oldest of the five generations is ninety-six years of age; the youngest is between two and three months old, so that the distance which separates the two extremes is but little less than a century.—Exchange paper.

DON'T COMPLAIN.—A merchant was one day returning from market. He was on horseback, and behind his saddle was a valise filled with money. The rain fell with violence, and the good old man was wet to his skin. At this time he was quite vexed, and murmured because God had given him such hard weather for his journey. He soon reached the border of a thick forest. What was his terror on beholding on one side of the road a robber, who, with levelled gun, was aiming at him, and attempting to fire; but the powder being wet with the rain, the gun did not go off, and the merchant, giving spurs to his horse, fortunately had time to escape. As soon as he found himself, he said to himself "How wrong was I, not to endure the rain patiently as sent by Providence! If the weather had been dry and fair I should not probably have been alive at this hour. The rain which caused me to murmur, came at a fortunate moment to save my life, and preserve to me my property."

RAISING OF THE WIDOW'S SON.

LUKE vii; 12—16.

He was her only son, and she had ever lov'd him
With that deep and holy feeling call'd—a mother's love
A mother's love! O how it speaks
Of cherish'd hopes—of watchful care—and tend'rest feeling.
Springing from out the fountain which is never seal'd
Deep—deep within a mother's breast!—

He was her only son, and she a widow!
She had seen them bear him, whom perchance
She had too fondly loved to his long resting-place;
And now they thither bear her lone last treasure
And she is desolate indeed!
But as they go forth from the city gate
Behold the Lord! He who knew
The bitterness of every heart, had look'd into that mother's,
Seen all the sorrow there, and had compassion on her
And bade her weep no more

And now He stands beside the bier,
And in that voice the elements obey'd
Said to the dead—arise! The sealed ear
Unlock'd its portal—the straighten'd limbs relax,
And the young man arose and spake!—
Ran thro' the multitude—and now they glorify that God
Who thus had visited his people—
Whose mighty power, to them had been made manifest

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE BRIDEL EVE.

It was the eve of the battle of Waterloo! a period which for its stirring interest has often been made the subject of the poet's song, and the more exciting tales of the novelist. And surely does it afford ample materials, without drawing on the storehouse of imagination for pictures of vivid and touching power.

Behold the city of Brussels, which ere the morning's light was to be the scene of such fearful events, wrapped in peace and security! Listen to the sounds of revelry, and the voice of mirth! Witness the gathering of youth and beauty, the commingling of the fair and brave! Hearken to the soul-entrancing tones of music and the still more thrilling harmony of the whispers of love! See forms which ere to-morrow's sunset will be cold and lifeless, now full of grace and vigour, treading the mazy dance; and hearts which will have ceased for ever to beat, now vibrating to the sweetest sensations!

All is gaiety, glitter, and loveliness: to numbers "how far all thought of death." But behold the midnight. No delineation however, can equal in force or power that given by one of our recent poets: though it is not to the scenes he so graphically and touchingly portrays that I purpose to conduct my readers, but to one of far less pretensions.

In a humbler circle in that city were happy hearts assembled, and mirth and lightness sat on every face Beauty either was not wanted, nor manly grace, to gild the festive scene; and all unconscious of the coming fatality did love whisper, and innocence smile, blush, and believe.

It was the wedding-day of a beautiful young girl, the daughter of an opulent tradesman in the city, with one to whom she had been long betrothed; and a revel was closing the happy day. Florence L'Clere was young, fair and rich; Henri St. Jean, while superior in birth, was in every other respect her equal: but idolize each other. Florence's happy father smiled in contentment as he looked on, and thought his child had now a protecter when his head should be laid in the grave, and one every way worthy of her also. The young bride, in all the wantonness of happiness was dressed as a mimic queen; and, seated on a throne under a canopy prepared for the occasion, was receiving—even with real queenly grace—the homage of her voluntary subjects, when the fearful sound that marked that night of terror fell on her ears. Suddenly the tones of majesty were hushed; and the bride, with a blanched cheek, looked round to read in other faces a clue to the mystery which banished the rose from her own. But she was met by glances as inquiring, and cheeks as pallid, as those she betrayed.

"Be not alarmed, dearest," said St. Jean in a voice of calmness calculated to inspire confidence and coming up to the dais on which, transfixed terror, she was still seated; "I will go and inquire the cause of these sounds. I shall be back on the instant; do not terrify yourself." And, pressing her to his breast, he hurried from the apartment.

His voice did inspire confidence, and, with a re-assured look and half-smile, she awaited his return.

Half an hour passed, and she grew impatient; an hour, and the efforts of her brides maid's were futile to restrain her uneasiness. She paced the room with rapid and excited steps. Again the hour went round, but brought neither her husband nor intelligence. Her father, too, was absent; and suspense became agony. Anon and again, the dread sounds smote her ears; and trembling with affright, all thought of the late pageant banished from their minds, the very imperial garland—costly as was the trinket—torn from her brow and dashed to earth, did Florence, and her gay companions stand, seeking, more by the mute appeal of looks than words, the comfort from each other which none could find in their own breasts.

"I guess the organ of these frightfull sounds, said the bride, speaking at length, "but Henri! oh, where is Henri?"

"Safe, safe, depend upon it," said her young cousin. "He has only ventured further than he intended, for your better satisfaction."

Do not be uneasy, dear Florence," added her friend, Emilia L———, "he will sure to be here soon, now."

"God grant it!" replied she, in a tone of apprehension.

A loud knocking at the street door on the instant, confirmed their hopes; but Monsieur Le Clerc only returned,

My father! thank God!" exclaimed Florence; "but where is my husband?"

That word husband! In what a tone of keen anxiety was it pronounced, and how fearlessly, the first time her lips had uttered it. But her life was in the tie so newly formed, and fate seemed to hang on the answer.

"Henri! I do not know, my love: we parted at the corner of ——— street I have not seen him since, but no doubt he will be here very soon."

It was fearful to see the look of mute agony which sat on the wife's face, but she spoke not Thick and fast, from all but her, did questions crowd on Le Clerc but her soul was with her husband, and but as far as they related to him she betrayed no interest. In this suspense the morning light dawned, but no Henri came: and with a look of strange meaning the bride called for her walking habiliments; and prepared to dare the perils without.

"My child, my child," said her father, "what are you meditating? To think of venturing from under shelter is madness Henri will be back, I doubt not, soon"

So you told me three hours ago," replied his daughter, "but he comes not. Father, he is in peril; and where is the wife's place in the hour of peril; but by her husband! I go to seek him."

"Florence you are excited beyond yourself; the mixed events of yesterday and tonight have overtaxed your energies. Act not like a child, I implore you. What can you do—even supposing Henri were in danger, in which I have not the slightest apprehension however—out alone and exposed on a night like this. Have a little patience."

Before she could reply, the cure entered who yesterday morning had united them. With a singular look of apprehension and inquiry he regarded the bride; but in her eagerness to gain intelligence, she saw it not.

"Oh. father, father, my husband! Have you seen him? tell me, is he safe?"

The priest looked again, with ineffable pity and concern on her countenauce, but with perfect composure answered, "I have."

"Where, oh where?—And is he safe? when will he return?" she again repeated.

For a moment the cure hesitated, and then replied," "He is safe, but will not be here until to-morrow."

"To-morrow to-morrow! he leaves me at a time like this, and not return until to-morrow! Father, it is false! Pardon, oh pardon me, there is something more behind. Tell me, tell me the worst-"

"I will, my beloved child. There is a trial waits you, have you strength to bear it?"

"This suspense is agony. O God! Henri is dead! wounded," she added, with a pitiable accent of half-hope that perhaps the latter might be possible. "Speak, oh speak, I entreat you.

"Pray for courage, my child, and arm yourself to learn all. God will support you. Your husband is, I trust, is gone to a better land."

As though struck by lightning, she fell to the earth; but no sound betrayed the weight of agony.

For hours and hours they watched by her, without any prospect of a return to consciousness, apparently; and the physician began to look apprehensive. Her bridesmaids of yesterday—a tearful group now—stood in mute and sorrowful sympathy around her bed; but utterly helpless On one side sat her father, and on the other the cure, who never left her; while the man of medicine stood by, his science for once utterly at fault. High fever began to manifest itself, and she awoke, at length, in wild delirium. The name of her husband—now in plaintive and soul-touching accents, now in wild and thrilling tones of misery—was ever on her lips; and her father, almost heart-broken, at length quitted a scene which became too painful for endurance. For several days did the fever rage with unabated malignity; and still—as much as his many duties would allow—did the minister of God watch by her, in order to be ready at the right moment to pour in consolation and healing. The sun had gone down most beautifully; and its glowing halo, lingering in the horizon, shed a dim but poetical lustre on all things around. It was exactly six days from the fatal catastrophe; and the cure alone was at the side of the sufferer. The heavenly shadow—if I may use such an expression—of the golden orb found its way into the apartment, and hallowed each object within it. Florence seemed to sleep, and her pastor, feeling encouraged by so unusual an appearance, was reciting most fervently some prayers for her recovery.

Her musical voice at length was heard, low, calm, and sweet, and with apparent unconsciousness of the presence of any one. "Sweet saint, I will do thy bidding."

The cure paused and listened; but excepting calm and regular breathings, no farther sound was audible. After a little while, however, he become conscious that the crisis was past, and she was restored to reason. Without speaking he knelt down by her bed-side.

She turned herself, and looked upon him long and intently; and then said: "It is Father Eustace!"

"Yes, dear child."

"And Henri, you told me Henri was dead!"

A burst of irrepressible and unutterable grief succeeded; but they were solitary tears, and relieved her. Of herself after some little time, she paused, and said in a tone of perfect calmness, which astonished him whom she addressed.

"Father I have had a vision." He did not reply, and she went on. "And I have seen heaven, and God, and the angels, and of its ineffable light and surpassing glory I can give you no idea But God! oh the majesty of God! Though at the most immense distance—such a distance that we have no figures to calculate it—I fell prostrate, blinded by His unapproachable brightness. And Henri, too, was there; looking, oh! so glorious and happy! And a sweet saint came to me, and said in tones, the melody of which no language can pourtray. 'His is the reward of virtue; the guerdon of those who prefer the service of the great God to the devil and the world. Is it not worth the sacrifice?"

"My child, you wonder," said the cure, gently; surprised at her enthusiasm: "compose yourself."

No, I do not wander. I am quite sensible now. It was this brought back my reason. But this was not all. I saw a train of ethereal and indescribably glorious beings, who surpassed most around them in lustre, and were nearer God than others and I took courage and asked my companion who they were. And she smiled upon me, and replied. 'They follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth, for they are virgins. Wouldst thou not like to share their glorious lot?' I could not speak, I was too overwhelmed; but I thought Almighty God seemed well pleased, as she added, "Go thou and do likewise., Ere, however. I could reply, I was back on earth again. O! am I not God's now?"

The priest prayed, but spoke not.

"I know, father, what you think—what you are thinking at this moment," said she, fixing her large lustrous eyes upon him, made more bright by the pallow of her countenance. "You think it is delusion, the wanderings of delirium; for 'I have been delirious, I know. Well. I will not combat your opinion. You have been ever good, and kind, and wise: I will get strong again before I argue with you. And now tell me the particulars of my poor Henri's death.

He tried to evade the subject by representing to her the necessity of rest; but it was in vain. With seemingly almost preternatural strength and composure too, she extorted from him, and listened to, the harrowing recital of the direful accident which had laid him a corpse not many doors from her own residence, whither he was hastening to relieve her solicitude. The contents of a gun, accidentally fired in the confusion, had entered his side, and in a moment deprived him of life.—Boston Pilot.

The Cup Of Cold Water.

A young Englishwoman was sent to France to be educated in a Huguenot school in Paris. A few evenings before the fatal massacre of St. Bartholomewe's Day, she and some of her young companions were taking a walk in some part of the town where there were sentinels placed perhaps, on the walls; and you know that when a soldier is on guard he must not leave his post until he is relieved, that is, till another soldier comes to take his place. One of the soldiers, as the young ladies passed him, besought them to have the charity to bring him a little water, adding that he was very ill, and that it would be as much as his life was worth to go and fetch it himself. The ladies walked on, much offended at the man for presuming to speak to them, all but the young Englishwoman, whose compassion was moved, and who, leaving her party, procured some water, and brought it to the soldier. He begged her to tell him her name and place of abode; and this she did. When she rejoined her companions, some blamed and others ridiculed her attention to a common soldier, but they soon had reason to lament that they had not been equally compassionate, for the grateful soldier contrived, on the night of the massacre, to save this young Englishwoman, while all the other inhabitants of the house she dwelt in were killed!

The Chinese Court.

The Emperor, in his declining years, is more and more engaged in some religious ceremony or other. When he cannot be present in person at the sacrifices, he despatches a mandarin of high rank to act as his proxy. These particulars are minutely detailed in the Gazette, to show the high sense which the sovereign entertains about temples and images. Taoukwang has addressed a very sensible mandate to the Board of Punishments, exhorting the members to execute strict justice, to be severe against real offenders, and never to compromise the law by partiality or tardiness in executing its behests. The Emperor, to show his sense of the merit of the most deserving courtier, has published a long list of his favorites. Amongst these are only four Chinese, the remainder to judge by the names, are Mantchoos, and three or four Mongols. Pienhang, the former governor of Keang-nan and Keang-se, a general who nobly distinguished himself in the defence of Yarkand, against fearful odds of Usbecks, during the war in Turkistan, has at present great influence at Court, and is frequently called to the Cabinet Council. He is considered to be a straight forward, sincere man, truly attached to Taoukwang. The Monarch recently gave him permission to ride on horseback in the imperial city, an honor only to a very few individuals.—China Mail.

The Tyranny of Fashion.

England would be greater without her fashionable slavery. One would think that, in order to buy their liberty in the gross, the English make themselves slaves in detail—slaves to fashion. The Queen, powerless among her people, is an autocrat in her Court. What brings so many English families to the continent? Various motives, no doubt; but frequently the fear of not being able to shine in England as much as their equals. There is a tendency among certain Englishmen to estimate a man, not by his intrinsic qualities, by his intellectual or moral worth, but by his fortune and his rank Wealth is with them the chief of merits; and when they wish to know a man's standing in society they ask, "What is he worth?"—D Aubigne's "England"

An oration delivered on the 26th July 1849 at the semi-centennial celebration of the Independence of the Republic of Liberia,

By R. L. STRYKER Esq.

Fellow Citizens and my Countrymen.

You are met here to day with one common consent, to celebrate the anniversary of a nation's Independence. Now, the patriotic spirit, would rekindle on the altar of its country, the sacred fire of liberty.—The soul would dilate with honest exultations,—and man for once seem willing to forgive the injuries of the past, that in the present, he may taste in full fruition the joy, which now is rolling over bosoms, that may have been filled, with the tumult of years.

How wonderful is the life of man in the history of the world. He is seen to bear the weighty chains of slavery, or the light and gaudy trappings of the prince. He is the subject doing homage to his fellow, or the King receiving the tribute and power of men like himself, descended to the same Author's sacredness—As a tyrant, he rejoices with the strength of a Hercules to rule creation—as a slave, he revels in eternal delights without the power of a child to rule the inclination of a will given him by his creator—as a freeman, he marks the epoch of each and every remarkable and striking period he has past with delight or pain. He holds a jubilee over his nation's glories, and rejoices like "a strong man to run a race," if it is the victory of a battle field, or "liberty," or "fame," he would celebrate—he recounts the stirring incidents that warm "the life blood of the brave." Does he tell of some other power or providence that sheltered him from the blast, until the storm was over, or some milder glory studding his diadem of national greatness—he would ever speak its praise.

But on this august occasion, I would know what natal day do you commemorate? whose birth-right of liberty do you celebrate? over what trophies of victory do you rejoice, what freemen call their testimony redemption.

But I need not pursue the inquiry. For one glance of the eye, over this vast assembly at once make the truth apparent; that it is none other than Liberia's independence you commemorate—that it is not only the birth-right of this nation, you now celebrate, but to the whole race of Africa, to whom your owe a natural affinity, and to which politically, it is theirs to claim and enjoy. But the trophies, where are they? As far as the human eye can pierce, I behold none—in vain, I look for the spoils of war and the dejected countenances of a captive nation, or fallen glory of tyrants and usurpers of freedom.—Indeed, they are not here, no bloody deeds of wrong, or retribution, stain your national escutcheon, and no slaves mingle in your assembly, for I behold on every brow, the chartered right of Liberty—

Then, in congratulating you on this day of your national independence—a day so auspicious in the annals of time and eventful in its nature to Africa, I would revert the mind through a series of years, as far back as the quarter of a century, and there with the dwellers of the past, bring before your imagination, those days which has reared for the founders of this nation, an imperishable monument of fame—I would presume to speak of times, that has made the hearts of veterans quail, and the tongue of eloquence grow mute—Yea! I would speak, of the Pilgrim Fathers—of moments in an epoch wrought for a people, a name, a country and a home.—I would dwell with pleasure on that heroic valor which fired those patriotic spirits, in that fierce and bloody struggle for possession.—

> It was not the war of conquest Nor sanguinary
> Deeds. For fame and glory to perch upon their banners!
> It was the war of Necessity, that drove our fathers,
> To the purpose. For the savage foe, had mingled
> In their oath for repossession, the extermination
> Of a loved, and patriot band of brothers, dwelling
> Now with purchased right, beneath the portals of a > Sacred liberty,—the storm broke fierce, wild, terrible,
> O'er those devoted heads, that was bared unconciously
> To the blast. Long and bloody was the conflict, and the > Foe had nigh o'er came those chosen few, when invincible > Courage sprung within them. Then convulsive quick, the > Mountain shook. The air grew black, as forth went the belchings
> Of war's most dreaded engines. And Lo! the ensanguined > Foe, lay streched upon the field of death. Nor in that > Desperate struggle of our fathers, did they lose one
> Talised wreath, for which fame decks her chaisel here.
> No! those deeds of valor are chronicled in the world's > Great History. And the conquest, hero's deed may pass > Away in story. While around our fathers imperishable,
> Shall live the hallowed glow, of and unfading glory.

And there I would not cease, I would speak too of other "times that tried men's souls," and won for posterity this glorious day you now celebrate—of events, in which the great and noble sacrifices and efforts of men, have won the praise and admiration of christendom, while our peculiar race, in every clime and country, behold this restoration of their character to men, and in an asylum that more than reaches their most sanguine hopes of success; in the existence of a government, that pays to her own sons the tribute of honor, or metes out to them the measure of its justice, or their blame.—

This has always been the great object of men in every age; to be ruled as a people, with the reservation of the inherent rights, given them by their creator. Though this has been destroyed at times by man, and trampled on with impunity, still it has glowed as a living principle within them.

Thus, governments form striking and moving pictures, in the history of man. There we see the characters of antiquity, stalking over the earth like mighty giants founding and destroying empires, states and kingdoms,—laying waste the habitations of men, and filling the world with the terror of their names.—The moderns are often guilty of not being far behind them, in this evil propensity, though often given to the most noble and magnanimous acts, that the world has ever beheld. The forms of governments, are various and multiform. Yet all are with an avowed purpose, for the happiness of man, seperately and collectively. Which is the most liberal, or most calculated to render equal enjoyment to men.—I will not stop in this place to consider. But the popular and most general one adopted, by a free people is the democratic or republican system, of a free government.—For a people who have obtained their freedom with united efforts, will not tamely bow to all the cringing submission of a tyrant's vassal.—And you citizens have safely adopted the plan of the most free institutions, under which I pray you many long exist.

As this Republic as a germ, flourisheded so rapidly, under the fostering care of benevolence, so now, as the towering oak, deep rooted in the system of a free and independent government, it should withstand the tempests, of the wild tornado, or the scorching blast of the "Torrid" region; and outstrip many more favorite plants of exotic growth, planted in the garden of the world's redemption: and light of knowledge, falling with immediate rays, upon the system of civilization. Yet I am aware you labor under many disadvantages. Indeed, your situation may call forth the scandal of some—the opprobrium of others—while all may fall an easy prey to dissatisfaction. But these state of things are the lot of all new governments. There is none in the history of modern times that have not shared the same fate. Still with energy and decision, accompanied with industry, they have rose to what your behold them. Even France, that old established people, have not escaped the infection under their present system. And so with all untried machinery, when set in motion. At first the parts may not move with designed purpose—there exist the jar or some irregularity of motion, that must be remedied—new parts are to be constructed—changes made while the whole connected, still retain its original principle, and assigned motion: Moving on to the joy of the builder, and conferring blessings on thousands of the human family.

And the change—must be attended, with perplexities, uncertainties and seeming impossibilities, and in short, all that will tend to damp the ardour, of sanguine temperaments

Your liberty, in a pecuniary point of view, has cost you nothing. Other states at the very threshold of their opperations, have had the weight of immense, and increasing debts to accompany their internal operations; while abroad a series of expenditures, have been carried on to maintain, and obtain, an importance in the eyes of the world: during their struggle for self-existence. It seemed their only means of success, in the course they had taken.

For their self-existence, without the countenance of other liberal nations, was not existence of itself. And then having entered in full operation on their independence, palsied with the shock of dissentions, and enervated with a debt of foreign governments, and their own: they have had to sorrow over such lamentable consequences. Nor is that all, there has been sacrificed, on their country's alter, thousands; yea! tens of thousands of their legitimate sons, to accomplish this loved, and avowed desire.

But you my fellow countrymen, have been spared these trials. You have as it were, by magic, rose to the summit of your most cherished hopes, without this load upon you. Yor have not met in your path one threatening object, to bring you in its fatal embraces. Nor has the mighty tide of war,—that common enemy o. mankind.—in protracted blasts, swept over this goodly land.

I would in this place, notice some of the prerequisites or indispensibles, to the existence of a free people. It is industry and enterprise that forms the ground work of their success. Industry must grow out of a natural inclination to labor, and not like the vassal or slave, be compelled to labor for subsistance by the frowns of law, or other menacing powers.

Industry, comprises three department, such as agriculture, manufacture, and commerce: now as these are the chief support of states; it becomes you to look well to the encouragement of these institutions, of domestic wealth and happiness. It has been found, that these seperately or either pursued alone, as a means of independence, has not ensured their prosperity—and hence the joint operations of the three, which has resulted in the blessings bestowed upon so many. Aye! and I may add curse too, on the human family when improperly applied. One of the three departments of industry, most important to you, I am sorry to say, that until of late years, has been wrechedly neglected, although, I would not attach all censure in this to you, knowing the many disadvantages that act against the general system of farming, for the want of requisite means, and implements to till the soil extensively.

My Fellow citizens, as ignorance may be considered one of the primary causes, of dismemberment among free institutions, let it not assail you as a body, in any shape. But let education that beaming star of man's destiny, be ever the guardian of your hopes.

It is the greatest legacy you can bestow upon your children, or distant and future generations. They, will truly rise up in after days, and call you blessed; when the tinsel of gold, may have past from their hand which it had been yours to bestow upon them, or when the pressing claims of their country may call them to exert their talents in her cause. Then, and not until then, if not qualified for leading others, will they feel the neglect most bitterly. Fellow citizens, in this particular discharge your duty to your country, and to your race; if in all the others you fail to meet the expectations of the world, whose eyes are now turned on you. For in doing this you will secure all the other free institutions of your government.

And to consider your position on the earth as a race—peculiar, and distinct, you afford one of the most striking exhibitions, in the history of man. As a race, distinct as the "Jews"—more enslaved as a people—and further lost to the world, as accountable beings living in the blaze of christendom. Though distinct as a race, you have been by crime and avarice, spread over the western hemisphere: and it is curious to note that in that continent alone as a body, and there too for centuries, without breathing the air of freedom. One of the most magnanimous acts of extensive emancipation ever bestowed upon a people, except the restoration of the Jews, after seventy years captivity, was voluntarily conferred upon you as a race, took place in the "West Indies" four hundred years to a day when the first Africans were stolen away into slavery.

Slavery, is a heathenish custom, and if carried on or maintained by any nation in christendom, though the most enlightened, and refined, in every other sense of the word: are the greatest heathens, that the world can produce, because living in all the refinment of the age; they still cling to the last great idol of their hearts adoration; as they are about to turn from paganism, to the light of the world's redemption.

For it is posible for man to be in a state of civilization, without the light of the gospel: as were the Egyptians, Greecians, Persians &c.

My Fellow-citizens you have laid the foundation of a great Republic, destined to civilize and christianize the remote and barbarous tribes of Africa. Twenty-five years have you been laying this foundation, which in the ever memorable year of—47 completed the first epoch in your national history. To charity you owe an immense debt of gratitude, She has called to her aid in the cause of "African colonization," the wisest and best men of the age And it is remarkable to know, that the demands of Charity have been responded to, by far the largest number of men of distinction that she ever before, has been able to bring to bear, in any one matter. Missionary society excepted and other means for the promulgation of the Gospel.

Here, commences a train of unparalleled concurrences, noble in their objects and happy in their results. Here, commences the moral and physical renovation of Africa.

Her sons return from bondage not to mourn over the desolation around; but like the Jews to rebuild the waste places, and rear the temple to the Living God."

In the physical renovation, we see the dense forest disappearing before the tide of civilization—the beauties of nature springing up, beneath the hand of the cultivator, and the works af art, varying with many stupendous works of nature.

In the moral renovation, we behold man standing erect in the image of his Maker,—unknown to any bondage, except his creator—and holding converse with the Revealed Pages, which contain the ultimate destiny of "God's work."

Here, as you advance, will commence the mighty contest of the Redeemer's religion with the Pagan, and Mahometan doctrine, or I should say, the Devil's kingdom on earth which must end, in the rule of God's might Civilization must here take a peculiar feature from what it has taken, among any people in modren times. It will instead of exterminating the barbarous, heathens, bring them into the customs and usages of civilized society. It will teach him arts and sciences, and who will predict, but that he it is, with libertys tamped upon his brow, that shall restore to the world again, the long lost arts and sciences, and call in tones of thunder to d'away Africa, until in the language of one, she "shall be redeemed, regenerated and disenthraled."

The system of your government, is admirably adopted to civilization and christianity. Perhaps none could be better: there are in your midst a body of men, able to christianize, a large portion of this vast peninsula, and that too, effectually. Besides, this Republic affords a protection from, and easy access to, the savages by the American and European missionaries sent to this barbarous land; because if they teach in your territories, or near your borders, or even with those you treat with, it is in your power to extend assistance, in time of need, and show the hospitality of a people in saving them from many trials, that they have experienced in other fields of missionary labor.

If the calculations of the past, can be a criterion for the future, a quarter of a century more, under your present system, will extend your influence in a hundred percent ratio, west of this across the ocean on the land that has shared largely in making you the enslaved of four hundred years—the accursed of man from time immemorial, and I trust, will make you again in the eyes of the world, men endowed with the faculty of self-government, which so happily already is established. East-ward in a direct course, as your strike the bounds of the great "Sahara" you will descend as it were, and actually, from the mountains of the "Moon" as a mighty avalanch, torn from the summit, engulphing all in the valey below: and spreading terrors over the adjacent wilds of Africa.

Then, indeed, then, the Mahometan shall be awed, as he behold one from the region of christendom—one more fierce, and warlike, than himself, (though for a better purpose and nobler end) planting the "Lone Star" the hue of millions on the barren plains, where thousands of Afric's sons lie bleaching:

> Unsepulchered, unknown, uncared for they lie.
> Forgoten, unsought, they were left there to die.
> With the fierce stranger, or the world's waste to roam.

Yes! there as a mighty chieftian born to rule, you shall heral'd as it were, the world's account of wrong, and demand, a restitution for your race.

Then you shall see in turn the "Cresent" wane, and the followers forsake the bounty of the chase, and plunder of the happy vale.

North, and south, along your shores, shall commence and spread to the gale, the white winged "barque" skilled by the hand of your artist, careering proudly on the ocean's limpid waters by the rule of the mariner's assured guide, as from his loved and only shore the last fragrant spicy breezes fill his sails and wafts him from her view. And when returned she must be laden with the good of every clime, to feast the appetite or satiate the soul, you in your own right, shall be the pride of nations,—the pomp of princely grandure, and the far famed sons, of Apollo's glory.

ARTICLE X.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA LIBERIA, SEPTEMBER 28, 1849

The College.

In our last, we referred to the contemplated college, intended to be established in Liberia, by our friends in the U. States. We did not then advance any opinion as to the results likely to flow from an institution of that kind, indeed, to have done so, would have been in us an act of supererogation. And we are not willing to be charged with doing more than duty requires of us.

The people of Liberia will no doubt have a proper estimation of the importance of a well established college, where the youths will have the advantages of procuring a suitable education, to fit them to discharge honorably the several stations they may be called upon to occupy in the government, or in other places of trust and responsibility; and it should be the height of our ambition to encourage every effort that may be made to have the education of our youths perfected upon the soil of Liberia—in the government which they are expected to support, and to assist in rearing to an exalted position. This is our opinion, which we freely advance, and will always maintain.

It would be premature in us to hazard a suggestion as to the mode of an institution of the kind, ought to be conducted—in fact we are so little acquainted with the government of educational establishments, as to be utterly unable to make a single recommendation, but we will wait with becoming patience to observe the plans of our patrons. It will not be out of place, we hope, to throw out a suggestion as to the location of the college. We presume it will be for the general benefit of the people of Liberia, if so, its location should be at, or as near as possible to a central point, where it would be equally convenient for the people of any of the counties. Objections may be raised to the situation of the establishment being somewhat remote from the most populous parts; but this ought not to be. We are not informed that it is customary for such institutions to be in a town, or in close proximity to one; indeed, if we remember correctly, the contrary is usually the case. We have no prejudices to gratify; our sole aim is to have the institution so located and managed, as to gain for it the good will of every person in Liberia—to have it known as the property of the people, with proper restrictions and regulations. And in furtherance of our plan, we would have it placed under the immediate control of the government,—this would be attaching to it an importance which it might not otherwise obtain; and would be the surest guarantee that the objects contemplated by its worthy patrons would be fully carried out.

It is rumored, that it is more than probable that Grand Cape Mount will again be the theatre of a long and devastating war. It is said that Mamorah the murderer of the late Prince Cain, who had sought refuge with some of the interior tribes from the vengeance of the brother of the murdered Prince, is raising a large force to usurp the sovereignty of the country. If this be true our government ought to adopt measures to prevent such a catastrophe—as it has obtained political jurisdition over the country, and consequently should not permit it to be disturbed by wars. Virtually our government is responsible for the good behaviour of the turbulent chiefs in that district of country.

Our readers will perceive that "Alpha" is somewhat displeased with us for referring to his communication in our last number. We were not aware in doing so, that we pursued an unusual course, and until we are better infomed, nothing that Alpha has said on the subject will prevent us making such observations on communications sent to our office, as we may think proper.

On our second page, our readers will find our treaty with England.

Captain Dunlop, Commandindg the British Naval forces on the northern station, has succeeded in an arrangement with the chiefs of the Gallenas for the abolition of the slave trade in their dominion. They have delivered to Captain Dunlop all the Spaniards who were engaged in the traffic, some 42 in number, and they have been sent to Sierra Leone. The chiefs also agreed to give up the slaves belonging to the Spaniards, numbering some two thousand, but at our last advices they had not been delivered.

We hope there may be no more trading in slaves in that neighborhood, but we are fearful that it may again be revived. Very little confidence is to be placed on treaty stipulations with the African for the abolition of the slave trade.

Naval

On the 16th inst: the U. S. Ship Decatur Commander Edward Byrne, arrived from a cruise on the leeward coast.

The Decatur left on the 21st: for Porto Praya. All well.

H. Majesty's Steam sloop Teazer, arrived on the 16th inst: from Sierra Leone. Sailed for the Gallenas on the 18th.

Liberia Packet.

The Liberia Packet arrived from Baltimore on the 18th ult: after a passage of 49 days. Passgers Rev. Mr. Bastian, Sup: Miss: of the M. E. Church, Rev. R. R. Gurley, H. Teage, and Mrs. Russwurm; and twenty immigrants for this place and Cape Palmas. We are pleased to say that the latter are of the right sort, and promise an accession to our intellectual and industrial strength. Mr. Gurley, meeting with many with whom he was personally acquainted, and others with whom he formerly held friendly correspondence, was received with the cordiality, which old acquaintance and, faithful service inspire. He returns in the Packet. Sincerely do we hope he may be spared to go back to his country in the fulness of health, and be enabled to lift up his voice in Africa's cause. Possessed of an honest and benevolent heart—a buoyant, enthusiastic spirit, a clear and discriminating judgment, and of manly eloquence, we know of no one, of whose active services more can be augured than of his. We are happy to tell our readers that our old friend D. Hall, late Col: Office, is well and active; and in spite of all the complaints alledged against him, is giving himself more trouble and anxiety to accommodate the people here, in their multiform requests and orders than we would to accommodate each other. We testify what we have seen. But more anon.

Pursuant to notice given to the inhabitants of this, and the upper settlements, the people met on Monday the 24th of September, in the M. E Church in this place, to receive Rev. Mr. Gurley, and to listen to such remarks as he might think proper to make, touching the present condition and future prospects of the Republic.

Rev. Mr. Bastian opened the proceedings, by an appropriate and affecting prayer. The meeting was then organized by the appointment of Mr. S. Benedict Chairman, and Mr. H. Teage Secretary.

The Chairman as soon as he had taken the chair announced the purpose of the meeting, and invited Mr. Gurley to proceed.

The Rev. gentleman arose, under strong emotions, and glanced rapidly at the past history of the colony—paid an eloquent and affecting tribute to the memory of Ashmun and Cary, and Johnson, and their worthy coadjutors—contrasted the present condition of the place, with what it was when, twenty five years ago he stood beside Ashmun on this hill, and conferred with him as to the best manner to preserve from total extinction, the spark which christian heroism and liberality had kindled here, and declared that the result compared with the means, was to him a source, not only of gratification, but of astonishment. He then proceeded to suggest some improvement; and urged with great earnestness the attention of the people to education, and concluded by declaring his firm conviction that the tree of liberty and religion is fixed in a congenial soil—that it is destined to extend its boughs until it shall throw a refreshing shade over the length andbreadth of Africa.

The Rev. gentleman then took his seat, when the following resolutions presented by President Roberts, and seconded by Colonel Yates, were unanimously adopted.

Resolved—,that the thanks of this meeting be, and they are hereby tendered to Rev. Mr. Gurley for the kind and able manner in which he has addessed us on this occasion—for the frankness with which he has explained the objects of his present visit to Liberia, and for the assurance of his deep interest in the future welfare and prosperity of this infant Republic.

Resolved—that we are deeply sensible of the many obligations we are under to Rev. Mr. Gurley for past services in the cause of Colonization—for the deep interest he has always manifested in behalf of our oppressed race—and especially for his devotedness, through a period of more than a quarter of a century, to the interests of Liberia.

Resolved—Unanimously that the thanks of this meeting be, and the same are hereby tendered to Rev. Mr. Gurley for his untiring exertions—though prosecuted under many discouragements—in advancing the intrest of Liberia; and that he be assured of the high esteem and respect in which he is held by the Citizens of this Republic, and that they will ever remember with greatful hearts his christian and philanthropic efforts in the cause of humanity and religion.

Resolved That a Committve of five be appointed by the chairman to confer with Rev. Mr. Gurley; and to answer such questions as he may wish to propound to them in the furtherance of the object of his mission; and that said committee be requested to collect specimens of nature or of art, which may be of interest to present to Mr. Gurley on his return from Cape Palmas.

The chairman appointed H. Teage, B. V. R. James, A. D. Williams, E. W. Baker and A. Blackledge.

The meeting then adjourned

For the Liberia Herald.

Messrs Editors:—In your last number there is a communication from Elder A. P. Davis, which deserves a moment's notice. The article was of course written for effect in America—for what other object could the writer have had. For surely his traveling and preaching will not by any one here, be thought extraordinary—seeing, he is paid to do so: and seeing further, that others have done it, and still do it, without fee or reward;—and seeing still further, "that Monrovia is one of our stations." When was Monrovia made one of Elder Davis's stations? By the board at Richmond—by Elder Day; or merely by the dictum of Elder Davis? I certainly for one, have no objection that it should be made one, and then I could only wish that a man could be found to visit it, "having weight of character—upright himself—understanding the doctrine he imparts to others," and enabled by having the confidence of the world, and of the brethren, among the stately fabbes, as well as by living in peace with them, "to correct, rebuke and reprove in righteousness." But enough of this: Verbum sat. Now for the discoveries—and this was, that all the churches in Montserrado County, need good undershepherds. Coming as Elder Davis did, from another county, this statement must be regarded an invidious comment—and under the circumstances, —however designed, a most unworthy and simple one. That the churches here need good undershepherds, I will not deny; but will Elder Davis say the churches in Bassa do not need them? I would not hastily words. I will state facts. The increase in some of the churches in Monserrado County, in the space of about two years, has been from one third to one half their present number, and a sweeping revival was going on up to only a few weeks before Mr. Drayton arrived here from America. What increase has been made to the churches in the other counties? We would like to know. If the want of faithful pastoral oversight is to be determined by the stationary or onward condition of the churches, Elder Davis has only to count the present number of his flock, and compare it with the date of its constitution, to be compelled in charity to apply his remark elsewhere, besides to the churches here.

The second discovery, and the most important, was the "people of Monrovia cannot be taught by any one less informed than themselves." Mirabile dictu. Wisdom cannot learn from ignorance! Sublime discovery!! But is he sure his discovery is a truthful one. I subscribe to the general correctness of the remark: but there may be exceptions: and if I did not love the brother too much, I would employ a part of his communication as a proof of it. I conclude by joining brother Davis in the invocation "that the God of churches, and missions will bless, (as I am not selfish, and all need a blessing)—all the churches, in Montserrado and Bassa too and increase their number, and make them a hundred times so many as they be, and fill all the stations with good, humble unostentatious men.

Yours,

THEOPHILUS.

For the Liberia Herald.

Messrs Editors.—Sirs, in the June number of your monthly chronicle, appeared an article entitled "Reviewer Reviewed" of which Citizen of the World was the author, in reply to an article which appeared in "Africa's Luminary," signed "Reviewer," descanting in a most unchristian manner upon an article which appeared in the February number of the same periodical on "Christian Perfection" written by Rev H. W. Ellis. In what measure "Reviewer" executed his purpose in his review, I leave the intelligent public to determine.

In the August number of the "Luminary" appeared on editorial by the editor who here felt himself more capable at this stage than ever, to appear before the publice with a column of senseless subterfuge.

The article on Christian Perfection by the Rev. H. W. Ellis, as I before remaked was submitted for publication upon request, but why the article appeared before the public without the author's name, I known not, but his name was withheld. The Editor of the "Luminary" attempts to deny that the article was solicited, by saying "the last Annual Conference appointed him to take charge of the "Luminary" in February for the remainder of the year 1849 &c." With that we have nothing to do; because the Annual Conference in their appointment of the Editor knew well "that a pigmy would be a pigmy still, though perched upon the Alps." The circumstances leading to his appointment were unavoidable,—the former Editor (Rev. J. S. Payne) having been removed to Bassa County, as Preseding Elder of that district, which necessarily compelled them to give that responsible post, to that domestic prodogy.

Readers the piece on Christian Perfection in question, of which the Rev. Mr. Ellis is author, by solicitation, was given for publication in the columns of the "Luminary," and accordingly placed among the papers of that office. It then legally became the property of the office, and its publication would certainly ensue, when those concerned thought proper; and all Mr. Ellis had to do, was to await its appearance, however distant, before the public. The Editor of the "Luminary" acknowledges asking the Printer for an article for the "Luminary," he produces the piece on "Christian Perfection" by Rev. H. W. Ellis, the Editor readily accepts it and ordered its immediate preparation for the columns of the "Luminary" and published the same. Now readers what it here evinced? Is it not mutuality in nature, and sollcitation in principle? There can be nothing else: and against what principle contained in the piece entitled "Reviewer Reviewed," is he writing? Does he wish to deny even the piece appearing in his columns? I can comprehend nothing else, nor can any unbiased mind comprehend it an any other light, but such a narrowly capacitated individual as the Editor. I fear that this hypocondriac will do himself some serious injury. "We have nothing to do with the Review" that appeared in the Luminary of June 13 on said article." The Editor of the "Luminary" asserts that he had nothing to do with the "Review." How much truth there are in the assertion; after some remarks, reader you will determine. He, the Editor of the "Luminary" must have read the "Reviewer," in copy and corrected it in proof, he received it, and ordered it to be prepared in the columns of the "Luminary" for publication; but he boldly asserts that he had "nothing to do with it." There was no no other channel for it to go through and find itself in the columns of "Africas Luminary" but in and through the Editor. About the piece on "Perfection" he is as wise as a serpent, but about "Reviewer," he is as harmless as a dove—knows nothing,—what simplicity—just such as the serpent evinced to Eve and ruined the world of mankind—just such simplicity by which he will ruin all with whom he may associate. "But with the "Citizen of the World" we would advise him to remove from "Liberia," if he is any where in it as this social climate is not so congenial with the peculiar propensity that he appears to be so remarkably addicted with. The Editor of the "Luminary" advises that Citizens of the World should leave Liberia if he is any where in it; very-good indeed. Because when truth in a minister becomes burried, (for in this town the congregation he is pastor of is the largest, and certainly, the most detriorating influence will be felt among the greatest number) it is time, not only for the Citizen of the World to leave, but every one else. And as regards the "congeniality of this social climate, being not adapted to Citizen of the World;" good again—for when envy in a christian Editor has hid itself, who could live in such foul air caused by such foul mouth vituperation in a gospel minister.

"As an excathedra of all who may hail by that most unenviable epithet, it is derived from the Latin, and cathedra from the Greek; but as I am neither a Latin, nor Greek scholar, and consider myself very dificient, in my own vernacular though my antagonist may "stand the plans proud pillar," and exaltingly say "shout all ye gods,"—there was a constable some time since sent to arrest a person, but unfortunately he failed to do so, he having a great idea of the dignty of his office of thief catching like our "exathedra friend, of his Latin profession was anxious to make his returns in Latin, wrote the following sentence on the back of the writ "non est come atebus, et railum swampo." The good Magistrate under this circumstance was compelled to scratch his head, for sometimes he thought it meant one thing and then another, until he finally gave it up and asked the constable to explain the unintelligible sentence, when he translated it thus "non est come atebus means I could not catch the scoundrel, "et railum swampo' means he crossed the swamp on a rail." Under this consideration of that part of the subject whenever there occurs a vacancy in the language profession, I will recommend him for the situation.

Again he assails the Rev. Mr. Ellis who had nothing to do with the matter in dispute, no father than the piece on "Christian Perfection" concerns which was published in the February number of the Luminary. The Editor of the "Luminary" acknowledges thepiece to be good in its tendency, and virtuous in its principles, and that he gave an editorial article soliciting his brethern to write and thanking Mr. Ellis for the same, and frankly acknowledges soliciting the piece, for he says he "thanked brother Eillis" for the piece in question." We think very hard of the Rev. Mr. Ellis because he knowing this publication to be false, and not having corrected it before this time." Mr. Editor charity begins at home; you suffered to appear in the columns of "Africars Luminary" a paper entire christian in its principle, supported by a christian society in the U. S. for the purpose of disseminating the truth of the gospel in this heathen land, an article libelous in its character, touching nothing in principle and fact of the subject matter of the piece, on "Christian Perfection," signed Reviewer" but very "pragmatically" avows your innocency. "I have nothing to do with the Review that appeared in the Luminary of June 13 on the said article." What subterfuge, what senseless diatribe in the Editor of the Luminary. It do appear to us that Mr. Ellis is equally as guity of falsehood as the Citizen of the World, as the Citizen of the World has lied in his defence." How can the editor make it appear that the Rev. Mr. Ellis is guilty of falsehood; Mr. Ellis's piece on Christian Perfection, had reference to no particular denomination, he was not holding up his own faith and putting down any other, but tells the editor, as well as others, that without holiness of heart no man shall see God. Mr. Ellis has had nothing to do with the matter in question, he has neither aided, nor abetted in it. Now in what manner is he guilty of falsehood? This libelous asssertion made by the Editor, of the "Luminary" is characteristic of himself, for certainly Jack will not forget his trade. And so it seem to be with him, he think every one like himself "fabricating in great wickedness, such foul mouthed vituperation" upon the Rev. H. W. Ellis. Messrs. Editors, since virtue in the christian Editor has gone begging, and his conscience nailed to the wall, what can you expect more than to hear, and see appear in the colums of the Luminary, such a wicked and calumniating article which certainly will prove to the disvalue of his reputation?

For the Liberia Herald.

Messrs Editors:—Sirs, I read with much attention the communication in your last number (July) from Rev. B. J. Drayton, Cape Palmas. The subject of introducing civilization and christianity among the heathens particularly those in the neighborhood of Liberia is a matter which I take a lively interest in—indeed I hold it to be the bounden duty of our government to adopt every practicable expedient to bring the surrounding tribes as speedily as possible under the influences of christianity and civilization. It is policy to do so. The interests of the state demand that it should be done; to say nothing of our duty as individuals, to foster overy means within our reach, for the enlightening of our race. Mr Drayton seems to entertain similar views and hence the recommendations he makes in his communication. He says, that "the most ready way to accomplish the objects in consideration, is for the government to make roads into the interior, that the missionary and the merchant may travel side by side; &c, &c. And that there will be security for the missionary and the merchant, because the Africans will know that they are under the protection of government, &c. &c." I do not wish to say a word that will obviate the least from Mr. D's. views—his letter in general is worthy of being attentively perused, and it will advantage many if the principles it contained are adhered to. Mr. Drayton is known to be a consistent minister of the gospel, zealous for the conversion of his fellow creatures to christianity, and it is believed that he is truly sincere in all his propositions for that effect. I must, notwithstanding, decline falling in with his views; and so will every one I think, who have given the matter matured consideration. At this time of day, it is preposterous to imagine that missionaries, (I allude to those persons who are employed by religious societies in the U. S. to teach and preach in Liberia,) are to be depended upon to effect this most important and desirable object. I say it is perfectly absurd to imagine such an idea, much more to believe it. Daily observations teaches the people of Liberia that themselves do more in their families in furtherance of civilization and christianization of the heathen, a hundred fold more, than do the operations of all the different missionaries combined. I do not pretend to any knowledge of the success of missionaries in other lands. I have read many of their reports, and if they are to be relied upon, then the missionaries in Liberia have the name only, and not the talisman that gains success. Scores of thousands of dollars are expended annually in Liberia for the support of "missionaries," and what is effected by it? I reply nothing—litterally nothing; when leaving out of the consideration the advantges gained by the people by the expenditure of the money. I make no charges against the "missionaries" among them; I number some of my warmest friends; but I am a Liberian, and feel deeply interested in every thing that concerns it. It is our duty to watch every movement that is made for the advancement of our country, and when conclusions are assumed and advocated, that will not bear fairly on subjects effecting the interests of the country, we ought to speak out. I take the liberty of doing so, in denying in plain terms, that any material advantage is to be derived from missionaries in Liberia. The missionaries know this themselves. If any suppose I have erred in what I have said, I would suggest, that at once, without delay, that the number of African children in the different families in Liberia be counted—those of them who can read,—those who have learned some useful occupation, and those who have made a profession of religion. Let each class be added up separately; and then send some persons, who are entirely disinterested, to the mission stations to make similar count, and every body will see that I make no exaggeration, when I say that no material advantage is to be derived from the employment of persons as missionaries to the Africans in Liberia. And the money thus lavishly expended for their support is wasted. But this state of things can be altered—altered for great good, in many respects: but I will not now enter into full particulars. I may do so hereafter. It is sufficient for the present, that a suggestion be made for the different missionary societies in the United States—to place into the hands of the government of Liberia the money they expend annually in Liberia for missionary purposes, with the understanding that the government will employ it for the civilzation of the aborigines of the country. It cannot be doubted, that the government have greater interests at stake, in wishing the civilization and christianization of the Africans, than the missionary societies can possibly have. As Liberia marches onward, so ought her sons—if they are permitted to live on in their untutored state, the country will not, cannot advance with that strength which it should. In fact, the Executive of Liberia and its Legislature will be much more adequate to form plans for successfully bringing the heathens under the rods of christianity, than any body or institution can be.

I have written more than I at first intended, and lengthy communications, I know are not often read. I am not sure that my style of writing will be agreeable to your many readers. A number of years have gone by since I sent a communication to your paper, but if I have any reason to suppose that this will be recieved, I may write shortly, giving more minute particulars of the subject, I now touch upon.

ALPHA.

Messrs Editors:—I wish you to consider this a post script, to my communication, which I certainly expected to find in your last number, August,—but instead of it you make an editorial notice, animadverting upon it, in a very strange manner, which I think was very inconsiderate in you. If you had published the communication, and then referred to it. I would not have been surprised;—the course you adopted, was in my opinion entirely unwarranted, and intended, I believe, to encourage hostility to it.

Messrs Editors:—Sirs, Mr. Leiper, more ambitious to aspire to the vacancy occasioned by the death of Senator Prout, in the Senate;—than evidens to get wood, or pretice virtue. This want of virtue is alike evinced both by the report that he came to Liberia tied, or ironed as well as his nameless subsequent conduct in Liberia. This man would excite a crade against me for not taking the currency more than others will take it of me: that he may upon this hobby, get into the Senate.

I need but to be convinced that I act unjustly, ungraciously, or unnaturally towards any person or thing, to obandon my course. Enough for the present. I will endeavor to so arrang it as to take it.

A Distinction with a Difference—A witness was lately called upon to define, what was a 'young female human being,' and what was the distinction between her and a 'young lady.' He gave the following reply.

A young female human being wears pinafores, long frocks, check aprons, eats large quantities of bread and butter, giggles at the boys, begs wax dolls, and plays 'puss in the corner,' and chickeny, chickeny crany crow'—whilst a young lady carries her hair done up behind; reads Byron and Bulwer; wears bazarines from Madame. Voizin's; eschews pantalets; casts her eyes down at the sight of young gentlemen; has a small appetite, chiefly confined to salads and sweetmeats; and generally, when there's room enough, sits at the first table.'—Exmin r

Obeying Orders.—While lying in a Southern port some years since the master of a vessel belonged to New England smoked her out for the purpose of destroying rats. The next morning about a dozen of these long tailed gentry were found and brought on deck. Their fat and sleek appearance evinced that they had been well cared for by themselves, if not by others. The steward came aft, and pointing to the heap, inquired of the captain what should be done with them.

"Done with them?" responded the captain, who was something of a wag, "why make them into a stew."

Nothing more was said by either party on the subject at the time. Several gentlemen had been invited on board to dine upon squirrels, which the captain and a friend, who was a good marksman, had "barked" the day before. Dinner was served up in good style, and the appetites of all did justice to the fare; but most of the party preferred them made into a stew to any other way.

"Steward," exclaimed the captain, as he was changing the dishes preparatory to setting on the pastry, "can't you give us just such a stew tomorrow! You know there are some of the squirrels left.

"Didn't make dat out ob squirrels, sir," replied the African, with a hesitating attempt to smile, but which was kept back by a slight tremor.

"What then!" inquired the captain, quickly.

"Why, sir, ob de rats, as you ordered me to."—Examiner.

THE LONE STAR.

The lone star's ray
Brings opening day
To her sons afar
The heathen king
His tribute bring
As those who christ'ans are.

The lone star's beam
Shall e'er be seen
To o'r freeman wave
For should it fall
There'll come the pall
That falleth o'er the grave.

Lone star of hope
A nation's prop
Thou shalt be forever
When thy deeds are old
Then shalt grow bold
With less endeavor.

The lone star's name
Shall shine in fame
With deeds of glory
Its every power
In every hour
Shall tell its story.

Yea! Africa!
Thy star Liberia
Sets in thy dark crown
Like lights of pearl
And by the world
Is called thine own.

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Liberia Herald

An extract of the account of the war expedition marched against the Kings of New Cesters and Trade Town, and the Spaniards residing in those territories, for the purpose of buying slaves, as given by J. C. Minor, Adjutant of the first Regiment.

(Concluded.)

On Monday morning the 19th inst about 4 o'clock, A M. the line was formed and we marched off from Old Peter's for Trade Town; and after a steady march in a serpentine route, over hills—over rocks—through valleys—through plains—and through the dark and dense woods, until 7 o'ecl A. M. when we arrived at our destined place. As we were approaching the town, we were met by two Herculean looking men bearing white flags, accompanied by a motley cavalcade, who pretended to be the representatives of the Trade Town People. The General and his army approached—was kindly received (without thanks, however, to the inhabitants) and the men quartered. The Steamer and Yorktown anchored off Trade Town, near about the time we arrived there. President Roberts took passage on board the steamer to Trade Town. He came on shore as soon as she anchored; and immediately he despatched messengers to Prince Bonyar's town, inviting the Prince to meet him on the beach, and to deliver up the slaves belonging to the Spaniard. The slaves were sent—but the Prince declined visiting the beach; from fear he said. The President was very desirous of seeing him:—the General having known the Prince for more than sixteen years, thought he might influence him to meet the President:—went off with two guides to visit his majesty. He had not been gone but a very few minutes, when the President directed a detachment of 50 men under command of Lieutenant Colonel Washington, to follow him, to be in readiness, in case of treachery The General did not succeed in getting the Prince to the beach:—but agreed upon a plan to meet the President some 3 miles from the beach the next morning

On Wednesday the 21st: President Roberts being conducted by two guides, and accompanied by a detachment, of 50 men under command of Colonel Weaver, met the Royal Prince at the appointed place He succeeded in effecting a treaty with Prince, which is of incalculable good;—but it is not proper for me to mention it here. The most that can be said of that part of Trade Town territory is, that it is a beautiful country, and abounds in Palm Oil, that much desired commodity. After remaining at Trade Town from Monday the 19th, until Wednesday the 21st, without sustaining the smallest injury, or even having to encounter a single hostile movement:—orders were given for embarkation, and we embarked on board the Steamer and schr. Herald. The President went on board of the Yorktown. The boats belonging to the Yorktown, were in attendance on, and assisted in the embarkation of the troops. As soon as the embarkation was over, we got under weigh, and stood away for Grand Bassa, As the steamer was whilling with speed by the Yorktown, three loud cheers were given in congratulation of our wonderful success; which was responded to, by our soldiers and the sailors of the steamer. We arrived in the harbor of Grand Bassa on Wednesday night and anchored.

On Thursday morning the 22nd: we landed at Bassa Cove. While our men were landing a white flag was floating on the gentle zephers, at the top of a long pole planted on the beach, in front of Grando's town, known by the name of Fish town. The landing having been over, the line was formed and marched up in the settlement, and the men quartered.

The Yorktown sailed from Trade Town for Monrovia, with the President.

On Friday the 23rd, inst. about 12 o'clock, the line was formed, and at half past 1 o'clock P. M. the army marched off in the direction of Prince Wee's town. The General was told that the distance to Wee's was about 15 miles;—that the preachers who had been in the habit of going there to preach, had frequently walked there in five hours;—and it was entertained that the army could travel it in six hours But this was rather a mistake; so unwieldy a body as our army was, carrying along with them the munitions of war, and our stores, could not move with the same velocity as an individual traveler.—Yet, notwithstanding, the army moved on in as hurriedly a manner as possible along a narrow crooked-path,—through thickets—through plains—up and down hills, in order to get to our destined place before night fall. Not long after we left the Cove, we arrived at a native town, which was deserted by the inhabitants;—but the name of the proprietor is unknown to us. Here we made no delay, but passed on; and after a few more hours regular tramping, we came next to Softly John's town. It being late in the afternoon, a halt was made on the right of the line to get water, I believe, but the General advancing from his post in the centre, ordered the right to move on. This had been a beautiful and well constructed town in its day, but at the time of the egress of the Liberian army, it was on the retrogade, and was fast tumbling back to ruin.—The remaining houses were shaded by the umbrageous branches of three or four huge cotton trees; whose towering heads have witnessed many howling blasts of the tornado. On our nearing the town, the occupants fled, and took refuge in the neighboring wilds; but finding that no disposition prevailed on the part of the army to trouble them, nor to destroy their town, they began one by one to approach the town; for Softly John and his people had been regarded as friends, and not enemies. Much more might be said of this interesting place, but we proceed. The army proceeded on in a serpentine path-way until near day-light down, in hopes of soon arriving at Prince Wee's; when we arrived at Duargy's town, alias John Prince. The General and his army was courteously received by His Royal Highness, John Prince, who assigned the General the largest house in his town for his quarters' The General gave orders for the men to be quartered, and we camped there that night. John Prince is a very intelligent looking young man, and seem to possess a mind susceptible of great improvement. He is a tall well made man, carrying a commanding but pleasant countenance. While journeying from Softly John's to John Prince's, we passed through several native villages; all them, however, except one, were deserted by their timid inhabitants. At the one that was not deserted, we met with a few natives, two of whom were bearing white flags;—of some one of them, the General enquired how far was it to Prince Wee's town; the answer was, "It be long way, no more he no be long too much." This was not the pleasantest answer we have heard; for we had already marched a good distance, and then it being made to appear that we had a still greater distance to go, was some what irksome.

On Saturday the 24th, our line was formed, and we proceeded on our march to Prince's; and after about two hours and a half steady march, the army arrived near Prince's barricaded town, and at once his warriors opened a tremendous fire upon our men, but to no effect, not a man fell:—the army advanced and surrounded the barricade. The fearful warriors beholding our rapid rush, deserted their supposed strong fortress, and betook themselves to the thick foliage of the trees and bushes that was near by; and from their concealments they kept up a brisk fire of musketry for some minutes.—but our men returning it with equal briskness, and in heavier vollies, which caused the enemy to desist, and to seek some more secure place of safety. It had been reported that Prince Wee had promised to give us battle in the manner and way that he did; and "that if he could not beat back the Liberian army, he intended to go back himself;" which he and his forces did do, and that hastily. It is altogether uncertain with regard to the number of his forces, but it is certain that they were numerous, because it had also been reported that all the disappointed tribes and parties, had combined, and were determined to dispute our entrance at the barricade.

After we had beaten back the enemy and taken possession of their town, and on the eve of perparing for camping that night, for such was the intention, I believe of our General:—a plunderer searching the houses for plunder, while the rest of the men were on the look-out for the enemy, came cross a box in one of the houses, which he thought was a booty, and immediatly seized it to carry it away, but, lo! to his sad surprise, it was a booty of "Bees," which had no doubt been shut up, and kept in reserve for us, provided that we overpowered the Prince and forces;—no sooner had the plunderer clutched the box, than he had to let it go again, and in an instant his head was covered with the humming tribe, and he running for life, and in a few moments the town was filled with bees, and nearly the whole army was engaged in the bee warfare; at that time there was no need of musket, powder nor ball:—but twigs of bushes and handkerchiefs seem to have been the necessary implements.—It was really laughable to see the prostrated and crouching position of the officers and men in the beey contest.—Some were prostrated on the ground at length, trying to bury their heads, and imploring mercy—others had gathered themselves up into very small compasses, and were endeavoring to secret themselves form the keen and piercing eyes of the bees, behind plantian stalks—small saplins and huge turfs of grass; and "where were you? says one; I was posted by the side of a small siant, peeping through its scanty leaves—other were flying in diferent directions, uttering bitter imprecations.

The terrifying confusion having abated, the General called a counsel of war, at which it was concluded most expedient to return to John Prince's. Of this place, but little can be said. I did not have a fair opportunity of taking a survey of it;—but as far as I am able to judge of what I saw, it was a beautiful town, and situated on an eminence overlooking the adjacent praire. Our line was formed and marched out side of the barricade, and haltted; and after consigning Prince Wee's beautiful town to the flames, which was soon reduced to ashes, we proceeded to John Prince's. The foiled party became so exasperated at beholding the murkey smoke of their burning town, curving in the air, which could be seen a great way off, that they rallied their forces and pursued us, and kept up an annoying fire in our rear for several miles. Soon after the arrival of the army at John Prince's, a messenger from Prince Wee, accompanied by one bearing a white flag, with a message of compromise—imploring pardon and promising to give up the Spaniard that he had been protecting. The General and his army remained encamped there until Sunday, during which time one of the Spaniards who had been living for a long time in that section of the country, made his meager and ghostly appearance.

On Sunday the 25th, inst. very early in the morning our line was formed, and we set off for Bassa Cove, where we arrived a little after mid-day

In the after part of the day, General J. N. Lewis, went over the river, accompanied by Colonels B. P. Yates, and W. L. Weaver; Lieutenant Colonels J. W. Prout, J. D. Washington; and N. M. Hicks—Majors D. B. Brown and S. A. Benson all in full uniform;—thus making an imposing military display

On Monday the 26th inst. at the hour of 3 o'clock P. M. the officers of our brigade and Captain Villmaine and officers of the Espredon, sat down to a sumptuous dinner well served up, gotten up at the expense of the inhabitants of Bassa. The table was spread in a street at Bassa Cove, under a shaded arbor that had been erected for the purpose. General Lewis headed the table, supported on the right by Captain Villemain and Colonel Yates, and on the left by Colonels Weaver and Prout. The guests rose from the table about 5 o'clock P. M.

On Tuesday morning the 27th, the line was formed and marched to the landing place, for embarkation, after which the troops embarked on board of the Espredon The embarkation having been completed, she got under weigh, and that night she anchored in Monrovia harbor.

On Thursday morning the 28th, the troops were landed—the line formed and marched to the M. E. Church, where prayers were offered to the God of heaven and of nations, for His kind and watchful protection over our army, while traversing the wilds of Africa, to put down, and drive far away from our borders, that notorious traffick—the slave trade; and to aid in preparing the way for the spread of the gospel of the blessed Son of God, and the erection of Emanuel's kingdom. The exercises in church being over, we were formed and marched to the parade-ground, and after hearing a short address from the Vice President, (the President being absent on a tour to Grand Cape Mount in the U. S. Ship Yorktown, on business of importance,) and receiving from the General his complimentory thanks to the officers and men for their firm and prompt attention to every order given by him during the campaign, we were dismissed;—all rushed home to embrace their families.

General Lewis has won for himself, by his wonderful exploits, a laurel that will long sit perched on his brow, in conducting the Liberia army through so many dangerous routes while prosecuting the warfare they were engaged in, and bringing back the whole number of men that went with him, except two who died of lingering complaints.

"DATA."

Messers Editors:—Sirs, our excellent constitution, grants the "liberty of the press," for the discussion of all public matters interesting to the people. Data has come out boldly, if not discreetly. His language is tolerably respectable; and it is hope will become more so. As the meanest babe in legal science, we wish to sit at his feet for instruction. As a "Justice of the peace" we feel a little concerned. It is a matter that should not be unadvisedly done, this calling in question, the recommending, and appointing powers, wisdom, and patriotism in making for the conservators of the peace, "a set of the supra vulgar family" of magistrates to assist their chief in the offices of State It is still a query: whose fault is it? The "knotty problem" is not yet solved by Data. We differ from him as to some of the doctrines, and the result of the doctrines as held forth in his 1st. query. It is doubted whether all the returns did come in unconstitutionaly. And if contrary, both to precedent and usage in Liberia, and doubted as being the true interpretation of the law of an election s Why should the people who made no provisions for blunders in the returns of elections, by the framers of the constitution, suffer from such blunders. No election need be run over now, any more than heretofore to make the men who are the choice of the whole or of a majority of the people, are the proper men to serve. If the doctrine of "Data" be correct, the blunders wilful of his "supra vulgar family" of judgess may keep the peoples' choice out for ever And it upsets every election, and every treaty very law. For I ask as a judge of most of the late elections, when were such returns ever made of all the tickets? As I have not the constitution and laws by me And "Data" has more to say in "reserve" for money lovers and lovers of honor. Who do not love it. And office-seekers, all I suppose who have run for an office and failed. As the love of both honor and money is just, when justly entertained. We will wait for him, as he may be out in your next number. Had Data succeeded in his election however, we think his opinions would have been differently expressed. Was he honord with the office of magistrate perhaps we had not been stilled ignorant magistrates. Had he been even a judge of election, we are inclined to think they too had been honorable men. Those are mortified who think very often contrary to every body else that their presence and assistance are necesery to cover with glory every department of goverment; fault finders are a numerous horde that fill to overflowing every market. We will however wait for Data. And when he gets through with his promised discourse We wish him to be a disinterested man who never sought an office and who love neither honor nor money.

LIBERIA HERALD.

An oration delivered on the 26th of July 1849 at the second anniversary of the Independence of the Republic of Liberia,

By R. L. STRYKER, Esq.

Concluded.

Fellow Citizens and my Countrymen.

And now, my fellow countrymen, as it devolves on you to be the hopes of the present generation, in establishing this government on a solid basis: so will it devolve on generations coming after, in an increasing degree, to carry on the superstructure, to its completion.

In bearing the weight of responsibility, that rests with you; let that band of union be cemented in your affection for the general good, that characterized the Pilgrim Fathers.—Let your faults be of the head and not of the heart.—For had you not the example of your ancestors, and moderns before you speaking with sepulchral tones beware that around you lie the demons of jealousy and ambition, telling you in awful echo's of your own greatness, —you might find means of an excuse for the many petty faults, which lead them so far away from justice and equity.

But relying implicitly upon your integrity as men, and seeing around you already the blessings of a free people, I can but feel sanguine of your success. Moreover recollect that great nations live in the light of great characters. They who sway the power and principles of minds with ability; lend stability to their enterprises and ensures success to all undertakings for the public good.

Recollect that the qualities of commanders, and statesman, show variegated traits of patriotism.—That some is for popular applause, the aggrandizement of wealth, and the power to rule, while others court the academic shades, or seek other sources of pleasure to their taste and nobleness of soul; to bestow great and blessings upon mankind in general.

Fellow citizens, I would not be so ungallant by forgeting a nobler past of God's works, in these important matters; though you are entitled to be, the "Lords of creation."—I mean the fair sex.

Be assured that in these important matters, afore mentioned you will not be alone. Women, will cheer and comfort you in distress and difficulty, in the road to wealth, and fame, she will bid you hope. She will lighten you of every little load of discontent, and dissatisfaction, by her example of fortitude, and fire your soul with eternal purpose to live or die, in the cause of your country, and for her, your bosom friend.

As all great and good men trace their successes in life, from the teachings of the nursery, from the advice and counsels of her who watched their infant years: so all men when crowned with the honors of the world cannot bestow them in a safter place, or with a better one than her, who gave him being or if perchance, she be not, when that hour comes, let him cast in the sister's lap the unsullied wreath of fame, as she gather's some jewelled flower for her brow of beauty.

My Fellow citizens, my fellow countrymen. It is impossible to look back upon the events just past without marking that unseen Hand, which guides the destiny of empires, and the fate of kings.

How wonderful, and signal has been his ways to you. How truly thankful might you be to be to him, for his mercies and for this day, which bring joys to the bosom of every Liberia, and be he at home or on some other shore, he feels the inexpressible feeling stealing over his nature, that he is a man, and dare be free. And in taking a retrospective view of the past year, I am forced to exclaim, "Behold the Lord is our salvation," "the Lord is our Help."

Yes, another year has rolled over our political existence, and over many events of moment, have we to rejoice and mourn. For scarcely had our rejoicings past on the annual celebration of the ever memorable first of December, before one veteran soldier past from the things of earth, to those rejoicing of brotherhood in that region where the tear of agony comes not, and the parting embrace is never given. The next event was an occasion of rejoicing over the "acknowledgement of your Independence" granted to you by two or three of the sovereign powers of Europe, and the fact lightened in interest, by being brought by your minister, the Executive himself. Furthermore, the presentation of a vessel that arrived here not long since; and means to prosecute some cherished objects, namely, the extinction of the slave trade along your coast, and the protection of your revenue. These form within themselves objects of deep interest to the true lover of Liberia. After this event, there followed the removal of the Demon of slavery, from within your territory, by the force of arms, which I am happy to add, was done without scarce a loss to yourselves. And the closing event, which I am about to mention came quickly after—it was like the blast of disappointed hopes, long cherished—a[illegible] as truth fell upon the ear,—and nearly awoke to consciousness only to know it to sink deeper in woe. Yes! amid the joy which surrounds you, the triumphant victory of your arms, which crown you. I drive sorrowingly to add, the last of the patriots is dead.

He fell not on the field of strife, nor amid the fiend and foe. He saw not his fondest hopes wane, nor the "Lone Star" again forsaking its orbit. He saw not the enemies of his country, possessing its fairest portions on which he toiled and offered his life a sacrifice. Nor did he hear the exulting cry of Demons, come to bear away his race; for which he labored long to save. No none these he heard, but like the golden grain ready for the sickle, he in peace, was "gathered to "His Fathers."

And now, my fellow countrymen, the link that connected you to the past, is forever broken; no more shall this eye witness of the "mighty past," come and speak to YOU in mighty tones go foward! No! that eye is forever closed in the icy chill of death, and that tongue is forever mute to the impulses of a heart, that never knew a fear.—To-day I see not that form of years among this vast assembly, Nor in the seat we all were wont to give him on occasions like this filled by that stately form. To-day in vain I have looked for that venerable form coming in your entrance, in vain I wait to hear that footstep falling on the ear, as one from the spirit land—and yet he comes not. O! is it possible! is it reality! that he has gone forever from my view? O! my father! my father! wither, nast thou gone from me! Zephyrs! tell me, whence have ye borne me, though perhaps some iron hand hath robbed me! Yet tell me, that his spirit now hovers o'er me! But ah! alas! memory tells me that he rests—that far away in yonder plain, his body is ashes to ashes, and dust to dust, and his spirit with its God. And there methinks I see a greeting. What venerable shades with stately grandure, are welcoming one, to that spirit land of bliss, aye! it is he! it is he and his compatriots, happy in that re-union there, which on earth, did make them great and noble.

Countrymen, could ye weep!—it were manly, for the heart shall never give a greater tribute to departed worth. Though the most imperishable monument of fame, may be rised to perpetuate his memory yet in the bosom of this nation shall live the undying memory, of the last of the patriots.

Countrymen, list ye! would ye know that mighty host of warriors whose arm did wield such awful thunder midsts the fierce and cruel savage? Then cast thine eye along the list of fame, and read the names of Benson, James, Carey, Newport, Brander, and last the lamented Johnson, are they not great! I ask are they not noble! It were perhaps possible for you to say this. But your own deeds blazened on the escutcheon of fame, glares in the eyes of this generation, and will not permit you to view them from an elevation so little above your own; with as clear a perception as those father off can do.

For distance lends our optic visions beauties.

So I shall appeal elsewhare. But to whom if not to you! The appeal shall be to this "Lone Star" not after ages of wondering but when long centered in its orbit its ray of light been shed on millions, and posterity has brough its invigorating beams to bear on every son of "Ham."

And may that life giving motto "The Love of Liberty Brought us Here," be ever the circlet of your homes—be eternally the anthem of your songs and enduringly the seal of your hearts, until distant and future generations shall cry aloud it as the "Love of Liberty Keeps us Here."

My fellow citizens, the past is gone, the present is before you, and the future I know not of. Perhaps posterity will speak of some now in this vast assembly, with unmeasured praise, when the echo of their tread beneath this roof shall be no longer heard. Perhaps when other feet shall tread this hallowed place some deeds of the "mighty past" shall be recounted, that shall make these walls echo and re-echo again and again, untill the bursting effusions of the soul shall be no longer heard among the throng.

For the Liberia Herald.

Messrs Editors:—Sirs, my pen has lost its accustomed gayety, and weeping paints the sad bereftment of Liberia's sons, while in contemplation of the ruins of her ancient bulwarks.

For hark! Heard ye not that sound: It was the voice of wailing.—As the noise of many waters, troubled with ponderous heave from their deep abyss.

Heardest thou not the cadences, as wafted on the breeze in the distance of the bold St. Paul's? Methinks it brought sad tidings. For behold—as it swept across Monrovia hills and dale, hard on its footsteps, deep gloom and sadness hovers round—and all Liberia bears the badge of mourning.

Lively choresters of the shady dales with the murmuring coolness of the silvery rill' seems to have lost the wanton melody of their notes, in exchange for tones of pensiveness and wo—as though some oft frequented bougher had been by cruel hand removed, and nature's accostomed beauty irreparably stricken out.

Need I devine to thee, the seighing of the passing breeze?

Didest thou not see the falling of that metior, and the ominous confusion of our blest constellation! And heard ye not that mighty crash, when the fatal axe of time's grim executioner, gave the finishing stoke to the most ancient of Liberia's oaks; and brought its hoary head, prostrate to its mother earth, causing a universal groan, as though her very ribs were crushed—shewing the extent of mental agony that reigned within.

While he with fiendish exultation deep, proudly survey the work of his own doings, and yell with ostentatious triumph.

Hark!—List ye to the cadence of yon herald's woful notes.

The ormen of death is in the land.

Too true, alas! its even so—the last of that noble band of patriotic heroes has resigned that charge, so long and honorably maintained: to retire to rest and sweet repose; as one whose work is noble done.

Behold, the invincible Johnson dies.—The terror of his name has ceased, and Liberia's sons no more hover under the power of his protecting arm—

Yea, her enemies may rejoice for a little season, but let the tribes hear, and the heathen mark it will—Elijah's Mantle has fallen, and covers the sons of his beloved country.

To attempt ulogy on this great and noble man we cannot. In asmuch as no degree of pranigeric, could add aught to the halo of glory, which has encircled for many long years, his time honered brow.

The immortal Johnson is the last of that spartan band which braved the dangers of the deep, the barbarous wildman of the forest, with the deadly pestilence which walketh at noon day.

Denying themselves the comforts and endearments of home and friends, to seek an assylum, and prepare the way for their oppressed brethern in their native land.

He stands first on the list distinguished for bravery, fortitude and generosity.

In '22, when envyroned on every hand, by a ferocious foe, discharging from all sides missies of death, Johnson was ever found cool and determined with steady aim to the purpose of his mission.

"For the love of Liberty brought him here."

And in all his subsequent days, his constant care and aim have been for the benefit of his race.

His highest ambition, the happiness and prosperity of Liberia, and his greatest care, her unshaken security and permanent foundation.

And he lived blessed patriot to see fulfilled his most sanguine expectations. Yea he lived to behold the standard for which his great soul for more than a quarter cenutry struggled; float with ease and grace, high on old ocean's bosom, while his listning ear caught the booming of distant cannon of great and powerful nations; indecliration of the natural right of Liberia's lonely star to revolve with equal grace and freedom in its orbit.

Then might the veteran hero of '22 have been heard to exclaim like simeon. Lord now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace for mine eyes hath beheld salvation.

Johnson wielded not the sword of steel, with less detriment to his countries foes, when herds of fierce barbarians like impetuous torrents rushing like monsters from the grim shades of their native forests, then did he the spirits sword in honor of the great I am, the acknowleded Supreme alone, to whom he ever bowed the knee.

Dangers never detered him, nor perils make him quail. For his bouyant and expansive soul, rose ever with decission and determined zeal, to more than equal every emergancy.

Before the enemies of his country, himself was a host.

The name of Johnson would strike terror and dismay to the heart of his superstitions foes.—For they verily believed him superhuman in battle.

He was among the first of our councellors—a man of penetration deep, and judgment sound, loving mercy; but strictly just. Beloved by all, and universally deplored.

First at his countries call and last at his post.

In his latter days, as bending with declining years tortering over his supporting staff, his venerable form might be seen gliding onward subserviant to duties every call, with visage calm and eyes dim with age; yet ever and anon kindling with the fire of earlier days; he meeted out council to the gay, and instuction to the young. While he benignly smiled on the sporting urchins who arrested his progress, to enquire of his health, or bounding grasp with glee the proffered hand.

For all the juvinile band hailed him as their common friend.

But now alas those days are ended. No more shall they gather round to hear his words, and in mimic form mock the fight of by gone days, while he cheered them to the charge.

We are persuaded to console ourselves, when we behold him bow, with holy resignation to his summon, while to the friends that crowded round his couch he spoke but feedly, yet assured them of his firm allegiance to the court of heaven.

And when he had made an end of speaking, like Jacob of old he gathered up his feet into the bed and yielding up the ghost, was gathered unto his people."

"DATA."

Messrs; Editors.—I beg leave to make a few remarks through your pages in reply to Data. It seems that in all ages, and in all countries, wise men have their enemies, either private or public. No sooner does a man begin to advance in the world than he is beset with clouds and puffs of wind. Let us look at our government and see how affairs stand at present. We find all our elections over, and those who the people thought fit to elect was elected, and every body it was supposed, was satisfied. But up comes some gentleman by the name of "Data," like the golden calf among the Israelites to disturb the peace of the people. But we will, like Moses, show the people which is the golden rule. Data has said that there was fraud in the last election; and that it was done by some of the judges. Let us look and see what was dishonestly done by the judges, let us compare Data's exposition with the constitution of our judges, and see how they stand. "Data" says, the votes of all elections held in the Republic are sealed up in a box and sent to the Secretary of State and there counted out, and then the Secretary notifies those who are elected. But what does our law say on the subject; look at page 20, sect on 1st, it reads, it shall be the daty of the judge to take the supervision of the election and count the tickets and see that they are properly registered. And also to see that the election is conducted according to the provisions of the constitution, and the clerks of elections will register the votes under the direction of the judges. Well Data now will that go? I think you are like the unjust judge was by former but the ox, for when he thought that his bull had killed the farmer's ox, he said he would see about it, but when his ox was dead; he soon began to demand pay. So with Data; when he found himself behind, he began to mutter and cry out ignorant, unjust judges; but they had sense enough before. I wish to know who made those wise magistrates, was they not appointed by honorable men who knew them as well as "Data" do? Data you seem to be very ignorant of the law. I think it becomes all ignorant men, and Data also, to set down and study law before they talk about unjust judges. Poor Data you will have to try it again and see if you can come it. Sir you seem to speak as though you thought our election was to be run over again for the accommodation of one smart man. But we have no monarchal government here—no one man's power like ancient Rome, which if a man got into office who the nobles did not like, he was either belied and banished or poisoned to death—but blessed be God we have passed over that barbarous age, and mode of govrement, and as republicans, we cant call our honest elected members from the house to accommodate one poorp pitiful soul. I never yet found pride in a noble nature nor humility in an unworthy mind. Of all the trees I observe that God choose the vine a low plant that creeps helpless upon a wall—of all the beasts, the soft and patient lamb—of all the fowls, the mild and guileless dove. When God appeared to Moses it was not in a lofty cedar nor in the study oak, nor in the spreading palm, but, in a bush, an humble slender object bush, as if he would by such selections check the arrogance of man. Nothing procureth love like charity—nothing hate like pride.

"AGAIN."

A factory proprietor posted up the following notice.

'I will admit no segars nor good looking men within these walls. One sets a flame among the cotton, and the other among the gals.'

"It is inconceivable," says a German writer, "what a power God has given to the human voice, when rightly employed, and poured forth in a simple and sustained flow."

LYCURGUS.

Hippias the sophita tells us, that Lycurgus himself was a man of great personal valor, and an experienced commander. Philosepanus also ascribes to him the first division of the cavalry into troops of fifty, who were drawn up in a square body. But Demetritus the Phalereau says, that he never had any military employment, and that there was the profoundest peace imaginable when he established the constitution of Sparta. His providing for a cessation of arms during the Olympic games, is likewise a mark of the humane and peaceable man. Some however, acquaint us, and, among the rest, Hermippus, that Lycurgus at first had no communication with Iphetus; but coming that way, and happening to be a spectator, he heard behind him a human voice (as he thought) which expressed some wonder and displeasure that he did not put his countrymen upon resorting to so great an assembly. He turned round immediately, to discover whence the voice came and as there was no man to be seen, concluded it was from Heaven. He joined Iphetus, therefor; and ordering along, with him, the ceremonies of the festival, rendered it more magnificent and lasting.

The discipline of the Lacedæmonians continued after they were arrived at years of maturity. For no man was at liberty to live as he pleased, the city being like one great camp, where all had their stated allowance, and knew their public charge, each man concluding that he was born, not for himself, but for his country. Hence, if they had no particular orders; they employed themselves in inspecting the boys, and teaching them something useful, or in learning of those that were older than themselves. One of the greatest privleges that Lycurgus procured his countrymen, was, the enjoyment of leisure, the consequence of his forbidding them to exercise any mechanic trade. It was not worth their while to take great pains to raise a fortune, since riches there was of no account: and the Helotes, who tilled the ground, were answerable for the produce abovementioned. To this purpose we have a story of a Lacedæmonian, who happening to be at Athens while the court sat, was informed of a man who was fined for idleness, and when the poor fellow was returning home in great dejection, attended by his condoling friends, he desired the company to shew him the person that was condemned for keeping up his dignity. So much beneath them they reckoned all attention to mechants and all desire of riches!

Law-suits were banished from Lacedæmon with money. The Spartans knew neither riches nor poverty, but possessed an equal competency, and had a cheap and easy way of supplying their few wants. Hence, when they were not engaged in war, their time was taken up with dancing, feasting, hunting, or meeting to exercise or converse. They went not to market under thirty years of age, all their necessary concerns being managed by their relations and adopters. Nor was it reckoned a credit to the old to be seen sauntering in the market-place; it was deemed more suitable for them to pass a great part of the day in the school exercise, or places of conversation. Their discourse seldom turned upon money or business or trade, but upon the praise the excellent, or the contempt of the worthless; and the last was expressed with that pleasantry and humour, which conveyed instruction and correction without seeming to tend it. Nor was Lycurgus himself immoderately severe in his manner; but as Sosibius tells us, he dedicated a little statue to the god of laughter, in each hall. He considered facetiousness as a seasoning of their hard exercise and diet, and therefore ordered it to take place on all proper occasions, in their common entertainments and parties of pleasure.

Upon the whole he taught his citizens to think nothing more disagreeable than to live by (or for) themeelves. Like bees, they acted with one impulse for the public good, and always assembled about their prince. They, were possessed with a thirst of honour, an enthusiasm bordering upon insanity, and had not a wish but for their country. These sentiments are confirmed by some of their aphorisms. When Pædaretus lost his election for one of the three hundred, he went away rejoicing that there were three hundred better men than himself found in the city. Pisistratidas going with some others, ambassador to the king of Persia's lieutenants, was asked whether they came with a public commission, or on their own account; to which he answered, If successful, for the public; if unsuccessful, for ourselves. Agrileonis, the mother of Brasidas, asking some Amphipolitans that waited upon her at her house, whether Brasidas died honourably and as became a Spartan: they greatly extolled his merit; and said, there was not such a man left in Sparta: whereupon she replied, Say not so, my friends: for Brasidas was indeed a man of honour, but Lacedæmon can boast of many better men than he.

The senate, as I said before consisted at first of those that were assisants to Lycurgus in his great enterprize. Afterwards, to fill up any vacancy that might happen, he ordered the most worthy man to be selected, of those that were full threescore years old.

To be Continued.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA LIBERIA, OCTOBER 26, 1849.

To Correspondents.

The article from "St. Paul's River" is before us; and as it does not appear, we deem it but justice to the author, to state the reason—and that is its extreme length. It occupies seven pages of closely written fools cap, and would fill up nearly the same number of columns in the paper. We yield a hearty assent to many—to even most of the statements therein contained, and we are pleased that they are expressed in a language at once dignified and respectful. We are delighted at this. Writers should recollect that vituperations, feeble attempts at wit, and endless unmeaning epithets, can please none but shallow pates: Men of sense turn with disgust from such slang, from whosoevers it come, especially when it is levelled against character. But we are not alone, with "St Paul's River," on the subject of his fears. The ghost of an aristocracy seems continually crossing his path and disturbing his nocturnal visions. Banish your fears good friend. Indulge no apprehensions. We are all equal here; and if there be any difference among us as to wealth or intelligence, the difference is too small to form any basis for the hated superstructure. On what else can it be raised?

There is one kind of aristocracy, if we may name it so, which we would encourage; and that is an aristocracy of virtue. Let those among us of every color, and in every place—who possess more of public and private virtue than others—form themselves into an aristocracy. Such a combination we would be proud of, and we would respect, because its influence would be benigning and purifying, and elevating; and it woul awaken a desire to be imitated.

A few days since it was bruited abroad that a party of Golahs had made a descent upon one of the M. E. Mission stations, and had destroyed the premises. We are happy to say the rumor was unfounded, and so far as we have learned, no such war need be apprehended. The Boys are talking of war. But it will be all talk. They have neither spirit nor means to make a fight. They are literally done up.

Now that the colony has thrown off the yoke of tutellage, and assumed the character of manhood, It should endeavor to take a comprehensive view of matters which is proper to its assumed condition. It has no longer the colonization society to think for it. It should think for itself.

Men and means are now wanted for the onward march. Not men who from past habits, are unable to think or act for themselves—who will be of no service to themselves and a burden to us, but active industrious, intelligent men, who can aid in all the departments of government, in arts and manufactures, and commerce and science are wanted. But where are such men to be obtained? There are many in America of the right kind. But will they come? This is the question. It is not unlikely that the intelligent colored community in America is at this time looking with a kindlier regard to Liberia, than at any former period. But when they will start and come, cannot be told. They have been for so long a time prejudiced against the scheme of colonization, with which, Africa, in their minds has been always identified, that evidence as clear as noonday will be required to expel it. It has not been the bad repute of the climate alone which has kept them back, but chiefly their hatred of the scheme which founded the colony. The evidence necessary to dispel the illusion will eventually be given and they will come like doves to their windows, but in the mean time, we suffer for want of a vigorous and thrifty population, what then is to be done?

There are many colored people in the British West India Islands who possess all the desirable qualities for good citizens here. They are well educated—are well acquainted with the culture and preparation of coffee, of the sugar cane, and many other articles which can be produced abundantly here, which are valuable as staples of commerce. They are also men of considerable property, and they would have but little to fear from change of climate. From a memorial which some of them addressed to queen Victoria, it appears they are now looking to the coast of Africa with a view of forming settlements under the auspices of the British Government. Let a correspondence be opened with these people setting forth the present condition of this Republic—its resources capabilities, its present wants and future prospects. A more tempting field for the profitable investment of their capital and for the operation of their skill and industry—and let them be further assured there is nothing in our constitution, nor in the disposition of the people, to withhold from them, more than from any colored people from the United States of America, the full privileges of citizenship, and that equal facilities and advantages will be extended to all colored persons from any and every quarter of the globe coming here to settle themselves.

We are not certain what feeling is in the West Indies, in respect of Liberia. But whatever it might have been, when the colony was under the direction of the Colonization Society, we can hardly think it is one of hostility now. The colored race has been for ages suffering one general decree of oppression. The chord of sympathy has been struck in some bosoms, and it finds a ready response in every other. A generous ardor is kindled by every apartment to vindicate the race and to demonstrate its capabilities. These sentiments are universal among intelligent colored people, and as Liberia presents a favorable field for the exploit it is of great importance it shall be occupyed. Let the educated and monied men of the West Indies be invited.

We have received an article on the "College," with an addendum in reply to "Alpha." We have strained our eyes in vain to decipher the name under this contribution. At the end of the article relating to the College, we discover "New Virginia and Kentucky." But to the other piece, the writer chose to assume a cognomen wholly unintelligible to us. We have not published the article, for two reasons; first it is too long,—secondly it is unnonymous. We have determined on publishing no communication hereafter, unless we have the writers real name. Not that the name will be always inserted, but we must have it in keeping, ready to be produced, as occasion may demand.

We this day received a scowling note from a professional firm in regard to an article which appeared in our last, and we are not sure we shall not feel the bailiff's gentle touch with the monition to appear on a certain day to answer Messrs Gammon and Snapp in an action of we know not what.

We agree with the writer in some of his views about the college, we think good common schools better adapted to us than a college. But as we have expressed our views more fully elsewhere, we need not repeat them. We regret to say that there is far less accordance between our thinking and his saying in reply to "Alpha". Most willingly do we accord to the missionaries all they are entitled to, and the same colonist who says they have accomplished no good, is an ingrate. We will not say they have done all they should have done—for proceeding upon "Alpha's" calculation—which is, that a given number of dollars ought to convert a greater number of souls—leaving the free and sovereign influence of God's spirit, wholly out of the question—we have not yet been informed what number is required to convert a soul:—wherefore, until we learn that fact, upon which the whole sentence of condemnation is suspended, we must be silent, while, however, we think the missionaries have done good—are doing good, and if supported, will continue to do good. We do not think with the writer alluded to, they exclusively have done good; that others, not missionaries, have done good too; and so we are confident it will be found if an investigation be set on foot. Writers should recollect the remark of the celebrated Hall, that "unqualified praise is entitled to little credit." Our views are well expressed by "Ratio," in another part of our sheet.

The prospects, or rather the promise of a college in Liberia, has set us all ago. It is some thing to desire the means of instruction;—for it is not good that the soul be without knowledge. We have a number of young men, of excellent minds, which only require to be medicated and properly instructed and disciplined. If these youth could only be persuaded to turn back and take a fair start—from the proper place—to creep first, then walk—and to run afterward, they would ere long distance most of those who are now a head of them. But unfortunately, they are leaping before the time.

But is our joy at the promise at more extended means of education seasonable? What are we doing in that line? What has our Legislature done? Let us not stay longer by our supineness in this matter. submit, as we are now submitting to the galling imputation that we do not appreciate education. Whatever excuse we may alledge for want of action by our government in this case, distant friends estimating education above all other gratifications, cannot see the sufficiency of those excuses, and they will continue to mourn over our blindness, until we bestir ourselves in the matter. In America the question every where met us "what are you doing for yourselves?" Nothing! What else could we reply? We hope the Legislature will take the matter up and do something.

Old Ben of Bighy who breathed his last some eight month ago is about to be buried. Kings and Headmen and gathering from various quarters, are assembling to eat the rice and drink the rum which the occassion will provide; and then to name a successor. The inheritance is not a very enviable one, of all kings those surround us are the most beggarly. Excepting their eight or ten wives, they have nothing else but the name, not even the authority of kings ,and their wives suppor them.

ANNEXATION IN CANADA.—A Montreal corresdent of the New York Express, says.

"I have spent considerable time as a spectator in hearing the debates in Parliament. I have mingled freely with the members. I am surprised to find the prevailing sentiment, not only among the leading members of the House, but also among the influential inhabitants, is decidedly in favor of annexation to the United States. Nor is it made a party queston of both sides, but particularly the Conservatives are most clamorous for it. The general impression is, that if they should be annexed they would come into the Union as three States, viz Upper, Middle and Lower Canada."

DONT SPOUT! O DON'T!

Messrs Editors:—The above language was the spontaneous response of my mind as I perused an extract of a temperance address published in Africa's Luminary vol: 6. No 9th, of the 12th of September in which the writer attempted to deal in matters of which he is evidently ignorant, and committed blunders at which the meanest tyro in chemistry might blush.—Instead of the learned orator pursuing the excellent and extensive topic of his discourse, he must needs divert from his subject and electrify his respectable audience with his chemical corruscations, as if some meteor had flashed across the sphere of their vision; and then he boils forth in a flood of lore (I might say lava) and assures them that "All pure water that we drink is composed of these substances, (oxygen and nitrogen) the oxygen as afore-mentioned being a little superior in its specific gravity—and this is what renders a drink of pure water so reviving to one who thirsts; while by drinking foul or impure water in which nitrogen prevails—the system by its influence becomes deranged, and sickness, if not death must ensue. Now Messers Editors I would be content to remain silent on this subject and even "blush behind my ears" if the writer of the above remarks did not "set himself up to be some great one;" and as the article will go abroad and expose us to the ridicule of all who regard us with a suspicious eye, and cause our friends to be abashed.

I feel it my duty as one who is interested in the welfare of my country and her reputation to say something though I do not profess to be a chemist.

Before I commence my strictures permit me to say that the gentleman who pened the article in question deserves much credit for some of the articles he has favoured us with at different times, but in this he has over leaped the mark. I hope therefore that this failure will not cow his aspiring spirit, for it is not expected that one man should know every thing, especially a young man. But to my comments, if the gentleman had only opened a school book on chemistry he would have found that water is composed of oxygen and, hydrogen, and not as the gentleman supposed of oxygen and nitrogen and as neither possess the property of dissolving a number of substances, impure water would not be more likely to contain an excess of nitrogen, than of many other substances. Nor would it appear at all probable that nitrogen would impregnate the water unless in a state of combination and then according to the laws and nomenclature of chemistry it would not be known as nitrogen.—He farther states." And it appears that if nitrogen in the air were heavier than oxygen, it would in its turn occupy the lowest region or gravitate nearest the earth, and as a consequence produce disease, pestilence, and death in all parts of nature; as thereby the vegitable, as well as the animal kingdom, would in hale its influence and suffer accordingly." In this "he is wiser than it is writen." The gentleman must be thinking of carbonic acid, which gravitate in wells and other low places and proves so destructive to vitality and which is not a component part of atmospheric air—I always thought that the oxygen and nitrogen which compose atmospheric air were combined by affinity, and if they compose different layers the heaviest subsiding to form the lower stratum. I must confess that I have been labouring under a great mistake, some new and strange doctrine must have arisen which has thrown all the old theories "in the shade—still farther he continues" distilled and malt liqous are each inflamable in their nature; and must consequently contain anumalous portion of oxygen with poisonous substances which must be ranked with Rats bane Arsenic, nausea nux, vomica &c" If, I mistake not the gentleman would have us believe that it is the excess of oxygen over nitrogen in pure water which makes it so reviving; and yet he tells us that "distilled and malt liqours" are inflamable because they contain a large proportion of oxygen, though they are composed of the same substances; as he states in another place that the alcoholic substance has been found to contain two parts of oxygen and one of nitrogen." Is not this preposterous? what does the gentleman mean by dabling into matters with which he is unacquainted, does he intend to make us Liberians the scorn and derision of the civilized world? And pray Messers Editors what kind of poison is neausia? this is truly disgusting, if makes me squamish; really the gentleman must have tasted a "little, a little" which phrensied his brains before he left his abode, for I can not believe that a man of his extensive information and talent would have set forth such foolishness were he in his right mind, or perchance the Panorama of a post mortem condition of the intestines of a drunkard frightened him out of his wits, he should therefore be excused. Before I close I must caution you gentlemen, and through you the public against the use of any thing which has undergone the vinous process as they have to pass the process of putrefaction, and above all "malt liquors" as they have to undergo fermentation even after they have passed through the sputrous acidifying and viliating process I must pass the other" imperfection by, "and beg you as your influence is great to persuade our people to swim in their own element

Yours with great consideration.

CASTIGATOR

For the Liberia Herald.

Messrs Editors.—I have been reading an article in your paper under the signature of "A pha." I did not believe that there was a person in all Liberia capable of such unheard of calumny against those servants of the Most High, who have left all the endearments of their native land to come here for the express purpose of enlightening the poor benighted heathen. Whether the writer is ignorant of what the missionaries have done, or are now doing; or whether it is from prejudice against them, I cannot tell: he says that he makes no charges against the missionaries, "amongst them, there are some of his warmest frinds;" then it must be ignorance. I think he had better inform himself correctly about those matters before he attempts to hold them up to the public gaze, as a set of "worthless men" "who squander away the Lord's money without effecting any good: He says "scores of thousands of dollars are expended anmually for their support, and nothing is effected by it." Having been ten years engaged in that capacity, I think I can refute that charge, tho.' I have not been engaged as a teacher to the heathen in this place, I have been in Liberia and taught in the schools and tho.' we have not seen all the good we hoped for yet there has been some good, done. At the A. B. C. F. M. Station at Cape Palmas there have been several hopefull conversions, three have died and gave evidence that they were born of God, and we trust that they are now in heaven. Now our blessed Saviour has said that the soul is of more value than the whole world, here are three souls saved through the instrumentality of the missionaries: is that nothing? There is one now living at the Episcopal mission at C. P. who has given evidence of sound conversion for more than 11 years; has a good education, and is now engaged in teaching and interpreting for the missionaries at that place, besides him there are several others who have made a profession of religion, both males and females, those with some thirty others can read, write and cypher, have been taught the principles of christianity: the females have been taught to sew, wash and do other house work; is that nothing? besides those, there are a great many who have not staid long enough in the mission to receive a good education, yet they have had religious instructions, and it is God alone who can operate upon their hearts, not the "talisman of the missionary" they carry the instruction with them; they have been taught to fear God, and may we not hope that many of these may yet be brought to a perfect knowledge of the Saviour; we are told to cast our bread upon the waters, and this we have endeavored to do faithfully, and eternity alone will tell what good has been done. It is true our hearts has been often pained to see that after all our instruction we have endeavored to give, that they will not heed it, and many go back to their people and forget the ways of God; but does not this often occur with us? many of whom we have instructed, prayed for in our families and communities, who run well for a time, and raised our hopes high, have blasted them by relapsing into sin grieving their friends, and as the missionary said but yesterday, grieving their best friend, the Spirit of God. If the like can be said of us who were born and bred, in the blaze of gospel light, can we think it strange that those who are born of the heathen, whose parents do all they can to counteract the influence of the gospel upon their hearts, if they relapse, it is what the missionary have to expect, tho.' it is deplorable and the only hope we can have is that God may follow them by his spirit till they shall submit to Christ. I shall relate one instance to prove this; there was a youth in our mission who was a smart lad, he could read fluently, write and cypher, he was quite a promising youth, he made a profession of religion and run well for a long time, but he gave way to his evil passions, left the mission and went home, but his heart was ill at ease, he said to the one now in the Episcopal Miss. that he was sorry that the missionaries ever came to his country; why, said the other? he replied that before they came they never heard any thing about God, and that their case after death would not have been half so bad, as it will be now. Does not this show that tho.' he had grieved the spirit of God, it had not taken its everlasting flight, but was still hovering round his heart filling him with fears for the future.

There are now large numbers in the Episcopal, Baptist and Methodist missions, many professing religion among them, besides those that have died in the triumphs of faith.

The writer is anxious to have some disinterested persons examine the different mission stations and the different families, having natives living with them, and count how many can read &c. I am afraid if his suggestion was complied with, he would have to hang down his head with shame, for I am fearful, if his family was examined, that the readers would be minus, and the converts perhaps ignorant of the first principles of the gospel, for if taught by himself, it would be only to slander others, for they must certainly imbibe our good or bad qualities. He thinks it would be a good plan for the societies to send the money expended on those useless persons to the Goverment, and let the Goverment take in hand the conversion of the heathen, and then he would very likely get a situation, and as he must be expert in those matters we will have nations born in a day, through his instrumentalty: but my dear Alpha that will not be done, try in a quiet and peaceable, manner to instruct faithfully those who are under your care; send them to school, and give them a good religious education, and let every one of us who have them in our families do the same, not from mere policy, but because they are fellow travelers with us to eternity, and we will have to give an accouut to God for the instructions we give them, and there will yet be room enough for missionary work. If every family could afford to take two or more into their families and instruct them, it would only be as a drop to the ocean. Let as many missionaries come as can, & let us all do what we can to aid the cause for it is of God, and eventually will prosper; yes let the goveanment make the roads and tend to the secular affairs of the Republic, let them protect the issionaries and let them go to work without meddling or interfering with government, so that each may help the other, and let us take the Bible us our guide endeavoring to do our duty in our different callings, and God will bless us, and we shall soon have cause to acknowledge his goodness, in the conversion of the heathen, and I hope Alpha will be foremost in the good cause, instead of trying to depreciate the value of those who are trying to spread the gospel in Africa, for I do hope and believe that he stands alone in his views; but at any rate it will not alter the state of things. If the missionaries are useless in Liberia, why they will be sent somewhere else, where they can be useful, and the colonies none the better for it. Perhaps he is doing more harm than he is aware of.

My object in writing this article is not to enter into any controversy with Alpha, but merely to state facts, neither is it because I think what he has written will have any influence on the different societies in America, but it may have a tendency to injure the cause of missions in Africa. There are person who give their money to support African missions, who may think their money thrown away, and withhold what they have been in the habit of giving to the cause, and thus retard the missionary opperation in Africa; the societies have to struggle hard to raise funds to carry on their work in this country, and we should be the last to say or do any thing that may operate against them, lest we be found fighting against God.

AFRICA.

For the Liberia Herald

Messrs Editors:—In your last number there is a communication signed "Alpha" which is exceedingly to be regretted. I know not who the author is; but I hope he is serious and honest in his remarks, as in that case I should only have to pity his blindness.

I do not undertake to defend the missionaries from this assissin-like attack; they are abundantly able to defend themselves if they deem a defense necessary. I too number among them, some of my warmest friends, and some of my most determined foes; but notwithstanding, I regard them, as a body, as good men and as honest, as any men in the Republic; and as worthy to be entrusted with the duties of their stations as any other men amongst us. If, as "Alpha" says—"they are not to be relied upon to discharge their duties, but the executive and legislature can," one of two strange improbabilies must be fact: Either men are made vicious and faithless by acceptance of missionary appointment, or virtuous, faithful, and sagacious by election to civil offices. Believe it who can:—I will not—I cannot believe either.

I for one—and a truer-heart to Liberia's interest—than mine, does not throb—I for one do not believe that the money expended by the different missionary societies according to the present place, would be more beneficently or effectively applied to the great object in view, if committe to the hand of our government. Nor shall I believe it until I have higher instances of patriotism, and oblivion of selfishness and of petty prejudices and preferences than I have never yet witnessed on the part of officials

There are other objections. Nothing is more odious to Republicans, and nothing is to be more cautiously guarded against, than the committal of the spiritual affairs of a people, to the hand of the temporal soverignty. They are two distinct apartments, always recognised as such by the blessed Saviour; and one cannot advance upon the premises of the other, except at the greatest hazard. From this anti-scriptural connexion, that odious offspring called establishment has sprung; and which wherever it has existed has paralyzed the energies of religion and substituted the form for the power. Are we seriously told that a legislature, those only required qualification in its members, is that they shall have been some where in this world a certan number of years—they may be idiots black legs—infidels—that such a body is to be entrusted with the religious instruction of the people, rather than those in whom piety and love to God, and a sincere desire to advance the Redeemer's kingdom, are standing pre-requisites appointment?

Most men have their preference, and unless the talisman of election to the Liberia legislature, breaks among the spell—the member would insensibly lean that way. Those who have no preference, are wholly indifferent, and they regard every cent imployed to evangelize the native as more than thrown away; and if at any time they should forced into an appropriation for the purpose, they would give it to the most popular party. These things being considered, is it not preposterous to request of different denominations that they will combine their pious contributions for pious and holy purposes and entrust the aggregate amount to such dubious hands?

Yours,

Messrs Editors:—Sirs, permit me to refute a slanderous report, which appeard in the columns of the "Liberia Herald." I do not intend to slander the gentlman, for in his attempt to slander me, he has detracted from his own character as a gentleman, and injured his political reputation desperately, he lowers himself, and raises me by bringing in a political equality, which was before unknown, (at least by me) for his own words, by which he intended to injure me, will prove himself to be, if a polititian at all, one of the lowest grade, and a pretended patriot, who is trying to destroy the good character of that currency, which is his country's main dependance Now sir I will prove this Herring and Rum Representative! to speak down right falsehoods, though I will not condescend to call him any ill names In the first place, he says, that I was more "ambitious for the vacant senatorial seat of———than avidious, (plase tell me what that mean.) to get wood, now mark him; for he says this at a time, when I was cuting, gathering together, pealing, cording, and selling wood with all my might, he knew this business had my whole time and ambition;" again he says, that I do not practice virtue, I says he is quite virtuous while buying votes from the poor and ignorant up the river folks, paying them in rum and herrings, which has shoved him into the House of Representatives, but they have all perhaps, repented for it since, the base creature says, "that the manner of my coming to Liberia manifested a want of virtue:—how poor his judgment; In comparing his virtues with mine; let us examine ourselves, in our coming to Liberia, and our nameless conduct," while here I come to Liberia, as all men in Liberia well knows, an honest industrious man, (so says my recommendation) from the best men of the Colonization Society, to the principal men of Liberia: my conduct since I have been here has been, seventeen years serving my country, droping my sweat in clearing the forests, and shedding my blood in three of her bloody wars! And now Mr. Rum and Herring Repesentative how was your arrival? and what your subsequent nameless conduct? What have you done for your country? I will leave it, (not to your enemies,) but to your friends if you have any, (which I doubt your few Rum and Herring friends, sings out aloud where are he Patriotic deeds of our Money grabling and country abusing Representative? and so the intoxicated Echo answers where? Now Messrs Editors if there is any truth I call on my opponent who rides into the Representative Hall, on his R and H. Hobbey! he will abandon his course by do which, he will probably, much oblige the citizens of Monrovia, as well as your very humble servant.

Messrs Editors:—Sirs, although I am a subscriber to, and reader of, your very useful periodical, the Liberia Herald, yet there was never come to you, to your printer, nor to your printing office, any matter for publication from my hand or authority good or bad, directly on indirectly, since my arrival in Liberia.

A Sermon that I delivered in the Presbyterian church, on "Christian Perfection," was printed at the office of "Africa's Luminary" the same papar, (a mistake not) printed an Address which I delivered at the Anniversary of the Presbyterian Sabbath Schools nothing else from my hand and pen, has been printed at either of the above named offices. Nor have I been an abettor or coadjutor in any thing that has ever appeared in "Africa's Luminary" or the "Liberia Herald" with the exception of the above named "Sermon and Address"

Every sylable of my public writing or speaking, is intended, by the blessing of heaven, to benefit my benighted African brethren in general, and my countrymen of Liberia, in particular, I have very recently seen my name connected with communications which were profane, in their nature and very impious in character and teodency, I wish to disabuse the minds of an inteligent community with respect to the character and intention of my writing with which they might see my name connected. So with gratitude I have the honor to subscribe myself your true friend and humble servont.

THE BRIDAL EVE.

Concluded.

Once or twice the chest heaved, and the breathing came thick and fast; but by the conclusion of the narrative all outward evidences of emotion were subdued, and with clasped hands, and an attitude of prayer, she exclaimed in a low voice, "Thy will be done."

From that hour she recovered. Though sometimes slowly, still her convalescence was progressive; and though seemingly borne up by some inward determination, she spoke not to any one again of her vision.

Earthly pleasures, however, had quite lost their attraction; and never more did she mingle in the dance or join the revel. Her thoughts were in heaven; and, after living to close her father's eyes, and remaining still some time longer in the world as a test of her vocation, exactly on the day the mighty conqueror died, a prisoner in St. Helena, did she vow to God the holiest affections of a heart which were too pure and fervent to be wasted on mortal. —Boston Pilot,

Messrs Editors—Sirs, Mr. Leiper, is more ambitious to aspire to the vacancy occasioned by the death of Senator Prout, in the Senate;—than avidious to get wood, or practice virtue. This want of virtue is alike evinced by the reports that he came to Liberia tied or ironed, and his nameless subsequent conduct in Liberia. This man would excite a tirade against me for not taking the currency more than others will take it of me: that he may, upon this hobby, get into the Senate.

I need but to be convinced that I act unjustly, ungraciously, or unnaturally towards any person on thing, to abandon my course. Enough for the present. I will endeaver to so arrange it as to take it.

REFLECTONS.

Our Lone star Flag, floats, on the gale,
That wafts, our nation's story o'er,
Where Foemen, 'gainst our weal assail:
And Friendship's voice, our hopes assure.

Forbid, that traitor's prayer, be heard,
Who, in their rage, would rend,
Our noblest altars, with a word,
And on our prospects, ruin send.

Oh, may the nobler hearts, prevail,
That for our welfare, seek,
And doth not, at our infant efforts, rail,
But for us, blessings speak.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE HARD NAME.

"Well, it is certainly very mysterious!" said Mrs Smith.

"Very mysterious, indeed!" said Mrs. Brown.

"Altogether beyond my comprehension!" said Miss Willowbough.

"Mysterious! do tell me all about it?" said Mrs. Jones, who had just entered the room, and heard enough of the the conversation to convince her that scandal was its subject; as, indeed, one might have known had she been deaf—for what other subject had been started at Mrs. Smith's for a twelvemonth?

"Have you heard nothing of the mysterious stranger?" asked Mrs. Brown.

"Nothing!"

"Who has been here ever since the day before yesterday morning!" added Mrs. Smith.

"Not a word! how remarkable!"

"And whose name no one can discover!" continued Miss Willowbough.

"Wonderful! wonderful!" exclaimed Mrs. Jones. "But what is the peculiar mystery about him?"

"A great deal, I assure you," answered Mrs. Smith. "In the first place, he——— wears a back coat and drab pantaloons—and then, again, he———he———indeed his whole appearance has an air of very peculiar mystery." "Bless me! what are we all coming to!—But is there no way to find out who he is?"

"I expect Miss Vinegar here every moment,"said Mrs. Smith," and if any one knows anything about him she does."

"What, that old maid! Oh, I detest her,"said Mrs. Jones, "she is so terribly inquisitive. I never could bear any one who is eternally prying into the affairs of their neighbors. Then you can't find out even his name. I would give anything to know. But here comes Miss Vinegar; perhaps she can tell us."

Miss Vinegar poked her sallow visage into the room. She looked the very incarnation of scandal, and well she might, for it had been her daily food for more than thirty years. Miss Vinegar was not of a certain, but of a very uncertan age—varying from twenty-five to forty, according as you took her assurance, or the family bible for your guide; and the whole of that time she had passed in the laudable occupation of investigating and regulating the affairs of her neighbors. She had a general oversight of the whole village. She knew every thing that ever happened and was positive of a great many things that never did happen. Like the glorious sun, she shone on all alike. None so elevated as to be above the reach of her tongue; none so low as to escape the vigilance of her condescending scrutiny. But, alas! the most distinguished powers are sometimes compelled to be inactive from the want of proper objects for their exertion. Such seemed to be the inevitable fate of Miss Vinegar.—Possessed of every facility, and blessed with every inclination for the manufacture of scandal, she was alarmingly deficient in the raw material. She had worked up every character within her reach. With the intuition of genius, she had seized upon every incident susceptible of expansion, and had stretched it to its utmost extent. She had done every thing that could have been done; but alas! who can "make bricks without straw?" Her best exertions met with no encouragement. Nothing would happen out of the regular course of events.—Every body went to church on Sundays. No-body was extravagant in dress or dinners. No-body was getting married, or like to be; poor woman, she felt sure of this. In fact, there was nothing worthy the attention of Miss Vinegar, and people began to fear that, for want of any other she would attack her own character.—Never did any thing occur in better time than the appearance of the mysterious stranger."

Miss Vinegr's researches had not been attended with that success which usually rewards persevering industry.

"The landlady knows nothing about him," she said, as she entered. "I have ascertained that he rises at eight—and drinks two cups of coffee without cream."

"Without cream!" echoed Mrs. Jones.

(To be Contineud.)

Infidelity and Christianity.

The Abbe Boismount happily unites the powers of logic with the splendor of rhetoric, in his address to the infidel writers;

"I am ready to acknowledge the service you have rendered humanity; I am ready to acknowledge that you have checked the progress of fanaticism that have thrown down the flaming pyres of intolerance; and as a minister of the gospel, I thus publicly thank you in the name of religion! But let me ask, why you are so ardent for the annihilation of all worship? Why so anxious for the abolition of our solemnities? Were every temple of this metropolis levelled with the dust, to what sanctuary would the wretched resort to pour out their afflicted souls to heaven? Were every minister of the gospel proscribed, where would be the hand to wipe the tear from the cheek of misfortune—where the voice to breathe the accents of consolation to the misrable? Renowned and exalted as your name may be, tell me do you account it sufficiently powerful to summon avarice and opulence to unlock their treasures, and to respect the rights of the poor! Can the abstract images of humanity, of liberty, of equality, warm, soften or subdue the heart? You every where represent mankind in your writings under the soothing imagery of a fraternal community; with an equal ardor we embrace this image, and hold it to our bosom. To you that image is a cold statue; to us it is warm, and throbbing with life! You declaim, and we perform: for it is in our temples only this family of brotherhood is seen; it is in our temples only where passion, resentment, vengeance sink into a calm; where separate interests congregate into one benevolent sentiment. You have your lyceums and institutions for the encouragement of literature, but you have no school for the science of humanity. You speak of her indeed in your discussions and academic harangues; but it is in our temples only that she speaks herself, acts and commands! Because equality is only to be found at the altar, where birth, dignity and talents disappear, and the Christian alone remains!"—Southern Baptist.

Hearts may Agree, though Heads may Differ. How ever desirable it may be that all should be both of one heart and one mind, whether in respect to persons or things, yet it is sufficient ground for charity, if there are but concordant hearts. It would be strange, indeed, if all, even the good should be of the same opinion, with regard to any subject. And difference of sentiment is consistent with a good heart and a sound mind.

This necessary difference of opinion or sentiment may be naturally attributed to difference of constiution, temperament education or society. But while in this respect we must, according to the nature of things, suffer a difference, it is a happy circumstance, that all hearts may beat in unison: ties of affection may still be endearing and strong: the good can meet on terms of intimacy and friendship; engage in the same pursuits, and wish each other prosperity and happiness. Especially is it so with christians. Though on many subordinate points they may recognize a difference, they can in general, cordially unite in the same service, walk together even to the same house, and worship at the same altar, can live by the same faith, cherish the same hopes, achieve the same victories, glory in the same redemption, and anticipate the same blessed home. And how blessed is it, according to the sentiments of the inspired Psalmist, for brethren to dwell together in unity, especially of heart.

On the other hand, what is more unbecoming and unnatural, than discordant affection, or want of mutual sympathy, among professed disciples of Jesus! Christian disaffection! Though there may be the semblance of it, it is really an absurdty.

And we cannot fail to observe, with emphasis how contrary to christian principle is that, so called, odium theologicum, in the language of another, "rending the seamless vest of Christ." It is not enough to say, it should be unkown. It should be unthought of.

It is a remark of Jeremy Taylor, that "we ought to love alike, though we do not understand alike." This is an explanation of, and in beautiful harmony with the sentiments of our proverb, "hearts may agree, though heads may differ." But we conclude with an appropriate maxim, given us by one of the ancient Latin fathers. It is worthy of being engraven upon the heart, by being repeatedly called to mind—"In rebus necssariis, unitai, in dubiis, libertas, in omnibus, caritas; rendered by translation, in points essential, unity; in points doubtful liberality; in all thing, charity."—Southern Bptist.

THE REPUBLIC LIBERIA.

The existence of an independent Republic of freeblacks on the Continent of Africa, comprisidg a population of 80,000 souls, including natives who have been incorporated into the Colony, is one of the most remarkable phenomena of modern times. The above estimate of population is given by Gov. Roberts in his Inaugural Address, Jan. 3, 1848, and is no doubt essentially correct. In this growing Colony, which now extends 300 miles along the coast, the English, language is that which will ultimately prevail and is already spoken to a great extent. The free colored men of the United States, and even their white Abolition brethren after abusing the Colony without mercy for many years, are begining to look upon it with a considerable degree of favor, and will probably become in due time its fast friends. Why should they not? They profess to be the friends of the colored man,—and the world does not afford another example so honorable to his character and so cheering to his hopes. They profess to abhor the slave trade, and this much abused colony has done more to repress that trade, than the combined navies of England, France, and the United States. They profess (some of them) to love the religion of the gospel, and this colony is doing more to spread that religion in its purity over the benighted regions of Africa, than all other human instrumentalities put together. Having become independent, it will for the present be less an object of jealousy to foreign powers. Being less dependent upon the Colonization Society than formerly, it will be less an object of jealousy to the enemies of that Society at home and abroad. The practical wisdom of the Colonization enterprise and benevolence of its founders, now begin to stand out in bold relief; and as that infant Republic shall expand its frame, and extend its influence over the whole African continent, becoming alike the asylum and the glory of the free colored man, even Garrison, or his descendants, if any such there be, will be constrained to confess that hostility to African colonization, is hostility to the colored race—Jour. of Com.

GOLDSMITH.

BOOKS, while they teach us to respect the interests of others, often make us unmindful of our own: while they instruct the youthful reader to grasp at social happiness, he grows miserable in detail; and attentive to universal harmony, often forgets that he himself has a part to sustain in the concert. I dislike, therefore, the philosopher who describes the inconveniences of life in such pleasing colours, that the pupil grows enamoured of distress, longs to try the charms of poverty, meets it without dread, nor fears its inconveniences till he severely feels them.

A youth who has thus spent his life among books, new to the world, and unacquainted with man but by philosophic information, may be considered as a being whose mind is filled with the vulgar errors of the wise; utterly unqualified for a journey through life, yet confident of his own skill in the direction he sets out with confidence, blunders on with vanity, and finds himself at last undone.

He first has learned from books, and then lays it down as a maxim, that all mankind are virtuous or vicious in excess; and he has been long taught to detest vice, and love virtue. Warm, therefore, in attachments, and stedfast in enmity, he treats every creature as friend or foe; expects, from those he loves, unerring integrity, and consigns his enemies to the reproach of wanting every virtue. On this principle he proceeds; and here begin his disappointments. Upon a closer inspection of human nature, he perceives that he should have moderated his friendship, and softened his severity; for he often finds the excellencies of one part of mankind clouded with vice, and the faults of the other brightened with virtue: he finds no character so sanctified that has not its failings; none so infamous, but has somewhat to attract our esteem: he beholds impiety in lawn, and fidelity in fetters.

He now, therefore, but too late, perceives that his regards should have been more cool, and his hatred less violent; that the truly wise seldom court romantic friendship with the good, and avoid, if possible the resentment even of the wicked; every moment gives him fresh instances that the bonds of friendship are broken if drawn too closely, and that those whom he has treated with disrespect, more than retaliate the injury: at length, therefore, he is obliged to confess, that he has declared war upon the virtuous half of mankind, without being able to form an alliance among the virtuous to espouse his quarrel.

Our book-taught philosopher, however, is now too far advanced to recede; and though poverty be the just consequence of the many enemies his conduct has created, yet he is resolved to meet it without shrinking. Philosophers have described poverty in most charming colours; and even his vanity is touched, in thinking he shall show the world, in himself one more example of patience, fortitude, and resignation. 'Come, then O Poverty! for what is there in the dreadful to the 'wise! Temperance, Health, and Frugality, walk 'in thy train; Cheerfulness and Liberty are ever they 'companions. Shall any be ashamed of thee, of 'whom Cincinnatus was not ashamed? The run'ning brook, the herbs of the field, can amply sa'tisfy nature: man wants but little, nor wants that 'long. Come then, O Poverty! while kings look 'by and gaze with admiration at the true philoso'pher's resignation.'

The goddess appears; for Poverty ever comes at thy call. But, alas! he finds her by no means the charming figure books and his own imagination had painted. As when an eastern bride, whom her friend and relations had long described as a model of perfection, pays her first visit, the longing bridegroom lifts the veil to see a face he had never seen before, but, instead of a countenance blazing with beauty like the sun, he beholds deformity shooting icles to his heart: such appears Poverty, her new entertainer: all the fabric of enthusiasm is at once demolished, and a thousand miseries rise upon its ruins; while contempt, with pointing finger, is foremost in the hideous procession.

The poor man now finds that no one can get no kings to look at him while he is eating: he finds that in proportion as he grows poor, the world turns its back upon him, and gives him leave to act the philosopher in all the majesty of solitude. It might be agreeable enough to play the philosopher, while we are conscious that mankind are spectators. But what signifies wearing the mask of sturdy contentment, and mounting the stage of restraint, when no one creature will assist at the exhibition? Thus is he forsaken of men, while his fortitude wants the satisfaction even of self-applause; for, either he does not feel his present calamities, and that is natural insensibility, or he denies his feelings, and that is dissimulation.

Spleen now begins to take up the man: nor distinguishing in his resentment, he regards all mankind with detestation; and, commencing man-hater, seeks solitude, to be at liberty to rail.

It has been said, that he who retires to solitude, is either a beast or an angel. The censure is too severe, and the praise unmerited. The discontented being, who retires from society is generally some good-nature man, who has begun life without experience, and knew not how to gain it in his intercourse with mankind.

THE LITTLE INVALID.

A Story of Poverty and Blessedness.

BY S. C. MERRIGATE.

CHAPT. I.

"Mother" said little Bob Dowulee, a frankfaced boy of twelve years, "Why do all the little children love us so,—Ellen and me, and brother Charlie?"

"I cannot tell, my dear, unless it be that you all love them," answered the kind hearted mother.

"But we've done nothing so good to them as they have done to us. O, it is so nice to go to school and learn! How could they know we should love them, and come and help us pick berries that he might go."

"I suppose they love it, and are so good they wish you to enjoy it too. But now, dears, they coming with their baskets."

In a moment the books were laid away, and little Ellen came out, smiling, in her clean homelook, and with her basket, ready to go out with her brother Bob and the seven children to the fields, to gather berries. Up came the little flock of bright-eyed, laughing children, chattering, frolicking and fluttering along, like a merry troop of white-winged birds, and met the happy Bob and Ellen at the white-washed gate of the small white-washed cottage, that snuggled down among the trees and roses and the rich grape-vines, made the home of the poor widow Dowulee and her three children.

They met as joyfully as if their separation had been for days, and not simply the intervening half hour since school was out. They hushed their gayer laugh instinctively a moment, as they came warming up around little Charlie, whose thin, pale face, and spiritual eyes, showed the invalid; and with sweet smiles they gave him greetings, and some brought fruits, and many flowers, and all brought hearty good will to the helpless child, as he sat smiling and weeping on them, under the shade of the great rock-maple, that shadowed all the house. In this cool place the little invalid would sit in his easy chair, and do his share to help his poor mother feed and clothe them.

They were so poor, that all they could do but just sufficed to keep them comfortable and neat. All day long, in the summer season, little Bob and Ellen had been obliged to work to keep them from want. In the early summer, they cultivated flowers, and the two healthy children took care of them, and gathered the blooms, and brought them to Charlie, under the big maple; and he wove them into beautiful wreaths, and bright bequets, and arranged them carefully in fresh water, to keep them bright till neighbour John, a kind farmer and market-man, who drove to town every night, should call and take them to sell for them.

And when the berries began to ripen, Bob and Ellen picked them, and Charlie put them into baskets, very neatly; and neighbor John was still their market-man, who brought them back all the proceeds in money, or what things they needed, and would take nothing for his trouble. The mother, meanwhile, by her needle, and by keeping bees—that fed on the rich flowers, and so brought two harvests from them, beside the beauty they displayed, and lent to all,—and by whatever her slight frame could bear, would wring life's blessings out of poverty, and, by her own sweet patience, keep the patience and good heart of her little ones from loss. So closely did gaunt Want dog them, that a day's delay in their united endeavours, would straighten some small comfort, and endanger many.

But she had no trouble—only to think her little ones were growing up unlearned, when nothing but the time was needed: for the summer school was free, and the winter's cost but the fuel of the fire. What the slower charity of the parents had not suggested, the quick sympathies of the village-children prompted; and one night after school they held a little congress, without votes or chairman, and no partrizanship save rivalry of generous expedients, to get little Bob and Ellen into the school; and the result was, they determined to devote a half-hour altogether to help them pick berries: and this, from the thirty scholars that composed the school, most of whom could go every night, would more than compensate for the six hours that the children would spend in school. Their parents were not unwilling; and some were glad, for the charity which they thought too small to offer, would be acceptable through their children.

This was the second night of their experiment, and their nimble fingers had brought in many more berries than the two had done all the hot day before.—And some would linger back, who had the time, to help Charlie arrange the baskets; and when neighbour John came, in the cool of the evening, to take them, he was pleased and astonished to find so many. And now the merry troop had come again, and after a word of happy greeting for mother Dowulee and the gentle invaild away they bounded over the wall, and into the fields; first, over flew their baskets in a shower upon the grass, and then they followed like a little cataract—a many-colored torrent pouring down the wall, and away across the grass, with chirp and laugh, and generous-hearted glee.

Little Charlie, helpless and alone, sat in his shady nest, and looked out, smiling sweetly under the green boughs on the joyous group: and if he envied them any thing, it was their good hearts, that could prompt them to find their happiness in serving others.

The full-hearted mother, busy with her needle, looked from her seat in the cottage door, on the blithe troop, and on her smiling boy; and two bright tears trembled in her eyes, as she wondered if no pang touched him, that he could not bound away with them in their happy sport-task. And perhaps a memory of the past came gliding over her, of the brighter days when Robert Dowulee kept his strong arm between that cottage door and want; when little Charlie was a prating boy of five and played with his fathers plume, and gilded belt, when, on the morning of his last look on home, the faithful husband was summoned away to be a butcher of his fellow-men, in his brave heart thinking it duty so to serve his country. But his poor wife wept with a sad foreboding, then, that her home was left desolate, nor scarcely more sure of her full bereavement was she, when the news came to her, that the bold Capt. Dowulee fell by a shot from a British gunboat, and his body was lost in the sea. Five years that widowed heart had battled against grief and poverty and one should see her often, and in unexpected times, to know by any glimpse that she had not conquered both; for her cheerful face betrayed no agony at the core, and the scrupulous neatness within and about her little cottage, was more indicative of humble, quiet tastes, than poverty.

After the children were far off in the fields and Charlie had sat long in silence, twining the flowers they brought him, into two wreaths, which would bring enough to buy his dear little sister—a year younger than himself—a pair of shoes, he put them aside in a dish his mother brought him and began to weave a little wicker basket, lining it with many bright mosses, to make a nest for the great plums and currants, red, and white, and black, of which the good children had brought him many; and, truth to say, he arranged them very prettily, nestling the purple plums down in the centre; and putting his fruits where they should peep out cunningly from their green bed. It was a new experiment, and his mother cast frequent glances of maternal fondness and delight, as the patient boy wrought out his pleasant plan.

"See, mother; will that do?" said the happy boy, as he placed the work carefully on the green bench beside him.

"It is a very sweet little thing, Charlie; and what will you do with it!"

"I will sell it to buy you a new cap, if the merchant will give enough for it."

"No dear. I am not like to suffer for its want: and I think it will half pay for a warm new vest for you, for next winter, Charlie."

"Me, mother! I shall not need it then. The angels will be with me then, and give me a robe of white."

His lustrous eyes shone with a sweet sincerity as he spoke; and the mother burst into tears, as if the sad bereavement were verily come. She knew how keenly the little invalid suffered at times; and, though his peace was in the hope of death, thoughts of his loss to her and his dear brother and sister, clouded across her mind, and rained down tears.

"No: do not weep, mother! how well and often you have taught me patience; how plainly made me feel the wings of blessed spirits fanning me, when the dreadful pains made my head so hot. Mother, you will not be alone when I am gone: for a sweet voice told me last night, in a dream, that some good was in store for you—that a helper was near: and I should go to be rid of this life's troubles, and find all its sweets multiplied. Then, mother, I will smile down from the sky, and you shall feel it till you smile back again. O, do not weep!" and the boy stretched out his thin white hands to her, and the happy, mournful mother knelt by his side, and folded his attenuate form to her bosom, as if for a last embrace.

CHAP. II.

Scarcely had the flow of her full heart subsided, before she heard the merry chattrer of the children, as they came flocking home, laden with the purple treasures of the fields; and on they came, and vaulted over the high wall again, holding each other's brimming baskets as they climbed it into the little yard, they pressed, and piled their stores in great pans round the door; and even little chubby babies almost came toddling up to bring their tiny basketsfull to 'dear Charlie.' But dear Charlie was too tired and weak that evening to arrange his baskets, and a half dozen generous boys and girls, with willing hands volunteered the task, while the rest ran home, the happier for sharing their fruit with their good neigbor Downlee.

Before the careful market-man arrived, fifty plump baskets of sweet whortleberries stood arranged along the bench for him; and little Charlie, who had seen the work with pleasure, spite of bodily pain, had been removed to his cot in the house. Neighbor John carried all their treasures to the town, and took peculiar care of the mossy fruit-basket, for which he conceived a wonderful admiration, and assured them he would bring back fifty cents for it, certainly.

Arrived in town, the kind neighbor disposed of the berries at three cents a basket, the baskets to be returned, and a handsome lady, seeing him offer the flowers, and hearing the tradesman banter about the price took them, and doubled the demand for them in the sum she gave, one desired more to be left at her house every week, and gave her number to the carrier. But no body fancied the little moss basket. After disposing of his own wares and produce the good man took the basket to the doors of some of the rich; but they saw nothing in its rustic beauty to attract them though one gay woman of wealth, to whom he told the story of its making offered him a ninepence: and the lady director of a fashionable charitable society, raised the offer to a yankee shilling. But neighbour John, who had set his heart on getting a good price for this, refused to part with it so cheaply, and putting it back in his wagon, started for home, he determined to do as he had often done before, carry the pretty thing to his wife, and pay the price he had demanded for it without letting his poor neighbor know its destination; for himself was not so fortunate as to indulge in any luxury but benevolence.

On his way home, as the sun began to beam down warmly from the east, he saw a man, worn with travel, sitting weary by the wayside. He accosted the tired stranger, to know if both were going the same road; an affirmative from the stranger, who looked a little surprised at the invitation which follow—to take the comfort of his sheltered wagon—ended in procuring him a cool seat for a few miles of his journey, at least. The faint and weary man had travelled all night without food, and when the good farmer had given him the last crumb from the remaining contents of his travelling box, he thought of his fruits, and drew them from their safe place under the seat, knowing that the empty basket would be a pleasanter gift to his wife with the knowledge that its fruits had cheered the fainting stranger, than all together hearing of his want.

"Nay, nay, my good friend; I will not taste them. This is something you have bought in market for your children or your wife. I cannot take this.'

"Not at all, friend. I carried it with me, and not finding a ready sale, chose to keep it; but, my dear sir. I will tell you a thing of it, that will make the fruit all the sweeter."

The hungry man was too much tempted by the earnestness of the offer, and the rich savor of the fruit itself to refuse longer; so he took one fat plum tenderly from its green bed, as if he almost pitied to remove it, and put its purple cheek to his parched lips as John began to tell him the history of the fruit basket.

"In the small village whence I came, and where I have lived these four years past, there is a little invalid boy, the youngest son of a widow. She has two children beside," and then he went on to tell how the good woman had lost her husband, and how she struggled against poverty, and how the little ones had helped her—even the little sick boy—and how all the village children helped them and then to the private history of that little basket —"and never," concluded the honest chronicler, "was a more blessed creature in this world, or a woman with more blessed helpers for children, than poor widow Downlee of Greenvale."

What so strangely unpalateable was there in that last sweet plum, that it should fall back with the falling hand so suddenly from the half-satisfied lip of the stranger? What in the words or look of the good farmer that they should draw so inquiring a gaze from the eye of the pilgrim? The driver opportunely noted it not, and the stranger resumed his countenance again; but the eagerness of his questions and his earnest attention to their answers, showed that an unwonted interest had been kindled: and another would have noticed a hot tear rolling in the stranger's eye as the good John, who would not seem to see it, as he did told of the patient suffering, happy little Charlie.

A length the big market wagon of neighbor John halted before the gate of the poor widow and the pleasant boy saw one after another of the little treasures their article had procured, handed out to his smiling mother and then he laughed with a quiet little glee, as the good neighbor drew a bright half-dollar from his pocket, saying, "and this is for Charlie's mossbasket and now mother Downlee, if I guess right here is something more for you," and he stept aside to let the impatient stranger come forward from the back part of the wagon and in a moment more, with a shriek of recognition, the astonished wife was in the arms of her husband.

When he saw them safely through the first wild transport, neighbor John drove to his home, a man thrice blessed for his small kindnesses.

Robert Downlee knelt by the chair of his invalid son, and pressed him to heart. The boy showed no frantic demonstratons but an intense joy shone in his spiritual eye, as he locked his thin arms around his father's neck.

"I knew it would be so! A sweet dream, a pale thin-winged creature, with beautiful eyes, told me you was not dead and we should see you again, and then I should go away and be an angel, and live with you all without any pain and [illegible] mother and Bob, and Ellen, would be happy to dwell together, and feel no more sadness. O father, I knew and told mother, but she was so sad to think it all, she would not believe any of it."

"Nay, darling, I half believed it, or this meeting would have been too sudden a joy: and for the sadness of part of that tale, I was readier to believe the other."

Fail us it would to tell the joy and silent blessedness of that meeting, mingled as they were with a sad prophesy of bereavement, we can only catch from the many words, and more deep looks, the simple story of the husband's return, which told that the shot which wounded him, threw him into the sea,—that he floated on a sliver of their vessel, till the British picked him up,—he recovered—was imprisoned, and constrained three years, when, beggared and weak, he was let loose in the wilderness of London, and without friends or money, he sought a passage for America, was disappointed and reduced to the lowest need, he toiled on the wharves, and became a porter, and starved on, till he got the money necessary for his passage, and had landed but a week before in New York, from whence he had labored on, till the good farmer found him penniless and exhausted by the roadside. His letters had never reached their destination, and the first gleam of any knowledge of his existance came with his presence—if indeed the premonitions of the keen-nerved Charlie, were not a magnetic consciousness of his approach.

When school was done, Bob and nimblefooted Ellen came tripping home, eager to see the product of their toil. Little Ellen ran first into the room where all were mute, and seeing a stranger, shrunk to the mother's side abashed. Bob halted a moment with the sudden surprise, and glancing at the stranger and at his mother in quick alternation, his lips moved with an endearing term, as he looked inquiringly again to his mother, whose answering smile made it articulate, 'Father!' and the boy bounded to his arms. Then little Ellen came, bashful and wondering and doubting; and all the brief past of her life with him came back, when he swung the girl of nine years on his arm, as he had done to the boundless delight of the girl of four. With tears and laughter, and the deep, quiet gaze of Charlie, to deep souled for either tears or laughter, that house enfolded a blest family.

CHAP. III.

The kiss of the kind angel, Death, brought a light flush to the hollow cheek of little Charlie, but a flush that kindled no delusive hopes: for the mother's heart had learned to trust his prophecy, and the father knew too well the hectic bloom that when heaven's gate is opening to the pure, is sometimes flung from the near glory upon the faded cheek of the departing. So autumn's first wild frost kiss had touched the great maple over the cottage with a blaze of splendor. The dear boy sat no more in his wonted place beneath its wide arms, save in the softest season of the blandest day, for dear past memories' sake; and now his thin white fingers, slenderer than a girl's hung idly from the folds of his thick shawl, no more to shew a lily-like glow from the reflected blushes of the rose, or stain of bleeding berries.

The patient mother knew his Autumn too had come and was resigned: so softened were her grief and trust, that smiles and tears would mingle on her face; and every morning she would thank God rather that he was here, than murmur that he was going hence.

"Mother," he said one day, after a severe struggle with pain which flushed his beautiful pale face, but could only wring it to a slight contortion, as "the soft wind would ruffle the water in passing—Mother it is over now the pain and trial, and a bright spirit, with pure blue wings, and transparent robe, stands close by me. I have seen him often in the distance, and every fit of agony would bring him closer, as if I were afloat, and it was rough wind to drive me to him."

"Father, mother, Bob, Ellen, all come?" and the boy kissed them all silently. They knew that he was going and were mute save little Ellen, who put her arms about him tenderly, and begged him, "O don't go Charlie."

But a quick glance of his kindling eye, caught a vision, invisible to them who watched him, and flashed a pure smile over the falling tears.

"Mother," he whispered faintly, "they are bringing a white flower-wreath, and they say it is for filial and fraternal love, mother—because I've loved you, and father, and Bobby and Ellen; and yet, how could I help it? you are so good. And one holds up a band of softest blue flowers and he says it is for Patience, mother—because I have borne suffering meekly; but that should be for you; for it was you that made me so happy, I could'nt feel the pain. And now one comes close to me, with a tinny bouquet of the most sweet small flowers, like the lily of the valley, but sweeter, clearer, and they make a low, soft, tinkling in tunes, as they wave in her hand and this she says is for Purity—and she will bind it on my bosom. O mother, do you not feel them? they float smoothly by you, and look kindly on you; and now a lovely company of them have come and twined a wreath of all these flowers together round us all—and now I float away. O mother, one kiss! the rose chain lengthens, but it will not break! I go, but this will hold us always until it folds us close again. Hark!"

Dropped the faint lids over the dying eyes, clasped the pale hands on the pulseless bosom, and the white soul of the boy flew up to God on some divine strain which his ear had caught, and which it seemed the sobbing mother and the kneeling sire, in a moment's hush of grief, could almost hear. So sweetly passed his spirit, that a sweet smile, more of heaven than earth, lay on the unchanged face; and to the deep-souled mother seemed it no fancy, that she felt the pressure of the extending flower-band, and down its living links, sweet pulses of living bliss from the beautified soul of the ascending boy!

What if strange scenes passed in that little cot, and the autumnal winds sighed through the open door, and past a skeleton-like bier; and solemn words were said, and tears were rained profusely on a marble cheek and flocks of children, all in simple white, with late flowers in their hands walked weeping, two by two and paused to sing mid sobs a low hymn, round a little grave, and make the name of their lost darling inarticulate with grief. Yet round that mother's heart, if round no other, the invisible flower-wreath pressed with blessed healing—and a perpetual inflow of Divine love from his diviner soul, deepened her spirit beyond joy or grief, and told her ever, 'Charlie is not dead."

From Chambers' Journal.

The Gipsy's Wife

I LIVE in an old tumble-down house, not a great many miles from London, and on the borders of a fruzy common. Before the age of steam locomotion, this was considered the country; and even now, there is one solitary spot, where, from mossy knolls rising beneath clumps of antique trees, we overlook a perfectly retired and sylvan scene. A sparkling stream, like a silver thread, winds its way amid rich pasture land and thick beech plantations; an ivied spire furnished with a peal of soft musical bells, peeps forth from a distant village; and in the summer evening time it is pleasant to rest on those mossy knolls, and listen to the sad distant music.

The ruins of an old church may be traced from this point; wild roses and eglantine are around us with violets and bluebells; a sweet honeysuckle porch is seen leading to a lowly-thatched hut; and there are lowing kine and bleating flocks by our side and in the distance. In this there is nothing wonderful; but only turn back not many hundred yards, and seek another point, from whence to view a very different and more widely extended panorama—the vast wilderness of London, St. Paul's, Westminister Abbey, hosts of steeples, myriads of chimneys, armies of masts and shipping clustering on the almost choked-up and hidden river, good old Thames; in fine; smoke, fog, and misery without end! Seen from this common, there the sun sets; but the holy moon, rises behind the tall trees and the old church, which I can reach in less time than I have taken to gossip about it. Royalty for many years found a secluded and peaceful home, on this ancient common, famed alike in history and legendary lore; but I know not if the ears of royality were ever assailed by the same unearthly yells and hootings which so often disturb our retirement, and remind us of the descriptions we have read of the war-whoops of the Indian savages. The explanation is, that there are several stands of donkeys, where these animals are let out for hire, on different parts of the common; and the general assemblage, or grand emporium, is close to the garden wall which bounds the domain once honored by a royal presence.

One evening during the past summer, as I was returning from a ramble by the side of a dear invalid, who was drawn about in a hand-carriage, two ragged little girls loitered around our gate from idle curiosity, to watch the occupant of the pretty green chariot assisted into the house. I was struck by the appearance of the elder of the two; for although with a quantity of matted black hair, a very dirty face, and still dirtier habiliments, I could trace a singular loveliness both of form and feature. She had large, languishing blue eyes, shaded by long, black, silken lashes; but not withstanding this, the gipsy physiognomy was decided; and as there were many of that tribe in the neighborhood, I doubted not that these vagrants were wanderers from their tents. After regaling the poor little-things with some tempting cakes, I asked the beauty her name, when she answered with distinctness and propriety, "Mazelli Lee please ma'am."

"And what is your father, my dear?" I said.

"Father's gipsy, please ma'am."

"And your mother is a gipsy too, I suppose, my dear?"

"No, mother's a lady, and drives donkeys, please ma'am."

I pressed the child to try and explain her meaning; but all the answer I could get was, "Mother's a lady, and keeps donkeys." She made me comprehend that the smallest and most exclusive donkey-stand on the border of the common, nearest our house, belonged to her mother; and that her only brother, a little bigger than himself, was also an assistant in the business. She said their home was not very far off—"in the pits near the caverns," where a miserable collection of huts had been from time immemorial. Moreover, on questioning Mazelli further, I found she regularly attended the Rev. Mr. L———'s Sunday school knew her catechism," and said her prayers every night, when mother washed her face." I hoped that a portion of the latter statement was true; but the face-washing seemed quite incredible.

My curiosity was aroused; and the next day I walked close past the donkey-stand, which Mazelli Lee had described as being kept by her mother, "the lady;" and then I observed an individual whom I had so often seen before, but without noticing her particularly, or giving her a second thought. This individual was a woman still young and good looking, with fresh color of unclouded health lighting up her blue eyes—eyes almost as beautiful as the little Mazelli's—and with an anxious expression flitting sometimes across the vacant but good-humored composure, which was the leading character of her countenance.

EULOGY ON THE LIFE AND CHARACTER OF THE LATE REV. ELIJAH JOHNSON, DELIVERED BY HON. D. B. WARNER, BEFORE THE LIBERIA LYCEUM ON THE 1ST. OF AUGUST.

Gentlemen of the Lyceum, Friends, and Fellow Citizens.—Though it has often fallen to my lot to appear before you in public, in various capacities, yet there has scarcely been a time when I come before you with greater reluctance than at this present.—And it is not because I am irresponsible of the honor conferred upon me by this intelligent body, being permitted this evening to address you, but because the occasion which has called us together is of so great importance and vast magnitude, that it requires an exhibition of the talent and ability of those whose minds have aspired to higher heights than mine.

According to the Constitution of this Lyceum, we formed ourselves into a society for the purpose of improving our minds and diffusing literary, scientific, and other branches of useful knowledge throughout the circle of our influence; but during the last twelve months that have swept swiftly by, and connected themselves with boundless eternity, we have been occupied in relating tales of sorrow and learnig notes of woe. One after another of our company has been torn from our fond embraces by the ruthless hand of death; and this evening we are again called upon to touch the mournfull lyre that tells us another one is gone. And what still more tends to thicken the gloom already thrown around us, that he who but a few days ago promised to undertake and execute the task which now devolves upon me, has himself fallen. Sunk in the mighty deep and become for ever lost to our view and freed from our embraces. Thus that solemn and unalterable denunciation that from "dust thou art and to dust thou shalt return," uttered by the omnipotent who spoke into existence myriads of worlds, and peopled them with sentient beings, falls heavily upon us, and bids us remember that soon every one of us must return to the dust as we were, and our spirits to God who gave them.

We are all borderers upon the river of death, which conveys us into the eternal world, and should he ever waiting the call of our Lord, that we my launch away with joy to the regions of immortality; but thoughtless creatures that we are, we are perpetually wandering far up into the fields of sense and time, we are gathering the gay and fading flowers that grow there, and filling our laps with them as a fair treasure, or making garlands, for ambition, to crown our brow, till one and another of us is called on a sudden, and hurried away from this moral coast; those of us who survive are surprised a little: we stand gazing; we follow our departed friends with a weeping eye, for a minute or two, and then we fall to our amusements again, and grow busy as before, in gatkering the flowers of time and sense. O how fond we are to enrich ourselves with these perishing trifles and adorn our head with honor and withering vanities, never thinking which of us may receive the next summons to leave all behind us, and stand before God. But each presumes it will not be sent to me. We trifle with God and things eternal, or utterly forget them. While our hands and our hearts are deeply engaged in the pursuit of earthly delights; all our powers of thought and action are intensely busied amongst the dreams of this life, while we are asleep to God, because we vainly imagine he will not call us yet. With these remark I beg the indulgence of my audience whilst I briefly sketch the outlines of the character of one of the members of this Lyceum.

Elijah Joanson, the subject of our present eulogy in common with the rest of us, in his early days he lived in the U. S. of North America, a land that affords no rest for the sole of the colored man's foot. He edured what we have undergone and though his body was subjected to such usage as only fit for the most vicious beast of the forest, yet he had a mind one which could not be enthrawled by all the powers of human invention nor affected by all the chains of a tyranical master,—though deprived in a great measure of the natural rights of man, denied the pleasures of a social life, restrained from worshiping his God according to the dictates of his own conscience;—though compelled to sit down by the side of the waters and weep when he remembered the land of his forefathers, yet he kept his heart with diligence, and in exercising the noble faculties of his mind like a Columbus, he concluded and justly too that there must be a counterpart to that cruel land in which he lived. Animated by this thought and encouraged by the first whisperings of those benevolent and philanthropic men composing the American Colonization Society, he became sanguine and excited in the truth that far to the eastward, across atlantic's tides was a land whose foliage was ever green, and whose climate and soil were fraught with life and liberty for the man of the colored face. He had no sooner brought his mathematical operations to a demonstration, that he entered upon the plans of securing to himself, children, and friends this happy land and quiet asylum, having concerted the force of all his plans of removal, he embarked on board of that ever memorable ship the "Elizabeth;"—he committed himself to the care of him who is Lord of the seas and waves, launched upon the mighty deep and in sight of land where he made itself drunk in the blood of men. After being driven by many and contending storms, after being driven to every direction by howling winds, and spent by demon swells, he eventually landed at the British colony Sierra Leone; there he saw some vestige of the earnest sought land of liberty but was fully pursuaded that he had not yet arrived at that point to which he was so strongly attracted. From thence he embarked for Sherbro a spot of land seemingly designed for the habitation of all the animals common, all the links of the chains reaching from beast to man, save that one is man alone;—there in the contrary abode, a land of quag-mires and of the shadow of death he remained until the revolving sun, in his annual course had made more than one complete revolution in heaven, that he had not had yet found the people for which his soul panted and for which he had made such an hazzardous adventure, nor can all from behind which the lone star to emerge he again set forward, leaving those dreary regions and desolate stricken shores to their brutish and nature inhabitants, and in a few days landed upon these shores which for centuries past had been the place where mothers were parted from their daughters, and partners from their sons by the cruel and bloody hands of the Portuguese and Gauls, and where blood, rapine, and war had threw a sickening gloom over the inhabitants of Western Africa, though no light of christianity could pierce, nor a ray of the natural sun penetrate to arouse them from their stupor and direct their eyes upwards to see the great end for which man was created; but now in the providence of God had become the place from whence life and liberty were to be proclaimed to all the sons & daughters of Africa. Here on this sandy shore our hero landed, and he met with those who gave him a hearty welcome and seemed to rejoice in his unparalelled undertaking, yet he had just entered upon the threshold of his arduous doors—beyond him and in the road to his hoped sought spot of Liberty, and quietude was the savage tribes the men of war with whom he must grapple in a bloody contest for happiness, and though he was oftentimes thrown among men more formidable than the prowling wol, and more ferocious than the terrific shark, yet he deemed them all more harmless than the tyrant's hands from whose grasp he had so lately disengaged himself. After spending many wearisome days and sleepless nights in a long debate with old king George and his allies; Mr. Johnson succeeded in having ceeded to him and his little band of comrades, that little Island which sits in the midst of the rolling flood of Messurado's, sweeping stream the fruitful germ from which has sprung this promising oak the "Republic of Liberia."

There on that little spot of ground whose whole circumference is less than the third of a league, our hero and comrades lived, there they dwelt in quietude and peace, until old "King Bromley," aroused to demoniacal fury, at their interposition in behalf of a poor storm beaten mariner who with his vessel and crew had been driven by demon swells upon the sandy shore, fell upon them like an impetuous torrent rushing over some mighty cataract, and threatened them with utter extermination. But the tyrant's rage like the wild tornado that has spent its force upon the lofty main sinks down into a calm, was turned away and the little Spartan band was again left to enjoy their home in peace. But our hero knew that his present habitation was too circumscribed and not sufficient for the spread of the great tree that would spring up from that little germ, the emigrants of the "Elizabeth," he ceased not to negotiate until he had obtained a spot on this hill, from whose highest cliffs the cannon is heard to thunder in memory of that eventful and glorious day the "First of December 1'22." But he had scarcely commenced to sever the twines and fell the trees, ere he was again assailed by those barbarous savages who like the destructive hurricane had only recoiled to come with redoubled force—here a second combat ensued, and our Fathers were compelled to carry in one hand the axe and bill-hook, and in the other the gun and sword. Bold and courageous our hero went forth to meet his foe, and though the savage yell echoed from hill to hill, and the chieftain's cry kill the "white man," fell harsh upon his ear, though surrounded on every hand by an enemy that outnumbered his little company in a ratio of an hundred to one thrice told, though he was the centre to which all the fury-rage, and malice of an incensed enemy gravitated, yet unmoved in his mind, undaunted in his courage, he rallied forth, and with manly strength grappled with his foe. At one time he was seen advancing, at another, retracting his steps; sometimes driving his enemies from their ramparts and strong holds, at other times giving ground to the savages and seeking shelter from their whizzing slugs, behind his wattled hut;—thus the sun is seen struggling in the skies; at one time riding in all his strength between the parted clouds, at another, hiding his brilliant face leaving all nature in a melancholy gloom, until by his superior strength he sweeps all the clouds aside and walks forth with great strength triumphant up the skies. So our fathers after contending long and hard sometimes advancing, at others retrograding; at one time standing upon a little eminence and cheering each on to conquest, at another flying before their enemies; finally when despair drew strong death and terror into their enemy's camp and triumphed over their foes. Astounded, terrified, and confused the savages fled, some over the craggy cliffs, some plunging into the rabbling tide, whilst the remainder leap'd over some dreadful precipice dislodged their men of souls. Thus that memorable day the "First of December 1822" brought conquest and peace to our fathers;—here it was that our hero gave to that accumulated breach which was the forebodings of a doubtful struggle then it was that his ear-wrench and tar-bucket so mad and hard sunk to its natural place, and peacefully and quietly pronounced its wished task.

A few months more the second train of difficulties had passed, the Big Ox was arrived bringing with her your humble speaker and a few others to join with the noble souls who has been engaged in an obstinate warfare to prepare a place for us. With eyes of astonishment and heart palpitating we surveyed the ground where but a few weeks before a bloody and dreadful contest had been held. There did the soul of those blood stained patriots leap for joy. A brother and friend was recognized in every tree of the heavy grove; while Elijah Johnson rich in charity, fruitful in benevolence, and abundant in mercy, first opened to us the door of his hospitable mansion, bade us rest in peace. Now peace in the quiet seemed to prevail and every heart to enjoy rest. But our ephemeral peace soon vanished, and our bright hopes became sullied—upon the bloody Condahs and the insidious Devs had rolled their forces, again, they were clandestinely visiting the little village which had just commenced raising its spires above the bushes—and again Mr. Johnson was called upon to resume his post and prepare to stand against the accumulated force of a treacherous foe. He hesitated not to venture again in combat with his antagonist, to stand in defence of his much loved, though dearly bought country,—by day he was actively engaged in securring every avenue to this little town again, the attack of the raging heathen, by night when nature calms all her sons to enjoy a cessation from their toils, he in company with a Richard Sampson, walked the midnight rounds and ever and anon, threw upon our listening ears these cheering words, "all's well."

The twice smitten enemy finding no favor in this sight when they might salley forth from their secret ambush, and rush with impetuous and desperation violence into the camps of their envied conqueror, and find them all asleep, and every key awake deprive them all of life, gave a timorous yell and like the pathering storm contending with adverse and superior force scattered themselves in every direction, and at once and forever abandoned the field and ceased to risk their lives against so strong a foe, and to this day we stand to witness the almost utter extinction of that treacherous people peeled and smitten and scattered to the four winds of heaven where scarcely a place to rest the soles of their feet.

Here friends we must leave this field of blood and strife, and enter upon the more peaceful labors of that invincible soldier E. Johnson. To him from his earliest arrival here, was committed the arduous task of distributing to the emigrants their weekly allowance,—in this part of his labor he was a faithful steward, giving to every man his portion in proper time, and though in this branch of his business he has been brought in contact with men of all classes and conditions, men of corrupt principles, uncouth manners, of dissipated characters, who deemed it a pleasure to insult their superior, yet Mr. Johnson was true to his trust, and daily came up to the injunctions of the inspired penman, "let patience have its perfect work." He not only superintended this department of the calling, but he was active and persevering in every thing appertaining to his country. He counted no labor too great to endure, no task too hard to perform, no station too precarious to take when called upon to act in behalf of the government, in a word, what has his country asked him to do that he has not done? When the poor fettered Africans in 1825 uttered their groans from Trade-town's yard of blood, when old Willey in 1832 bid defiance to Liberia's strength, when old Gatombith looked up to the far away forest, stood up to contest Liberia's power, he was not among the last of those who volunteered to maintain the honor of their country. No difficulty, no peril, no obstacle deterred him from his duty. The Council Hall, the Senate Chamber, and the Pulpit were not without his services;—by day, by night, at all times he was ready to give his services to promote Liberia's interest. His loyalty as a citizen, his faithfulness as a minister of the gospel, his labors as a States-man, have made impressions on the minds of all those who knew him,—he exerted every nerve and exercised every talent to secure the safety and final happiness of his country; and in the days of his declining years when this flowing tide of life was approximating fast to a final ebb, when he began to recede swiftly from our vision, and approach near the voyage of his earthly dissolution, he often spoke of his past struggles and of his unspeakable satisfaction of seeing Liberia aspiring to wealth and honor; often would he urge upon the minds of the youth the great necessity of exerting their greatest efforts to maintain Liberia's freedom. And to you who a few months ago were called upon to take up your arms in the defence of your country and its laws, to you he gave the solemn charge, remember the white tomahawk, ere you desert it, stain it with your blood. Here my friends we pause, and ask where now is the honored sire, the Rev. E. Johnson? Where is that old veteran who watched and fostered the little germ from which has sprung our happy home the Republic of Liberia? The faltering tongue tells you that he is no more, he is gone, he died in peace, and is now mingling with the spirits of just men around the eternal throne. On that memorable day when old "Wee" was hurled from his monarchical throne by Liberia's troops, when he with all his men of war were driven into the wilds of New Coster's woods, when Liberia's motto THE LOVE OF LIBERTY BROUHT US HERE floated upon the breeze that bore the sound of the death knell to the tyrant's ears, on that day while commissioned is high commission, "go ye into all the world and preach my gospel to every creature," Mr. Johnson breathed his last. And fellow citizens, brother soldiers what were your feelings, what the emotions of our hearts, when on yonder beach we stood just returned from Trade-Town's wilds and New Cestos craggy cliffs—when the solemn truth was told that Elijah Johnson was no more! Terrified and astonished, our hearts grew cold—death-like silence ran through our ranks, and every bosom heaved a sigh to quell the heart-throb. Again we repeat the unwelcome truth, and tell you he is no more. [illegible] gone from the noise and din of war, from the cares and toils of life.—In you graveyard, the house prepared for all the living, he truly lies in a peaceful habitation and quiet resting place,—there he has thrown off every burden and escaped from [illegible] he has no more, has to have to get to work, his flesh is no longer broke with trouble and vexed with lingering disease. There he has received a release from [illegible] and all harassing discharge from sorrow,—the dangers ever threatening [illegible] depriving actions; but he quietly sleeps his last sleep and waits his request and to him every true Liberian would say, rest ye true hearted patriot, rest our father with the [illegible] gloom, rest in gentle slumbers till the last trumpet shall sound, we will [illegible] raise some for your light [illegible]. Here [illegible] leave the spirit and soul [illegible] father, escaped from [illegible] received into a paradise of delights, established in the mansions of eternity, and [illegible] gone [illegible] and we [illegible] and by the succeeding generations proclaim upon every passing breeze the acts and labors, the work and merit of the Rev. Elijah Johnson, and may he ever live in the heart of every Liberian, and his name be perpetuated until time shall be no more.

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Liberia Herald.

Messrs Editors:—In your last number, I notice the replies of "Africa" and "Ratio," to the communication above my signature. Your Editorial remarks I also read, and 'tho.' I was somewhat prepared to hear of opposition from you: I was disappointed at the lame manner you attempted to gainsay what I had written; and which plainly discovers to the unbiassed mind, that you found yourself incompetent to controvert the truth.

"Africa," after having vented somewhat of his indignation at the audacity of "Alppha," for presuming to question the ability of the missionaries to do all that was reasonably expected of them; goes on to tell of the number of years he was employed in the service of missions at Cape Palmas, and that there is one living who has given evidence of sound conversion, and several others, who has made a profession of religion—the remainder of his communication is merely to fill up a column: for all who have read my remarks, will see that he introduces no proofs against what I advanced. "Africa" says, he was employed ten years as a mission teacher, and it is presumed, tho' he does not admit it, that he was one of several others engaged in the conversion of the heathen:—and pray what is the result of the combined operation? That there had been "several hopeful conversions, and three have died and gave evidence that they were born of God." Remember that "Africa" and his coadjutors were ten years performing these wonderful conversions. Will "Africa" please inform the public if these extraordinary reformations were solely attributed to the zeal and industry of himself and companions? If I could learn the number of missionaries that were employed with him, I might venture to determine what portion of the credit for these hopeful conversions belongs to him.

"Ratio" as all will perceive has some other object in view than that of disproving what I have said. If he wishes to attack the officers of government, let him do so openly, and without dissimulation. I wish to know in what place I have mooted the idea that the spiritual affairs of the people should be placed into the hands of the government? I have never done so—and never wished it to be so, and Ratio knows that I have not expressed myself in that manner. Here are my words—"let the missionary societies place into the hands of government the money they expend annually in Liberia for missionary purposes,—with the understanding that the government will employ it for the civilization of the aboriginies of the country." In other words, let the government have the money, to make settlements in the neighborhood of native towns—open schools for the education of the heathens, and for the instructing of them in agriculture and the mechanic arts. Wherever there is a settlement formed, there will be men to teach the way of salvation. I disclaim the idea that it is necessary for the employment of men, as missionaries, for the conversion of the heathens. It is too true to be successfully contradicted; that settlements do more to christianize and civilize the heathens, than the mission stations possibly can. I am not alone in this belief. A large majority, I think, of the thinking men of Liberia, hold the same opinion.

I am charged with calling the missionaries "worthless men."—"vicious and faithless." This is not so. Once for all, I wish distinctly to say, that I hold the body of men known as missionaries, to be as upright and honest, as any men in the country. But in making this admission, I do not wish to be understood as retracting in my opinion, as to their ability to do what is expected from them. They may be conscientious in their endeavors for the conversion of the heathens, and yet they may accomplish comparatively speaking, nothing.

ALPHA.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA LIBERIA, NOVEMBER 30, 1849.

ON Monday Nov. the 19th according to notice previously given, a meeting of the citizens of Monrovia, and other settlements, of Monserrado County, convened in the M. E. Church, to receive the report of a committee which was appointed some weeks ago, to consider and report upon certain interrogatories propounded by Rev. R. R. Gurley, respecting the agricultural, mechanical, military and educational condition of the country &c. &c. The meeting was duly organized by calling Hon S. Benedict, to the chair and C. V. [illegible], Esq. Secretary; after which the report—[illegible] some 7 or 8 pages of closely written matter was received by the meeting and was presented in a formal manner by the chairman, to Rev. Mr. Gurley, who replied to it in a very earnest, friendly, and eloquent address of some 30, or 40 minutes, enchaining the attention, of his auditory in a death-like stillness, while he briefly adverted to some heart thrilling circumstances connected with the early history of the colony of Liberia, which filled every breast with the warmest emotions, and every eye with grateful tears. The scene was truly affecting, at the period when he paid glowing tributes to the memory of Rev. C. M. Waring, and the exemplary actions, of the now living veteran, Rev. A. D. Williams. Those champions in the cause of liberty equality, and religion, he met twenty six years ago in Petersburg Virginia, (U. S. A,) at which time the Rev. C. M. Waring was pastor of a baptist church; there he embraced him as a friend and a brother, and advised, strengthened and comforted him, in language of friendship, like "apples of gold, in pictures of silver," upon his proposed expatriation from the land of his birth, to the then, dark and dismal land of Africa's unbroken wilderness, where superstition, folly, and cruelty reigned in triumph over the minds of the millions of her children;—but, to the now asylum of the oppressed; the home of the [illegible]—the free and independent Republic of Liberia! that, and this country did he come in the spirit of a true christian, and philanthrophist; where he assisted in establishing that indescribible germ, which has produced the Republic of Liberia, spending his time, talents, and wealth in his adopted country's cause, and preaching the unsearchable riches of Christ, to the perishing souls of the desolate natives.

The Rev. gentleman also adverted to some startling facts connected with that bloody battle of December 1st. 1822, which resulted in the permanent possession of this memorable hill—advising the audience present, but especially the young men, not to let that day die, but to commemorate its annual recurrence, to the latest posterity, and stamp its natal existence with the indelible seal of national grandeurs and hail its annual return, as the anniversary of the period, when the principles of liberty and religion, triumphed over slavery and superstition, and as the dawn of that bright and luminous day-star of hope, which has waxed into a genial sun of refulgent rays, darting its light and heat across our political horizon and implicitly declaring that Africa Shall be free.

This sturdy veteran in Liberia's cause, is now about to leave us for his country and his home; we are confident that he carries with him the heart felt wishes of Liberia's, thousands, that he may arrive home in safety, and live long to bless the cause which he so early espoused, and that finally, when he must go the way of all the earth, he may like the setting sun when clear and unclouded, transmit such beams of radiant splendor upon Liberia's horizon, as shall enlighten her national pathway to the remotest period of future existence!

The next Legislature.

In a few days hence, our new Legislature, according to Law, will convene. We know not who will be the speaker of the House of Representatives, or which of the candidates, will exofficio be the President of the Senate; but, we presume the matter will be arranged, and the machinery go into opperation, by the 3rd day of the Session. The Honorables, are arriving among us already;—far-off Sinoe, having made her appearance in the person, of one of her Senators, and we suppose in a few days, that all will have arrived, and prepared for their onerous duties. We do not intend to premise the course or immediate duties of the next legislature; for we must reasonably suppose, that as law makers, and constructionists, they have already digested their course, laid their plans, and mooted the measures that they intend to adopt, and agitate for the general weal of the Country. We hope that they, may be endued with a competency of wisdom, to execute the high trust reposed in them. Prudence, firmness, and perspicacity should distinguish all their doings; that no hasty, rash, or inconsiderate measures may be proposed, in the heat of excitement, or under the lash of debate, and adopted, without mature reflection.

For, we think from the signs of the times that we are justified, and authorized, to say, that, the future position of our country—either, for disastrous consequences, or beneficial result,—depends greatly, upon the action of this next ensuing Legislature: and as a consequence, we anticipate, that no party domination will prevail, except the one great party—The Country. We do no intend by this, to say that parties when properly, and wisely organized, are not beneficial; we believe that they are; for they mutually probe corruption, vice, and cliques, out of each others ranks, conserve the general interest, and maintain a political equilibrium among all classes of our great republican family; but we think, there is no necessity for a regular, formal organization on those principles now, for we believe the whole country is virtually such a party as we have hinted at, a similarity of principle founded upon the conceived spirit and character of the constitution,—seems to prevail. This being the case, we are confident that any other party,—base demagogueery,—in whatever aspect, or disguise it may present itself, would be injurious, and to all to the best interests of the country; though, the time may not be very far distant, when parties, not a party, will exist, growing out of a diffused, general principle of intelligence, and Education.

The necessity at present, of a system of wholesome civil, and criminal Laws is no doubt apparent to all who have considered this department of national policy; and we are charitable enough, to believe that the ensuing Legislature, will give this matter some attention; and, by the way, it may be recommended, that a liberal system of Education should be adopted, founded, perhaps, upon the manual labor system, and supported by the staple commodities of the country, as a sufficient surplusage can be realized, to give such an enterprise an important impetus, and a tangibility that shall be felt far and wide. By hinting at these things, we do not wish to be impeached, as possessing a spirit of intolerant propagandism, in the general Sinister acceptation of that term; but on the contrary, we feel impressed with the importance of a scheme of this kind, as being productive of great general results, if it be established in such a manner as to create a chain of mutual dependencies. We submit this to the public, and the Legislature, believing that they will not adopt any measures, but what will be just liberal, and patriotic.

On Wednesday 21st inst. the citizens of Monrovia, manifested their grateful acknowledgements to Rev R. R. Gurley, by tendering him a public dinner, which was served up at the Senate Chamber, under the supervision of B. V. R. James, Esq.

In our next, we propose giving a full account of the festivities, embracing toasts, speeches, &c. &c. &c.

For the Liberia Herald.

At a meeting of the citizens of Monrovia and of the upper settlements of Monserrado County, on the 19th of Nov. 1849, on motion, it was unanimously Resolved. That the chairman should in behalf of the community address a complimentary letter to our much loved and distinguished friend and visitor the Rev. R. R. Gurley, exhibiting therein the great pleasure we enjoy from his visit to this Republic, from his heart cheering addresses, as well as from his agreeable company, &c. &c.

Rev and Dear Sir.

Therefore. In accordance with the above resolution. That I should in behalf of this community address you a letter expressive of your heartiest welcome to our shore and Houses, hailing you with emotion of heartfelt gratitude as one among our greatest friends and best of benefactors insomuch that we can scarcely find words adequate to express the indescribeable satisfaction we have enjoyed, in your truly agreeable company since you arrived in Liberia.

Rev. Sir! we Liberians are not insensible of your unwearied labors and untiring zeal in the cause of African colonization The result of which causes us to day, to be free, Sovereign, and Independent people recognized as such by some of the most powerful nations of the world. I must again say that your labors for our good are fully known and cannot be too highly appreciated Indeed we need no history to remind us of your friendship and sincerity towards Liberia, no, it is written indelibly upon the tables of our memory.

POETRY.

For the Liberia Herald.

Lines adopted to the condition of the Surrounding tribes.

My heathen kindred why,
Such dismal clouds brood o'er thy sky.
Such drapery sad, portentous, drear,
Despite of the Apostle's care;
O'er spread the prospect o'er?

Hast not the heralds of our God
Through dangers fierce amongts you trod,
Proclaimed to the of Saviour's power
To bless thee though in later hour?
As thou hast heard prayer so recieve.

O God we pray thee turn their mind,
From folly's way to things divine;
Engraft upon their hearts, thy Love
And grant that light from the above:
Those gloomy clouds, may chase away.

THE HARD NAME.

Concluded

"Yes, without cream. I was very particular in my inquiries, and the information may be relied upon."

"Very singular, indeed! Now I think cream is all the beauty of coffee."

"I should not be at all surprised," said Miss Vinegar, "if he should prove to be the Bank robber, whom we saw advertised."

"But he is a dark man, with black hair," said Miss Willowbough, "and the stranger has a very light complexion."

"Nothing easier than to alter the complexion, as you must know Miss Willowbough," retorted Miss Vinegar. Miss Willowbough enjoyed the reputation of improving her complexion with pearl powder, but she blushed through it all, and continued, "but then the robber is a large man, and the stranger is tall and slim."

"Nothing easier than reducing the size of the waist," answered Miss Vinegar sharply, and glancing at Miss Willowbough's hour-glass form.

Really the conversation was becoming quite personal. So at least thought Miss Willowbough, as she answered

But there is one thing he could not alter.—He is evidently not more than twenty-five years old while the advertisement describes the robber as over forty; and, your own experience Miss Vinegar, must convince you of the impossibility of any one's appearing twenty years younger than he really is."

Miss Vinegar began to mutter about "some people," and "some other people," but was interrupted by an exclamation from Mrs. Smith, which drew all eyes to the window.

"There he goes, as I live!"

"See," observed Mrs. Jones, as the "mysterious stranger" took a long step to avoid a muddy spot, "see how mysteriously he lifts his foot."

Poor man, he little knew the interest he was exciting in the kind souls who were watching him.

"I wonder if he is married," said Miss Willowbough.

"If he is not," said Miss Vinegar he will not probably fancy a piece of paint and whalebone."

"Nor a woman old enough to be his grandmother," retorted Miss Willowbough

"There, did you see Mr. White? He bowed to the stranger, so he must know him. I will knock on the window, and beckon for him to come in. I will inquire concerning his daughter—she is in delicate health, you know. Indeed, I have some preserves for her A capital excuse, is it not?"

Mr. White was the only person in the village who had ever been known to keep a secret, consequently his popularity with the ladies was below zero. He was a complete anomaly. He could enjoy a cup of tea, although not sweetened with scandal; and really, it never seemed to destroy his appetite for his own dinner, because he could not tell what constituted that of his next neighbor's

"Oh why did you bekon to that man? I never could bear him," said Miss Vinegar.

"We have no other means of ascertaining anything about the stranger, answered Mrs. Smith; "but what objection have you to Mr. White?"

"Because he is so very impertinent. Would ye believe it—no longer ago than last Monday, I saw him go home with a covered marketbasket—strange that people will use such things—I sent Betty over to ascertain what he had for dinner—the most natural thing in the world you know, and what do you think he said? He told her he should dine on scandal, and, was is not so very common a dish, he would invite her mistress to dinner. So impertinent!, and to a lady, too! I declare, I can't bear him. Betty found out, though. He had a salmon. It couldn't have cost him less than three or four dollars—say three dollars and fifty cents."

The amiable Miss Vinegar was interrupted by the entrance of Mr. White himself. Mrs. Smith was very kind in inquiries about Mrs. White's health. Miss Vinegar apologised for the impertinence of her maid, who, she declared, went off without her knowledge, and had grown so inquisitive that she expected to be compelled to dismiss her."

What gentleman were you speaking to just now?" asked Mrs. Brown.

"O, he, he—was a stranger."

"Well what is his name?" was the eager question, as pressed around him. But none of them observed the mischievous smile that played upon his lips, as he answered with assumed hesitancy." I really do not know—as I ought to–in fact, I do not exactly recollect his name."

"Oh! but you must tell us; it shall go no farther, I assure you."

"I should like to tell you: but, really, there are some peculiar circumstances, which—"

"But you certainly would not hesitate to inform us," said Mrs. Smith. "I have not the least curiosity in the world, but I merely—wish to know—that's all."

"He has a very hard name," said Mr. White.

"Hard name—what is it, Stone?"

"Oh! no, Harder."

"Harder than stone? then it is Iron I suppose."

"No, Harder yet."

"Harder than Iron? impossible—Adamant?"

"Harder still."

"Harder than adamant! I cannot imagine what it is."

"I do not feel at liberty to tell; but if you can guess, I shall not be responsible. So good morning, ladies;" and, in spite their entreaties, Mr. White fairly made his escape.

"What can it be," said Mrs. Smith, "harder than adamant?"

"I have it," said Mrs. Brown,"heart."

"You do not mean, pray, that the heart is harder than adamant!" said Miss Willowbough, with a sigh.

"I speak in a spiritual sense," said Mrs. Brown; "the heart is, by nature, totally depraved, and until—"

"I wonder if it is not Pharaoh," interrupted Miss Vinegar? Many other names were proposed and rejected. At last they arrived at the conclusion that his name must be Diamond; and, with this opinion, the ladies separated.

Again the ladies were in conclave, at the house of Mrs. Smith. Again Mr. Diamond, so they had named the stranger, passed the window; and, again, all eyes were directed toward him.

"There! he has dropped a letter in the street," said Miss Vinegar. "Send some one for it, while I keep watch."

Mrs. Smith's maid was immediately despatched for the important document, while Miss Vinegar stood sentinel at the door, lest some more fortunate individual should secure the prize. But her caution was needless; the maid picked up the letter Mrs. Smith received it at the street door and, without looking at it, so great was her haste, bore it in triumph to her anxious guests.

"Now, we shall know his name," said Miss Vinegar. Mrs. Smith held up the letter, and read the superscription:

"WILLIAM HARDER, Esquire."

AN UNKNOWN WORLD.

English in Eastern Africa—Its Climate.

Quite recently, the English have made a settlement at Aden near the Red Sea Having once obtained a foot hold they, English like, began to bush about them and one of their first discoveries was a river where none was marked upon a chart, and upon this they steamed three hundred miles without finding the least obstruction. Having now passed round this continent let us look up in the interior. For half a century the English government have been expending lives and treasures in a partial exploration. They have found that this whole tract of country is one of amazing fertility and beauty, abounding in gold and all sorts of tropical vegitation. There are hundreds of woods invaluable for dying and architectural purposes not found in other portions of the world. Through it; for thousands of miles, sweeps a river, from three to six miles broad, with clear water and of unsurpassed depth flowing on at a rate of two or three miles an hour, without rock, shoal or snag to interrupt its navigation. Other rivers pours into this tributary waters of such volumes, as must have required hundreds of miles to be collected, yet they seem scarcely to enlarge it. This river pours its waters into the Atlantic, through the most magnificent delta in the world, consisting perhaps of a hundred mouths, extending probably five hundred miles along the coast, and mostly broad, deep and navigable for steamboats. Upon this river are scattered cities, some of which are estimated to contain a million of inhabitants, and the whole country teems with a dense population.

Far in the interior, in the very heart of the continent, is a nation in an advancing state of civilization. The grandeur and beauty of portions of the country through which the Niger makes its sweeping circuit, are indescribable. In many places its banks rise boldly a thousand feet, thickly covered with the richest vegetation of tropical climes. But all this vast and sublime country, this scope of rich fertility and romantic beauty, is apparently shut out forever from the world. It is the negro's sole possession. He need not fear the incursions of the white man there, for over this whole lovely country moves one dread malady, and to the white man it is "valley of the shadow of death."

In expedition after expedition, sent out from the English ports on the Island of Ascension, not one man in ten has returned alive; all have fallen victims to this seemingly beautiful country. It seems impossible for an Englishman to breathe the air. So dreadful is it—so small the chance of life, that criminals in England have been offered pardon, on condition of volunteering in this service, more terrible than that of gathering the poison from fabled Upas. This country, tempting as it is, can only be penetrated at the risk of life; and it is melancholy to think that those who have given us even the meagre information that we have, do so at the sacrifice of their lives.—Simon's Colonial Magazine.

From the Liberia Advocate.

The Interior of Africa is more civilized than the coast. for the reason that it is further removed from the ravages of the slave trade; the people have made greater advances in agriculture and the mechanic arts, because property is more secure from the effects of that cruel traffic. But the day is now approaching when this state of things will be reversed; for the slave trade will be abolished by the establishment of free republican colonies, by the foundation of regular colonial governments, schools and institutions of learning and under the influence of a free press. The establishment of civil and religious liberty in Africa will give a new impulse to the prosperity of that continent and will extend the sphere of civilization and legitimate commerce.—Despotism and priestcraft will give way before the influence of civil liberty and freedom of conscience. The African coast, when lined with civilized republican settlements, will send education and civilization over that continent which has heretofore been the scene of the most horrible traffic that ever disgraced the human family.—Organ.

The Fate of Nations.—According to Macaulay, chance has had more to do than superiority of race, in advancing the position of the English nation. In his history of England he says:

Had the Plantagenets, as at one time seemed likely, succeeded in uniting all France under their government, it is probable that England would never have had an independent existence. Her princes, her lords, her prelates, would have been men differing in race and language from the artizans and tillers of the earth. The revenues of her proprietors would have been spent in festivities and diversions on the banks of the Seine—the noble language of Milton and Burke would have remained a rude dialect, without a literature, a fixed grammar, or a fixed orthography, and would have been contemptuously abandoned to use of boors. No man of English extraction would have arisen to eminence, except by becoming in speech and habits a Frenchman.

England owes her escape from such calamities to an event which her historians have generally represented as disastrous. —I bedem

From the Examiner

The Model Magistrate.

He is a barrister, with a subdued practice, and but little known above the usher of his court. He soon learns, however, that the scales of justice have two sides —one for the rich, one for the poor. The balance as he holds it, is rarely equal. For the one there is a fine, "which is immediately paid," for the other there is a House of Correction, with hard labor. The gentleman is invited to a seat on the bench; the pauper is kindly informed that "he better mind what he is about." He knows the intrinsic value of every assault, and has fixed a market price for every limb. An eye costs very little more than a case of drunkenness. A broken head he puts down at couple of sovereigns, or a donation to the poor-box. He is sorry to see young gentlemen "who have been dining out" forget themselves so, and will only fine them. He is sure he has seen every applewoman before. He will have no trading on the kerbstones. He has great faith in the words of the police, and calls them by their real names. He has a just hatred of a cabman, only to be equalled by his profound aversion to an omnibus-conductor. He sees a poacher in every smockfrock. All beggars he sends to the mill. He addressed a pickpocket as "Sir," and is sarcastic upon boys calling them "young gentlemen." He delights in summoning overseers and beadles enjoys a good collision with the workhouse. He regrets exceedingly to commit a nobleman. He has a private room for a lady shop-lifter, and is glad to inform her that she "leaves this court with her character quite unimpugned," though the matter has been compromised within his hearing. He has the most sublime contempt for the opinion of the press. He does not care what they say of him, though he does inveigh sometimes rather strangely against them. He does not like his law to be questioned, but of two evils prefers a lawyer to a barrister. He jokes sometimes, and the whole court, excepting the poor prisoner, at whose expense the lugubrious joke is cut, laugh tremendously. The model magistrate arrives at the police office at ten, but does not mind keeping the court wading He leaves as soon as he can, though he is not very partial to visit at his own residence. But what he likes least are remonstrances from the Home-office, for, strangely enough, a magistrate has been dismissed before now. This may have some little influence in keeping the race of model magistrates rather restricted. May it soon become extinct! It is most painful to hear of a magistrate committing himself instead of others.—Punch

HOMER.—What wisdon there is in the father of poetry! With a few omissions it is the very book for children. I know of no story except Robinson Crusoe, which fascinates a child so much as Homer. It is all natural, simple, capable of being understood by a child.

BATTLE OF WATERLOO, 18TH JUNE, 1815.

When I awoke—it was morning, at daylight, I found myself completely wet with rain. I had slept so long and so soundly that I had, at first, but a very confused notion of my situation; nothing distinct was that my horse had gone away from me during the night. I went to sleep, I was rather startled at finding that I was now awake; nor could I rub my eyes clear enough to procure a sight of him, which was vexation enough: for independent of his value as a horse, his services were indispensable; and an adjutant might as well think of going into action without his arms as without a supporter. But whatever my feelings might have been towards him, it was evident that he had none for me, from having drawn his sword and marched off. The chances of finding him again, amid ten thousand others, were about equal to the odds against the needle in a bundle of hay; but for once the single chance was gained, as, after a diligent search of an hour, he was discovered, between two artillery horses, about half a mile from where he broke loose.

The weather cleared up as the morning advanced; and, though everything remained quiet, the moment we were confident that the day would not pass off without an engagement, we, therefore, proceeded to put our arms in order, as also, to get ourselves dried and made as comfortable as circumstances would permit.

We made a fire against the wall of Sir Andrew Barnard's cottage, and boiled a huge camp-kettle full of tea, mixed up with a suitable quantity of milk and sugar, for breakfast; and, as it stood on the edge of the high road, where all the baggage of the army had occasion to pass, in the early part of the morning, I believe almost every one of them, from the Duke downwards, claimed a cupful.

About nine o'clock, we received an order to retain a quantity of spare ammunition, in some secure place, and to send everything in the shape of baggage and baggage-animals to the rear. It, therefore, became evident that the Duke meant to give battle in his present position; and it was, at the same time, generally understood that a corps of thirty thousand Prussians were moving to our support.

About ten o'clock, an unusual bustle was observable among the staff-officers, and we soon after received an order to stand to our arms. The troops who had been stationed in our front during the night were then moved off to the right, and our division took up its fighting position.

Our battalion stood on what was considered the left centre of the position. We had our right resting on the Namur-road, about a hundred yards in rear of the farm-house of La Haye Sainte, and our left extending behind a broken hedge, which ran along the ridge to the left. Immediately in our front, and divided from La Haye Sainte only by the great road, stood a small knoll, with a sand-hole in its farthest side, which we occupied, as an advanced post, with three companies. The remainder of the division was formed in two lines; the first, consisting chiefly of light troops, behind the hedge, in continuation from the left of our battalion reserve; and the second, about a hundred yards in its rear. The guns were placed in the intervals between the brigades—two pieces were in the road-way on our right, and a rocket-brigade in the centre.

The road had been cut through the rising ground, and was about twenty or thirty feet deep where our right rested, and, which, in a manner, separated us from all the troops beyond. The division, I believe under General Alten occupied the ground next to us, on the right. He had a light battalion of the German legion, posted inside of La Haye Sainte, and the household brigade of cavalry stood under cover of the rising ground behind him. On the left were we some Hanoverians and Belgians, together with a brigade of British heavy dragoons, the royals, and Scotch greys.

These were all the observations on the disposition of our army that my situation allowed me to make. The whole position seemed to be a gently rising ground, presenting no obstacle at any point, excepting the broken hedge in the front of our division, and it was only one in appearance, as it could be passed in every part.

Shortly after we had taken up our ground, some columns, from the enemy's left, were seen in motion towards Hugamont, and were soon warmly engaged with the right of our army. A cannon ball, too, came from the Lord knows where, for it was not fired at us, and took the head off our right hand man. That part of their position, in our immediate front, next claimed our undivided attention. It had hitherto been looking suspiciously innocent, with scarcely a human being upon it; but innumerable black specks were now seen taking post at regular distances in its front, and recognizing them as so many pieces of artillery, I knew, from experience, although nothing else was yet visible, that they were unerring symptoms of our not being destined to be idle spectators.

From the moment we took possession of the knoll, we had busied ourselves in collecting branches of trees and other things; for the purpose of making an abatis to block up the road between that and the farm-house, and soon completed one, which we thought looked sufficiently formidable to keep out the whole of the French cavalry; but it was put to the proof sooner than we expected, by a troop of our own light dragoons, who, having occasion to gallop through, astonished us not a little by clearing away every stick of it. We had just time to replace the scattered branches, when the whole of the enemy's artillery opened, and their countless columns began to advance under cover of it.

The scene at that moment was grand and imposing, and we had a few minutes to spare for observation. The column destined as our particular friends, first attracted our notice and seemed to consist of about ten thousand infantry. A smaller body of infantry, some of cavalry moved on their right; and on their left, another huge column of infantry, and a formidable body of cuirassiers, while beyond them it seemed one moving mass.

We saw Buonaparte himself take post on the side of the road, immediately in our front, surrounded by a numerous staff; and each regiment, as they passed him, rent the air with shouts of "vive l' Empereur," nor did they cease after they had passed; but, backed by the thunder of their artillery, and carrying with them the rubidub of drums, and the tan ta ra of trumpets, in addition to their increasing shouts, it looked, at first, as if they had some hopes of scaring us off the ground; for it was a singular contrast to the stern silence reigning on our side, where nothing, as yet, broke the voices of our great guns, and that we had orders to open when we chose to fire them. Our rifles were, however, in a very few seconds required to play their parts, and opened a fire on the advancing skirmishers as quickly brought them to a stand still; but their columns advanced steadily through a hail of fire, and through our incessant tirailleurs were driven in their centre with fearful execution, and our post was quickly turned in its flanks which compelled us to fall back and join our comrades, behind the hedge, though not before some of our officers and theirs had been engaged in personal combat.

When the heads of their columns showed over the knoll which we had just quitted they received such a fire from our first line, that they wavered, and hung behind it a little; but, cheered and encouraged by the gallantry of their officers, who were dancing and flourishing their swords in front, they at last boldly advanced to the opposite side of our hedge, and began to deploy. Our first line, in the mean time, was getting so thinned, that Picton found it necessary to bring up his second, but fell in the act of doing it. The command of the division, at that critical moment, devolved upon Sir James Kempt, who was galloping along the line, animating the men to steadiness. He called to me by name, which I happened to be standing on the right of our battalion, and desired me "to keep that spot." I told him that he might depend upon it;" and in another instant I was engaged in a fair way of keeping my word more religiously than I anticipated; for, during my eye was to the right, I saw the field covered with the cuirassiers some of whom were making directly for the gap in the hedge where I was standing. I had not hitherto drawn my sword, as it was generally to be had at a moment's warning; but from its having been exposed the last night's rain, it had now got rusted in the scabbard and refused to come forth! I was in a precious scrape. Mounted on my strong Flanders mare, and with my good old sword in my hand, I would have braved all the chances without a moment's hesitation; but, I confess, that I felt considerable doubts as to the propriety of standing there to be sacrificed, without the means of making a scramble for it. My mind, however, was happily relieved from such an embarrassing consideration, before my decision was required; for the next moment the cuirassiers were charged by our household brigade; and the infantry in our front giving way at the same time, under our terrific shower of musketry, the flying cuirassiers tumbled in among the routed infantry, followed by the life-guards, who were cutting away in all directions. Hundreds of the infantry threw themselves down, and pretended to be dead, while the cavalry galloped over them and then got up and ran away. I never saw such a scene in all my life.

Lord Wellington had given orders that the troops were, on no account, to leave the position to follow up any temporary advantage; so that we now resumed our post, as we stood at the commencement of the battle, and with three companies again advanced on the knoll.

I was told, it was very ridiculous, at that moment, to see the number of vacant spots that were left nearly all along the whole of the line, where a great part of the dark dressed foreign troops had stood, intermixed with the British, when the action began.

Our division got considerably reduced in numbers during the last attack; but Lord Wellington's fostering hand sent Sir John Lambert to our support, with the sixth division; and we now stood prepared for another and more desperate struggle.

Our battalion had already lost three officers killed, and six or seven wounded; among the latter were Sir Andrew Barnard and Colonel Cameron.

Some one asking me what had become of my horse's ear, was the first intimation I had of his being wounded; and I now found that, independent of one ear having been shaved close to the head, (I suppose by a cannon-shot,) a musket-ball had grazed across his forehead, and another gone through one of his legs, but he did not seem much the worse for either of them.

Between two and three o'clock we were tolerably quiet, except from a thundering cannonade; and the enemy had, by that time, got the range of our position so accurately that every shot brought a ticket for somebody's head.

An occasional gun, beyond the plain, far to our left, marked the approach of the Prussians, but their progress was too slow to afford a hope of their arriving in time to take any share in the battle.

On our right, the roar of cannon and musketry had been incessant from the time of its commencement; but the higher ground, near us, prevented our seeing anything of what was going on.

Between three and four o'clock, the storm gathered again in our front. Our three companies on the knoll were soon involved in a furious fire. The Germans, occupying La Haye Sainte, expended all their ammunition, and fled from the post. The French took possession of it, and, as it flanked our knoll, we were obliged to abandon it also, and fall back again behind the hedge.

The loss of La Haye Sainte was of the most serious consequence, as it afforded the enemy an establishment within our position. They immediately brought up two guns on our side of it, and began serving out some grape to us; but they were so very near, that we destroyed their artillerymen before they could give us a second round.

The silencing of these guns was succeeded by a very extraordinary scene, on the same spot. A strong regiment of Hanoverians advanced in order to charge the enemy out of La Haye Sainte; but they were themselves charged by a brigade of cuirassiers, and, excepting one officer, on a little black horse, who went off to the rear, like a shot out of a shovel, I do believe that every man of them was put to death in about five seconds. A brigade of British light dragoons advanced to their relief, and a few on each side, began exchanging thrusts; but it seemed likely to be a one-sided battle between them, without much harm being done, when our men brought it to a crisis sooner than either side anticipated, for they previously had their rifles eagerly pointed at the cuirassiers, with a view of saving the perishing Hanoverians; but the fear of killing their friends withheld them, until the others were nearly overwhelmed, when they instantly opened a terrific fire on the whole concern, sending both sides in flight; so that, on the small space of ground, within a hundred yards of us, where five thousand men had been fighting the instant before, there was not now a living soul to be seen.

It made me mad to see the cuirassiers, in their retreat, stooping and stabbing at our wounded men as they lay on the ground. How I wished that I had been blessed with Omnipotent power for a moment, that I might have blighted them!

The same field continued to be a wild one the whole of the afternoon. It was a sort of duelling-ground between the two armies, every half an hour showing a meeting of some kind upon it; but they never exceeded a short scramble, for men's lives were held very cheap there.

For the two or three succeeding hours there was no variety with us, but one continued blaze of musketry. The smoke hung so thick about, that although not more than eighty yards asunder, we could only distinguish each other by the flashes of the pieces.

A good many of our guns had been disabled, and a great many more rendered unserviceable in consequence of the unprecedented close fighting; for, in several places, where they had been posted but a very few yards in front of the line, it was impossible to work them.

I shall never forget the scene which the field of battle presented about seven in the evening. I felt weary and worn out, less from fatigue than anxiety. Our division, which had stood upwards of five thousand men at the commencement of the battle, had gradually dwindled down into a solitary line of skirmishers. The twenty-seven regiment were lying literally dead, in square, a few yards behind us. My horse had received another shot through the leg and one through the flap of the saddle which lodged in his body, sending him a step beyond the pensioner-list. The smoke still hung so thick about us we could see nothing. I walked a little way to each flank to endeavour to get a glimpse of what was going on, but nothing met my eye except the mangled remains of men and horses, and I was obliged to return to my post as wise as I went.

I have never yet heard of a battle which everybody was killed; but this seemed likely to be an exception, as all were going by turns. We got excessively impatient under the tame similitude of the latter part of the process, and burned with desire to have a last thrust at our respective vis-à-vis; for, however desperate our affairs were, we had still the satisfaction of seeing that theirs were worse. Sir John Lambert continued to stand as our support at the head of three good old regiments, one dead (the twenty-seventh) and two living ones; and we took the liberty of soliciting him to aid our views; but the Duke's orders on that head were so very particular that the gallant General had no choice.

Fashionable Manners.

There is a set of people whom I cannot bear —the pinks of fashionable propriety—whose every word is precise, and whose every movement is unexceptionable; but who, though versed in all the categories of polite behaviour, have not a particle of soul or of cordiality about them. We allow that their manners may be abundantly correct. There may be elegance in every gesture, and gracefulness in every position; not a smile out of place, and not a step that would not bear the measurement of the severest scrutiny. This is all very fine; but what I want is the heart and gaiety of social intercourse—the frankness that spreads ease and animation around it—the eye that speaks affability to all, that chases timidity from every bosom, and tells every man in the company to be confident and happy. This is what I conceive to be the virtue of the text and not the sickening formality of those who walk by rule, and would reduce the whole human life to a wire-bound system of misery and constraint.—Dr. Chalmers' Sermons in Posthumous Works.

UNITED STATE.

Good Things for Liberia.—A charter for a college in Liberia has just been granted by the Legislature of Massachusetts, and several substantial evidences of sympathy and approbation manifested

Already has a gentlemen presented $10,000 towards an endowment fund for the proposed institution, besides $8000 subscribed in smaller sums.

Efforts are making for a scientific exploration of Africa. At a recent meeting of the Pennsylvania Academy of Natural Sciences, it was made know that two gentlemen—brothers—residents respectively of Cincinnati and Louisville—had munificently offered to bear all the expenses of a botanical mission to Africa provided a person of proper zeal and other qualifications can be obtanined for the service. Also, that a justly celebrated geologist of Ohio had expressed a wish to make a geological survey of that great continet. If, then, a sum of money sufficient could be raised to pay for the labors of a naturalist, and of the three thus appointed to form an exploring corps under the direction of this learned body, the cause of science would not only be largely promoted, but in case of disease or danger, they would mutually sustain and protect each other.

The legacy of $10,000 bequeathed to the American Colonization Society, by the Hon. William Short of our city, has been promptly paid over to the Trustees named in the will, and by them remitted to the Treasurer of the Society at Washington.

One of our fellow citizens has given the American Sunday School Union $10,000 as a permanent fund, the net income of which is to be annually expended in their useful publications for circulation among the Sabbath Schools of the new Republic.

An arrival a few days since from the West Indies brings the cheering intelligence, that a large number of the colored population of Barbadoes and Antigua have formed themselves into a Society, for the purpose of emigrating to Africa. They had adopted an address, plan, rules, &c., on the subject, a printed copy of which now lies before us, and is remarkable for its excellent good sense and appropriateness. About one hundred of the most intelligent and wealthy residents of these Islands are preparing for the change, the most of them being able to bear all the expenses in addition to taking with them means and stock to a considerable extent. —Phil. N. American.

Congress.—The Committee of thirteen, by their Chairman, Mr. Clay,—have reported in favor of the admission of Calafornia, into the Union, as a State. The Report also recommends the abolition of the Slave Trade in the District of Columbia.

At the meeting of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, held in New York on Monday evening, May 13th., Twenty one thousand dollars was appropriated by the Committee, for the Liberia Mission.

American Temperance Union.—This Institution held its 14th. anniversary in Broad-way, Tabernacle, May 14th. The Report, of the past year, has the following:—"Liberia is a perfect temperance Republic; temperance forming one of its corner stones."

LIBERIA HERALD

MONROVIA, AUGUST 7th, 1850.

The Slave Trade no go on the Liberian Coast.—The Portuguese Felucca, which has been dodging about here for several weeks, and seen frequently off Gallinas, New Cestors, and Trade Town, has abandoned her purpose of procuring slaves from this part of the African coast. She was boarded off Gallinas, soon after her arrival on the coast, by an officer from Her Majesty's Brig "Wolverine." She, however, was not detained, the officer finding nothing on board which could be produced in evidence to condemn her as a slaver. It has been ascertained since, that while the "Wolverine" was in chase of her, the fellows threw overboard her slave equipment—and thus escaped being seized. Finding Gallinas closely watched, she proceeded to Trade Town, where the supercargo landed, and, it is said, offered cash, for 100 slaves, payable in doubloons on delivery to him at the beach, on a certain day. The authorities in the mean time, had obtained information of the real character of the vessel, and of the landing of a person from her at Trade Town, and without delay dispatched the Government schooner "Lark" to cruise off New Cestors and Trade Town to watch her movements, and to seize her, upon the first attempt to contravene our Laws. Captain Paten, of her Majesty's Brig "Hound" Senior Officer of the Sierra Leone Division, had also received intelligence that the Felucca was after slaves, and, in company with the "Heroine," was in search of her. These movements, and the constant presence of the "Lark" off Trade Town, alarmed the Captain; and he precipitately sailed for the South Coast, leaving he supercreargo on shore at Trade Town.

The 26th of July.—On Friday, the 26th ultimo, the third anniversary of Liberia's Independence, the usual demonstrations of public rejoicings were made throughout the Republic. In Monrovia, the arrangements for the day were suitable, and decidedly creditable to the City Authorities—who ordered and superintended them.

At 5 o'clock A. M. a gun from Montserrado's hight, aroused the slumbering inhabitants of the vale, and announced to them the dawn of a nation's natal day. A signal from Central Fort announced the hour of eight, when the glorious Star and Stripes were hoisted at the Govt. House, State House, and Forts; the Goverment vessel, and the mercantile marine in port, were decked with flags and streamers. We also observed flags flying at a number of private residences. At an early hour the uniformed companies of the 1st. Regiment, ordered out as an escort, under the Command of Lieut. Col: Mc Gill, were in motion. At 12 o'cock the national salute was fired from Fort Norris Battery, and was responded to from the battery of the Govt. schooner "Lark." The troops were then formed in line in front of the Government House, and recieved the Civil Officers, with the usual salutes;—the procession proceeded, headed by the Marshall, Capt. U. A. Mc.Gill, to the M. E. Church, where an appropriate Oration was delivered by Mr. John D. Moore; after which, the procession returned to the Government House, where the civil officers took a position in front of the "Saluting Flag;" the troops then filed off by the right, and marched pass in quick time, which ended the military display.

The ceremonies at the Church reflect great credit on the Committee of Arrangements. The singing, led by Major Payne,—if more puritanical than patriotic—was certainly executed admirably well; and the ladies and gentlemen, who formed the choir are entitled to, and we take the liberty of presenting, which we beg they will accept, the thanks of their fellow citizens. We understand that there were several large dinner parties in town. The Infantry, the State Fencibles, and the Artillery Companies each had a banquet, which was numerously attended.

In the evening the fête, which was so long looked forward to, came off in the Senate Chamber—the old Hall was filled to its utmost capacity. The company assembled at about 8 o'clock, when the presence of beaux and beauties inspired each other to extraordinary effort, the chit-chat went merrily on; the ladies were delighted, and the gentlemen were, by a strange kind of sympathy, the same way inclined. Amongst the company we noticed several ladies and gentlemen from the interior Settements. We think we never before, witnessed, in Liberia, such an array of beauty and fashion. At 10 o'clock supper was announced; and a sumptuous banquet indeed was spread. We noticed an unexceptionable an "enormous Cake" representing a well fortified castle, with the Liberian, the American, the English, and the French Flags beautifully interwoven, waving upon the battlements. Altogether it was a fine affair, and does honor to those who got it up:—there is no use of talking,—Jamison and Moore do go ahead of them all in getting up such things. The company did not disperse until a late hour, and when they did so, they all regretted that the hours had flown so fast.

Dedication.—The P. G. D of the I. O. Daughters of Temperance consecrated their Hall to the purposes of the Order, on the evening of the 24th ultimo. A number of ladies and gentlemen was present, by invitation, to witness the cerimonies. The Hall was tastefully decorated, and well lighted; and the Daughters appeared in their regalia to great advantage.

The dedication cerimonies were conducted by D. T. Harris Esquire. These closed. Mr. J. B. Phillips, a young lawyer of much merit, pronounced, in his best style, a neat and well digested address, after which, and the benediction by the Rev. Mr. Warner, the Division, accompanied by their guests, repaired to the residence of the second Grand Matron, where the closing cerimonies were indeed imposing and exceedingly interesting—The guests performing a conspicuous part. Nice "fixens" too, and cake, excellent;—but not a drop of wine to whet one's appetite, or assist digestion.

SUMMARY

Horses.—Two fine little ponies, from the interior arrived in town, a few days ago, and were purchased by Judge Benedict. Several horses have been brought down by the natives during the year; and we are pleased to learn that they thrive well in the settlements on the banks of the St. Paul.

Slaver Again.—The Portuguese ship cargo, who was left on shore at Trade Town passed up the coast, a few days ago, in a boat in search for Gallinas, and was there seized and sent on board Her Majesty's Brig "Hound." We have not learned what disposition Captain Patten will make of him.

Perhaps Murder.—The bodies of two men, York Preston and——were found in the Sinoe river on the 15th ult. The deceased were both citizens of Greenville, and were seen a day or two before passing down the river in a canoe, which was deeply laden with bricks. It appears that on their way down they called at a small native village to procure some refreshments, and one of them had an altercation with a man of the village, who was heard to utter threats against them. It is said that the Coroner's Jury found marks of violence on one of the bodies.

Drowned at Greenville.—On the 17th ult. a little girl about 8 years old, was by some means precipitated into a spring, and was drowned before assistance could be rendered.

Lecture.—Hon. H. Teage lectured before the Ladies Literary Institute, a few evenings ago, to a highly respectable auditory.

Anniversary.—The first anniversary of the Fidelity Division No. 1, of the Daughters of Temperance was celebrated in this town a few weeks ago, with appropriate cerimonies. The Division, headed by the Grand Mistress, proceeded in procession to the Senate Chamber, where temperance addresses were delivered by B. V. R. James Esq. Rev. John H. Cheesman, and Mr. Hill.

To F. FRALEY, &
J. WEIGAND Esqrs:

Gentlemen;—The late gratifying indications of agricultural enterpirze in the new Republic of Liberia, promises to open, for the Commerce and Manufactures of our beloved country, a new and important field. As it then becomes alike our duty and our interest to give impulse to this industrial movement among the citizens of that young State, permit me to suggest the propriety of offering four of your proposed medals—under such restrictions and regulations as the Franklin Institute may adopt,—for the largest product of coffee—sugar (not less than 500 lbs)—cotton (not less than 1000 lbs—clean) and Oil respectively, in the year 1851 by the citizens of Liberia.

I would respectfully propose that the medals be of silver—the expense of which will be cheerfully met by yours respectfully.

ELLIOTT CRESSON.

"Extract from the minutes of a meeting of the Franklin Institue of the State of Pennsylvania for the promotion of the mechanic arts held January 17th, 1850

Resolved.—That the Institute will award the "Elliott Cresson" Medal, struck in silver, for such articles of African production grown or made by the citizens of Liberia as Elliott Cresson Esqr. may designate according to the terms proposed in his letter of the 12th inst.

A true copy—

(Signed) ISAAC B. GARRIGUES,
Recording Secty.

We publish the above with pleasure; and it will no doubt be gratifying to our fellow citizens to find that Liberia's long and well tried friend, E. Cresson, Esqr: is constantly on the alert, and ever engaged in noble efforts to advance the true interests of the "New Republic."

The coffee medal will, doubtless, be take by some citizen in Grand Bassa County: the farmers of Montserrado County, we venture to predict, will successfully compete for the sugar and cotton medals. Now for our enterprising farmers.

COMMUNICATION.

For the Liberia Herald.

MR. HERALD:—

When the subject of throwing off our leading-strings, and asserting our independence was first mooted, and the propriety of immediately adopting the measure urged, it was met by every thing in the shape of opposition, excepting sound argumentation; and as a last resort, an attempt was made to frighten the advocates of the measure from their purpose, by boldly avowing, that in two years after the event, they who advocated it, would as deeply deplore the insane experiment, as they were then anxious to make it. Two anniversaries of that event have winged their way by us, and are now [illegible] With the years [illegible] and the [illegible] and the third, rapidly following them, is asking entrance into the same dark abyss. What are the answers it returns to these gloomy predictions? Does it approve or rebuke these far-reaching and sagacious seers? What is the import of the notes, which to day rise and swell upon the air? Do we hear the wailings of unappeasable lamentation, unavailing regret and hopeless despair? Are these the voices of bitter imprecations upon the heads and hands of those who conceived and wrought out the measure? Who, and what are those that move along the streets and throng the thoroughfares? Are they the victims of a crude experiment, attenuated to skeletons by hopeless disappointment, and inconsolable regrets, and in token of utter abandonment are habited in sackcloth and ashes? Would that some of the scorners and opposers were here to day! How they would stand rebuked by every object, whether of sight, sound or taste, that presents itself!! Every sight is cheerful and joyous—every sound, the expression of glad exultation, and pleasing anticipation, and many a table groans under the incumbent load of savory joints and other selected viands. Eastern Nature herself seems to relent, and joins in the general gladness. The sun shines as through a screen gently attempering his beams, and the clouds withhold their accustomed showers!

Of the special exercises, I need say nothing, except—pardon me Mr. Corypheus, the selection of hymns was not altogether the best than can be imagined. They would suit a prayer meeting very much better. Wesley's ardent breathing after sanctification and full salvation, seems but little accordant with the nodding plume, the measured tramp, the banner and the musket of the soldier, and the rub-a-dub-dub of the drum. If it be right to go to church with an escort of drum, and fife, and musket and cannon, to set our banner up on each side of the sacred desk, so that the minister when praying may feel their inspiration, where is the harm of having a little martial music to accord with the display?

I hope Mr. Herald, you will not think me irreverent, if, with all this preparation before us for the work of death—which you know is the devil's work, I ask where had been the inconsistency had we been Englishmen, to sing "God save the Queen," or, "Rule Britannia?" or if Americans, to sing—"Yankee Doodle?" Our intentions and purpose are clearly indicated by our preparations—unless on entering the portals of the church we dropped the Lion and assumed the Lamb. A stranger to our Protean facility would be inclined to think Mars the presiding deity of the day—that we had assembled to present our offerings at his shrine. What had powder and ball to do with our independence? And do we achieve it by our own strength? Or are we indebted for it to the favour which a merciful God gave us in the sight of the people? If it came to us in virtue of victory in the field of human slaughter then let us celebrate its anniversary in the cannon's roar; but if it came down to us a gracious boon from heaven let us record and perpetuate the recollection of its coming in the attitude of unfeigned thankfulness and entire dependence. Render unto Cæser the things that are Cæser's.

Respectfully Yours.

I have great pleasure in giving testimony to the comfort kindness and attention I receive during my residence on shore—Mr. & Mrs. Ellis' Hotel is really well worthy of the name,—and at present is the only establishment of the sort in the Republic; at times I could scarcely believe I was sitting down under such comfortable and independent circumstances in the Liberia capital. May the Republic flourish in a like ratio, and from the little I have seen of the general manners and customs of the small and enterprising nation, I have little doubt but that ere very long, with the blessing of God, which hitherto has always attended them, they will astonish the world—

MISCELLANEOUS.

Wealth of the English Aristocracy.

We find in a digest of Mr. Colman's recent book on Europe, prepared for the Boston Transcript, some interesting particulars of the wealth of several of the noblemen of Great Britain:

"Althorpe, the residence of Earl Spencer, consists of 10,000 acres, all lying together in wood, meadow, pasture, gardens, parks, and every thing in a style of superior beauty and order."

His house contains sleeping rooms for seventy guests; the entries and rooms are filled with pictures and stautes. A gallery of pictures, one hundred feet long contains many of the works of the first masters. His library comprises more than 50,000 volumes, and is said to be the finest library in the world.

The Duke of Richmond's home farm (Goodwood) consists of 23,000 acres. His whole domain at Goodwood is 40,000 acres. He has a summer retreat in Scotland of between two and 300,000 acres. "Of the beauty and magnificence of this establishment," says Mr. Colman, "I cannot give you any adequate idea;" extensive parks, through which you ride for miles and miles—herds of deer, sheep and cattle—twenty five race horses in the stable, and a groom for each—an aviary filled with a variety of splendid birds, fish ponds, grottos, &c.

The annual income of the Duke of Devonshire the proprietor of Chartworth, is said to be £200,000, or one million of dollars. This is said to be the most splendid nobleman's seat in the Kingdom. His arboretum, covering many acres, contains one or more specimens of every tree that can be aclimated; the kitchen garden covers twelve acres, a conservatory, 387 feet long, 117 wide, 67 high, with a carriage way. This conservatory is covered with 7600 square ft. of glass and warmed with hot water, passing through an extent of seven miles. The fountain at Chatsworth throws the water to the height of 276 feet. Here the Duke owns 3 500 acres, and 96,000 in Derbyshire. For a minute description of these sumptuous residences, and a full account of their interior arrangements, style of living &c., the reader is referred to the letters of Mr. Colman.

On page 108, vol. 1. Mr. Colman gives an account of several noblemen whose annual income varied from £100,000 to £150,000 that is, from $500,000 to $750,000. Speaking of Lord Yarborough, he says, that his Lordship has an indefinite number of hunters, &c" and adds: "It was the custom of this place for his Lordship, and his guests were always invited to accompany him, at nine o'clock precisely, in the evening, to visit the stables where the hunting and the riding horses were kept, which were reached by a covered passage-way from the house. The stables presented all the neatness of a house parlor, and the grooms were more than a dozen in number, all drew up in a line to recive the company. Lord Yarborough has more than 60,000 acres in his plantation; he has six hundred tenants, and you can ride thirty miles in a direct line, upon his estate. "Many of the tenants of Lord Yarborough pay 1000, and 4000 guineas a year rent, and several of them live like noblemen, keeping their dogs, horses, carriages, and servants in livery."

Of the Duke of Richmond's style of living, &c. Mr. Colman says—"The service, at dinner, was always silver and gold throughout plates and dishes, except for the jellies and puddings, and those the most beautiful china."

In truth Mr. Colman's book resembles the grotto of Antiparos, the glitter of whose illuminated stalactites does not surpass the splendor of the gold, and silver, and diamonds and pearls which were displayed before him. In a certain sense, apart from the valuable and curious information, which it conveys, this work may fitly enough be called—the ladies own book. The Duke has more than forty race horses and sixty grooms and ostlers. His salmon fishery at Gorston Castle used to be let for £10,000, and now lets for £7000 per annum, or. $35,000.

If the reader is desirous of knowing something of the style of surpasing splendor in which a British baronet may live, with his tenants around him, he will be abundantly gratified by turning to Mr. Colman's account of Sir Charles Morgan's establishment at Tredaga, vol 1. p. 293. Then let him turn to the account Woburn Abbey, p, 310, residence of the Duke of Bedford, which, says Mr. C., "in its magnificence distances anything I have yet seen, and next to the royal palace may be considered the acme of elegance and grandeur.

After attending a court ball, at which one lady wore £60,000, or $300,000, worth of diamonds, Mr. C. remark.—The Duchess of Roxburgh, whom I do not know, appeared most splendidly, and well she might, as the annual income of the Duke is stated to be £300,000."

Upon this point these statements may suffice. There are very, very few of our wealthiest men, whose entire estate is equal to the income of this nobleman for a single year.

In the eyes of these noblemen, our "merchant princes" must appear to be a set of beggarly fellows. The comparative estimate of wealth is well exhibited in the remarks of John Jacob Astor New York, who is reported to have said that riches were not essential happiness, and that he who had only five hundred housand dollars, was as well off as if he was a rich man.

Mr. Colman's accounts of the poverty and misery of Ireland are not surprising. Too many years we have heard this story from every traveller who has visited that unhappy country. His statements of the squalid poverty and intolerable filth of Edinburg and Dundee—bonnie Dundee—are rather startling.

In connection with the poverty of Ireland, Mr. Colman presents an "extract from the property of fortunes, left by Irish Bishops, laid before the House of Commons, in 1832"—meaning Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church, whose sees were in Ireland. The aggregate wealth of eleven deceased Bishops, amounted to one million eight hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars. The wealthiest these descendants of poor St. Peter was Agar, Bishop of Cashel, whose estate is set down at £430,000, or two millions of dollars.

A Joke upon an Elephant.

A very intelligent elephant was shown some years since in a caravan of wild beasts at a fair, in the west of England—One of those practical jokers, whose wit lies in pouring melted butter into a friend's pocket, or conveying a putrid oyster into his plate, had been doing out some ginger bread nuts of the first quality to the elephant who received the instalments, small as they were with satisfaction and gratitude, manifesting the latter by the spontaneous performances of some of his tricks between the somewhat protracted intervals of supply. Suddenly, his benefactor produced a larger paper parcel, weighing some two or three pounds, and presented it en masse. The elephant took it as it was, and consigned the whole to his powerful crushing mill. Hardly, however, had he swallowed the dose, before he gave a loud roar, and exhibited all the symptoms of suffering severely from internal heat, handing—yes, handing, for the trunk acted as dexterously as a hand—the bucket to his keeper, as it beseeching for water, which was given to him and of which he continued to pour floods sufficient to drive a mill, down his capacious and burning throat.

"Ha!" said the joker, addressing his victim, "these nuts were a little hot, old fellow, I guess."

"You had better be off," exclaimed the keeper, "unless you want the bucket at your head, and serve you right too."

The dispenser of ginger beer paid per toon the fine, for there was anger gleaming in the drinker's eye, while the diseased beast was pumping up his six pennorth; and in good time he took it, for he had scarcely cleared the entrance of the show, when the empty bucket was hurled after him by the elephant, with such force and correctness of aim, that if he had been a moment later, his joking would, in all probability, have been terminated with his life on the spot.

A year had passed away, and the wayfarers from the country villages trod over the withered leaves that had, when fresh, green and vigorous, shielded their heads from the burning summer's sun, as they again bent their steps to the same annual autumnal fair, where the elephant had been before exhibited, and where he was again ready to receive company.

Our joker was again among the visitors, and forgetful of his narrow escape from the bucket, which on the occasion our wit observed he had been near kicking home as before, with one foot filled with chesnut nuts," and the other with hot nuts. He gave the elephant two pennorth from the best sample, and the latter drew forth and presented him with a cocoa. No sooner had the Johnny Gilpin he seized the coat tails of his tormentor, and with one whirling sweep of his trunk, lifted him from the ground. If the tails giving way, the man dropped half dead with fright, and with his coat reduced to a jacket. The elephant meanwhile, quietly inserted the end of his trunk into the pocket containing the best nuts, and leisurely proceeded keeping his foot on the coat tails, to discuss every one of them. When he had finished the last, he trampled on the pocket containing the hot nuts, till he had reduced them to a mash, and then, after having torn the tails to rags, threw the soiled fragments at the head of his facetious friend, amid the derision of the assembled crowd. Bostock's Zoological Recreations.

SLAVERY IN ENGLAND.—Cassius M. Clay in the following strong language, disposes of the assertion often made, that there is worse slavery in England than in the U. S.

We deny that there are "Slaves in England," the lowest laborers in the mines of Cornwall, the factories of Manchester may become the Peasantry of Great Britain, a power greater than the throne; and from the lowest haunts of famine may arise, and will again arise, as there have already risen, many of the first jurists, statesmen and men of letters in the British empire.

How many from the three millions of slaves here may aspire to similar eminence? Here, slavery sets at defiance the laws of nature and of God; here nature, as she should be, is the only arbiter of the law.—American Paper.

Concluded.

Presently a cheer, which we knew to be British, commenced far to the right, and made every one prick up his ears;—it was Lord Wellington's long wished-for orders to advance; it gradually approached, growing louder as it grew near;—we took it up by instinct, charged through the hedge down upon the old knoll, sending our adversaries flying at the point of the bayonet. Lord Wellington galloped up to us at the instant, and our men began to cheer him; but he called out, "no cheering, my lads, but forward, and complete your victory!"

This movement had carried us clear of the smoke, and to people who had been for so many hours enveloped in darkness in the midst of destruction, and naturally anxious about the result of the day, the scene which now met the eye conveyed a feeling of more exquisite gratification than can be conceived. It was a fine summer's evening, just before sunset. The French were flying in one confused mass, British lines were seen in close pursuit, and in admirable order, as far as the eye could reach to the right, while the plain to the left was filled with Prussians. The enemy made one last attempt at a stand on the rising ground to our right of La Belle Alliance; but a charge from General Adams's brigade again threw them into a state of confusion, which was now inextricable, and their ruin was complete. Artillery, baggage, and everything belonging to them fell into our hands. After pursuing them until dark, we halted about two miles beyond the field of battle, leaving the Prussians to follow up the victory.

This was the last, the greatest, and the most uncomfortable heap of glory that I ever had a hand in, and may the deuce take me if I think that everybody waited there to see the end of it, otherwise it never could have been so troublesome to those who did. We were, take us all in all, a very bad army. Our foreign auxiliaries who constituted more than half of our numerical strength, with some exception, were little better than raw militia—a body without a soul, or like an inflated pillow, that gives to the touch, and resumes its shape again when the pressure ceases—not to mention the many who went clear out of the field, and were only seen while plundering our baggage in their retreat.

Our heavy cavalry made some brilliant charges in the early part of the day; but they never knew when to stop their ardour in following their advantages carrying them headlong on, until many of them "burnt their fingers," and got dispersed or destroyed.

Of that gallant corps, the royal artillery, it is enough to say, that they maintanined their former reputation—the first in the world—and it was a serious loss to us, in the latter part of the day, to be depriven of this more powerful co-operation, from the causes already mentioned.

The British infantry and the King's German legion continued the inflexible supporters of their country's honour throughout, and their unshaken constancy under the most desperate circumstances showed that, though they might be destroyed, they were not to be beaten.

If Lord Wellington had been at the head of his old Peninsula army, I am confident that he would have swept his opponents off the face of the earth immediately after their first attack. but with such a heterogeneous mixture under his command, he was obliged to submit to a longer day

It will ever be a matter of dispute what the result of that day would have been without the arrival of the Prussians: but it is clear to me that Lord Wellington would not have fought at Waterloo unless Blucher had promised to aid him with 30,000 men, as he required that number to put him on a numerical footing with his adersary. It is certain that the promised aid did not come in time to take any share whatever in the battle. It is equally certian that the enemy had long before, been beaten into a mass of ruin, in condition for nothing but running, and wanting but an apology to do it; and I will ever maintain that Lord Wellington's last advance would have made it the same victory had a Prussian never been seen there.

The field of battle, next morning, presented a frightful scene of carnage; it seemed as if the world had tumbled to pieces, and three-fourths of everything destroyed in the wreck. The ground running parallel to the front of where we had stood was so thickly strewed with fallen men and horses, that it was difficult to step clear of their bodies; many of the former still alive, and imploring assistance, which it was not in our power to bestow.

The usual salutation on meeting an acquaintance of another regiment after an action was to ask who had been hit? but on this occasion it was "Who's alive?" Meeting one, next morning, a very litter fellow, I asked what had happened to them yesterday? "I'll be hanged," says he, "if I know anything at all about the matter, for I was all day trodden in the mud and galloped over by every secundrel who had a horse, and, in short, that I only own my existence to my insignificance."

Two of our men, on the morning of the 16th lost their lives by a very melancholy accident. They were cutting up a captured ammunition-wagon for firewood, when one of their swords striking against a nail, sent a spark among the powder. When I looked in the direction of the explosion, I saw the two poor fellows about twenty or thirty feet up in the air. On falling to the ground, though lying on their backs or bellies, some extraordinary effort of nature, caused by the agony of the moment, made them spring from that position, five or six times to the height of eight or ten feet, just as a fish does when thrown on the ground after being newly caught. It was so unlike a scene in real life that it was impossible to witness it without forgetting, for a moment, the horror of their situation.

I ran to the spot along with others, and found that every stitch of clothes had been burnt off, and they were black as ink all over. They were still alive, and told us their names, otherwise we could not have recognized them; and, singular enough, they were able to walk off the ground with a little support, but died shortly after.

Among other officers who fell at Waterloo, we lost one of the wildest youths that ever belonged to the service. He seemed to have a prophetic notion of his approaching end, for he repeatedly told us, in the early part of the morning, that he believed the devil would have him before night. I shall relate one anecdote of him which occurred while we were in Spain. He went, by chance, to pass the day with two officers, quartered at a neighbouring village, who happened to be, that day, engaged to dine with the clergyman. Knowing their visitor's mischievous propensities, they were at first afraid to make him one of the party; but after schooling him into a suitable propriety of behaviour, and exacting a promise of implicit obedience, they, at last, ventured to take him. On their arrival, the ceremony of introduction had just been gone through, and their host seated at an open window, when a favourite cat of his went purring about the young gentleman's boots who catching it by the tail, and giving it two or three preparatory swings round his head, sent it flying out at the window where the parson was sitting, who only escaped it by suddenly stooping. The only apology the youngster made for his conduct was, "Egad, I think I astonished that fellow!" but whether it was the cat or the parson he meant I never could learn.

About twelve o'cock on the day after the battle, we commenced our march for Paris. I shall therefore leave my readers at Waterloo in the hope that, among the many stories of romance to which that and the other celebrated fields gave birth, the foregoing unsophisticated one of an eye witness may not have been found altogether uninteresting

The Term "Brother Jonathan."—General Washington placed great confidence in the good sense and patriotism of Jonathan Trumbull, who at an early period of the American Revolution, was governer of the State of Connecticut. In a certain emergency, when a measure of great importance was under discussion, Washington remarked "We must consult Brother Jonathan on the subject." The result of that consultation was favorable. Thus, from the constant use of the expression, "We must consult Brother Jonathan," which soon passed from the army to the people at large, we received from the English that appellation which has stuck to us as closely as their "John Bull" to them.—A Lift for the Lazy

Scraps for the Curious.—If a tallow candle be placed in a gun, and shot at a door, it will go through without sustaining any injury: and if a musket ball be fired into water, it will not only rebound, but be flattened as if fired against solid substance. A musket may be fired through a pane of glass, making the hole the size of the ball without cracking the glass; if the glass be suspended by a thread it will make no difference, and the thread will not even vibrate. Cork, if sunk 200 feet in the ocean, will not rise, on account of the pressure of the water.

JOB PRINTING, neatly and promptly executed at this Office. A single copy of the Liberia Herald, twelve & a half cents.

From "The Times," London July 4th 1850.

"Letters from Liberia dated the 16th of April state that a commissioner from the Republic was then at Gallinas to negotiate the purchase of that territory, which was expected to be immediately accomplished. The general affairs of the colony were prosperous, and acquisitions to its population were steadily taking place, both from the United States, and from the interior tribes of natives."

THE COLONIZATION CAUSE.

Mr. Tupper, in a late letter to Mr. Cresson, says: The words in your letter are, "I am now zealously engaged in a long-projected boon for Africa,—the first Episcopal Church in Liberia—hoping, bye and bye, to graft on it a mission to the heathen, who are 'stretching out the hand' imploringly." I think you had best print cause and effect together.

THE LIBERIAN CHURCH.

A SONNET

FROM MARTIN F. TUPPER.

Not freedom only be Liberia's boast,
Nor chiefly Africa, thy sons returned
To their dear palmy plains and tropic coast,
Whereto so long in alien climes they yearn'd;
No! But a blessing, to be sought the most Wherever men for truest treasure search,
Shall be the praise. Liberia, lo! at length,
As in St. Cyprian's days, a Christian Church
With its Apostle stands in holy strength,
A new-lit beacon on poor Afric's shores,
Whereunto now the darkling heathen throng,
And Ethiopia's outstretched hands implore
Of the Salvation's hallowed strength and song:
Of thee, Liberia, blest for ever more!

THE GRAND EXHIBITION OF 1851.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "PROVERBIAL PHILOSOPHY."

Hurrah! for honest Industry, hurrah! for handy Skill,
Hurrah! for all the wondrous works achieved by Wit and Will!
The triumph of the Artizan has come about at length,
And Kings and Princes flock to praise his comeliness and strength.
The time has come, the blessed time, for brethren to agree,
And rich and poor of every clime at unity to be,
When Labour honored, openly, and not along by stealth,
With horny hand and glowing heart may greet his brother Wealth.
Aye, wealth and rank are labour's kin, twin brethren all his own,
For every high estate on earth, of labour it hath grown;
By duty and by prudence, and study's midnight oil;
The wealth of all the world by God-rewarded toil!
Then hail! thou goodly Gathering, thou brotherhood indeed!
Where all the sons of men can meet as honest labour's seed;
The tribes of turban'd Asia, Afric's ebon skin,
And Europe and America, with all their kith and kin!
From East and West, from North and South, to England's happy coast,
By tens of thousands, lo! they come, the great industrial host.—
By tens of thousands welcomed for their handicraft and worth, Behold! they greet their brethren of the workshop of the Earth.
Right gladly, brother workmen, will each English, Artizan
Rejoice to make you welcome all, as honest man to man,
And teach, if aught he has to teach, and learn the much to learn,
And show to men in every land, how all the world may earn,
Whatever earth; man's heritage, of every sort can yeild,
From mine and mountain, sea and air, from forest and from field:
Whatever reason, God's great gift can add or take away,
To bring the worth of all the world beneath the human sway;
Whatever Science hath found out, and industry hath earn'd;
And taste hath delicately touched, and high-bred art hath learn'd;
Whatever God's good handicraft, the men He made hath made;
By man, God's earnest artizan, the best shall be display'd!
O think it not an idle show, for praise, or pride or pelf,
No man on earth who gains a good can hide it for himself,
By any thought that any thing can any how improve,
We help along the cause of all, and give the world a move!
It is a great and glorious end to bless the sons of man,
And meet for peace, and doing good, in kindness while we can;
It is a greater and more blest, the Human Heart to raise,
Up to the God who giveth all, with gratitude and praise!

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, AUGUST 21st, 1850.

The grand Exhibition of the products of industry, to come off in London in 1851, is exciting intense interest throughout the world. Extensive preparations are being made in England to promote this great national or social undertaking.

In some parts of the country the Protectionist have arrayed themselves against it, and denounce the whole affair as being inimical to British interests, Not so however; and the mass of the people will sustain it, as the emanation of a truly benevolent heart; and as an institution eminently calculated to promote friendly intercourse between strangers, and form a bond of alliance between the nations of the earth.

It gives all a common and mutual interest. It enrolls all nations under one banner, on which the words Utility, Art, and Skill are emblazoned. It makes those, who have heretofore fought as enemies, the soldiers of industry; all striving to subdue matter to the service of mankind. Foreigners are invited to England to exhibit the product of their skill, to show what they can do; and at the same time they will be able to see what Britons can do; from which mutual improvement is anticipated.

Most of the governments of the continent have given their subjects official information of the intention and objects of the Exhibition, and encourage them to prepare articles to rival those of other nations. In the United States the matter has been enthusiastically taken up, and almost made a national concern.

It has even been proposed there, that the things exhibited should be purchased, if the different proprietors would sell them, so that the whole might be exhibited in the States. Such an exhibition of all the wonderous arts of Europe, would certainly increase the knowledge and skill of brother Jonathan.

This Exhibition, as we understand it, is not to be a cabinet of ocuriosities or a museum of wonders; but an exhibition of what each people of the world can do to promote the ease, convenience, and happiness of themselves and others; therefore to feed mankind easily, cheaply, and healthily is the first consideration. Then come the arts connected with clothing and sheltering them, cheaply, comfortably, and beautifully. Every contrivance that lessens labor, in procuring any of these, will of course claim attention.

And why may not Liberia be represented at this proposed Industrial Exihibition? It affords a most favorable opportunity of giving new notice of Liberia and her invaluable staples. Why not send over various samples of our coffee, cotton, sugar, arrowroot, ginger, indigo, &c, &c?

May we not hope that some of our fellow citizens will make a move in this matter, and see what can be done?

A king in trouble.—Old king Bromley, favorably known to many of our merchants, while on a visit, a few days ago, to Douwarro, a Golah Chief, for the purpose of adding another to his already large stock of wives, was seized and confined in "stick"—together with his whole suite, excepting one who escaped by the fleetness of his heels, and who brings the sad intelligence of the indignity offerd to his master. It appears that, on demanding his betrothed, some dispute arose between Bromley and the parents of the girl respecting the amount, some years ago agreed on, to be paid for the comely damsel: viz: 5 tiger teeth, 2 silver bands, 6 country clothes, 5 kroos of rice, 2 brass kettles, and 20 sticks of salt. The parents insisted that their daughter's surpassing beauty, which has been developed since the original engagement, entitled them to greater compensation than the value of the articles enumerated above. To this the king demurred, and threatened to possess himself of the girl by force; which threat aroused the town's people, and His Majesty soon found himself in "limbo."

His Chiefs and headmen, backed by kings Jimmy and Willey, have applied to the Liberia authorities to interpose in his behalf; otherwise they will be under the necessity, they say, of making war upon the Golah people. A commissioner has been sent to arrange the difficulty, and to procure the enlargement of the old fellow.

The news of the death of the king of the Mainbo Country have just reached us. We regret exceedingly the death of king Jollasa: for during his reign he exercised a powerful and salutary influence over the chiefs of the tribes surrounding him, as well as over the people of his own dominions, in maintaining peace, and encouraging trade. Fears are already entertained that difficulties will soon arise in the country; and that the commerce of the interior will be seriously interrupted. A few days before his death, Jollasa directed that after his demise his body should be burned. No one can inform us why.

An aerolites we guess.—On the evening of the 4th inst, between 7 and 8 o'clock, a singular phenomenon appeared in the eastern part of the heavens. It had a luminous appearance, resembling a ball of about two feet in diameter. It moved with great velocity towards the west, like "Minerva's hasty flight from the peaks of Olympus to break the truce between the Greeks and Trojans." At times it seemed to increase in brilliancy, so as to cast a dazzling light upon the earth, and then diminish again, until about 8 o'clock, when, with a report like the rumbling of distant thunder, it exploded: the particles diverging in every direction.

SUMMARY.

Glad to see it.—The present corporation authorities, of Monrovia, are awake to their duty, and are giving up the inhabitants with a "long pole." They tell us we must have our lots cleared of noxious weeds or they will be down upon us in a trice. The road they have thrown up, leading from kroo town is an important improvement; and the opening of Ashmun street adds much to the appearance of the town. How would it answer for the Legislature to grant to the corporations the revenue arising from the sale of licenses in the respective townships?—

Rice.—Small quantities of new rice are coming in. The appearance of the crops indicates abundant harvests.

Pretty Good.—Since the 18th ultimo Mr. D. Moore has cleared between 50 and 60 acres of land, and planted it in cotton; at an expense of about $6 an acre. Liberia would go ahead if she only had a few more men of enterprise and capital.

Buildings.—The Baptist Church in this town is undergoing important repairs. It has been considerably enlarged for the better accommodation of the growing congregation. The round columns in front are pretty well executed, and add very much to the external appearance of the building.

A neat little Methodist Church, of brick, is being erected in Upper Caldwell.

The work on the M. E. Church Seminary is rapidly progressing.

Shipping.—A few days since we walked along the wharves, and could but admire the many neatly modeled messengs of commerce, which were moored in the stream, waiting for the Palm Oil season to open, and the high winds and sea to abate a little.

Grand Bassa County.—The trade of G. B. County has been exceedingly brisk during the season. The people are still anxious that the Cove should be settled as soon as practicable—which would greatly increase the commercial importance of the county.

Sione County.—No news of importance have been received from Sinoe since our last; the crops are looking well; trade is dull; but the merchants are looking forward to the next season with high expectations.

Cape Palmas.—We are pleased to learn that Governor Russwurm's health is much improved: And that the state of the colony is decidedly encouraging. We notice that our old friend Rev. John Seys has accepted the traveling agency of the Md. Colonization Society, for the State of Maryland.

FOREIGN.

Mr. Clay, United States charge' at Lisbon, has declared that the American claims against Portu gal must be settled by the 11th of July, ultimo or he should demand his passports.

The Expedition against Cuba signally failed. General Lopez arrived at New Orleans on the 7th June, and was immediately arrested by order of the government—and was as quickly discharged.

All anxiety on Cuban affairs is now at an end. The question relating to prisoners is refered to Washington to be adjusted between Mr. Clayton and the Spanish Minister.

Weapons of war are to be excluded from the grand Exhibition of 1851.

The treaty between the United States and Great Britian; respecting any passage that may be made through Necaragua, uniting the Atalantic and Pacific Ocans has been ratified by both governments. This treaty guarantees for ever upon equal terms, whether in time of peace or war, the undisturbed right of way, by such passage, of all nations; and also the free settlement of all people along the route; so that colored persons shall be safe there and secure from the oppression of the prejudice against color.

UNITED STATES.—The Boston correspondent of the New York Observer, under date May 14th 1850, writes;—"The Board of Trustees of Donations for education in Liberia, incorporated by our Legislature, is now fully organized, and will issue its prospectus in a few days. It aims at the permanent establishment of the means of a collegiate education in the new Republic. A college in dark Africa! how pleasing the thought. A Republic in Africa has for many months rung in our ears. And why may we not hear next of common schools in Africa, and of all the institutions that have made "glory to dwell in our land?" With so much accomplished, and so much in prospect for Africa, who shall tell us that colonization then is a failure?"

A bill has passed the Virginia Legislature appropriating $30,000 annually for the removal of the free people of color from the State to Liberia.

Solomon Sturges Esquire, of Ohio has given $1000 to aid the Republic in purchasing Gallinas. The amount, we believe, has not yet been remitted to Liberia; but is expected by the nex. Packet.

Eighteen hundred dollars have been collected in New York to aid the colonization society in sending to Liberia thirty five slaves manumitted by Mr. Rogers of Virginia. An equal sum has been subscribed to supply these people with religious books &c &c. They may be expected in the next Packet.

The Georgia Leislature have passed a law authorizing those not citizens of the United States to purchase and convey real estate &c, within the limits of that state.

An English colony is about to be established in Irwin county, Georgia. They have purchased 150,000 acres of land, and will go largely into manufacturing cotton goods.

South Carolina is called again to mourn the loss of a distinguished son, Mr Elmore, the successor of Mr. Calhoun in the Senate of the United States, is no more.

He died at Washington, May 29th, in his fifty first year. The Washington Correspondent of the "Journal of Commerce" says—"Had he, (Mr. Elmore) lived, he would have exerted an effective influence in favor of the Colonization cause, which now attracts the attention of every true philanthropist."

Mr. Barnwell, for many years President of the college of South Carolina, is appointed Mr. Elmore's successor in the Senate.

ENGLAND.—Queen Victora gave birth to a prince on the 1st of May. On the 22d. of June his Royal Highness the infant Prince was named, and baptised Arthur William Patrick Albert; the first in complement to the noble and gallent "Field Marshall," the Duke of Wellington.

An atrocious attack was made on her Majesty on the evening of the 27th of June by a man calling himself Robert Page. He had been observed loitering for some time about the carriage entrance of Cambridge House, and quickly approached the Royal carriage just as it reached the end of the road from the house, and deliberately aimed a blow at her Majesty with a stick striking her on the cheek and crushing her bonnet over her head. Page had been a Lieutenant in the army. He is probably insane.

The cost of the members smoking room attached to the new House of Commons is $7000.

Sir Edward Buxton's motion against the admission of sugar from slave trading countries, at the same rate of impost as free grown sugar, failed in the House of Common on the 31 of May, by a majority of 41.

Wardswoth. the Poet Laureate, died on the 23d. of April having lately completed his 80 year.

A great statesman has fallen. Sir R. Pee. is no more!! Sir Robert was thrown from his horse near Green Park, London, on the 29th of June, and received injuries which terminated his earthly carier on the 2d. ultimo.

FRANCE.—June 14th. Mr. Guizot was on the point of setting out from Paris on a journey to the leading courts inGermany. The motive assigned for this tour is to gather materials for a great historical work. The great activity, however, in conducting political intrigues evinced by Mr Guizot, during his sojourn in Paris, and his assidious appearance in the salons of the Russian embassy, give room for surmise that his mission is by no means confined to literary researches.

The Anniversary of the Republic was celebrated with great pomp; all was quiet, not a single arrest occured.

Eugene Sue has been returned, by a large majority, a Member of the National Assembly.

The President, it appears, has labored under the impression that the new electoral law applied only to the assembly, and not to the election of the President.

Turkey.—The Sultan is adding a christian battalion to each of his regiments.

Austria.—The coronation of the Emperor of Austria was to take place on the 18th of August, inst.

Russia.—The Princess S———, from St. Petersburg has arrived in Paris as an ambassadress; the visit is guessed to be entirely political. The fair stranger is noted for her courtisey to each and all about the Elysee; her habits are singular, and she interests, it is said, by her very eccentricity. She receives during the day, en grande toilette, with lighted rooms and closed shutters to exclude the day. At ten o'clock at night her horse is odered and she gallops to the Bois de Boulogne, attended by a bevy of fashionable cavaliers, charmed at this novel promenade by moonlight.

Sometimes the President accompanys the fair equestrian. She is said to be of most remarkable beauty.

Hayti.—The Haytien Government, by convention, have recognized the commercial and vice commercial agents of the United States; who are now accredited there, and entitled to the rights and privileges granted to the consuls of other nations that have recognized the independence of that Government.

NAVAL.

August 9th.—Arrived U. S. brig Porpoise from Norfolk, June 9th via: Madeira and Porto Praya. The following is a list of the officers attached to the Porpoise,—James L. Lardner Esquire, Lieutenant Commanding; J. Hogan Brown, Liutenant; J. C. Eldridge Purser; J. J. Brownly, Passed Assistant Surgeon; Reginald Fairfax, Acting Master; John M. Brooke and Charles W. Woolly, Passed Midshipmen, J. J. Heileman, Midshipaman; J. Z. Forney Capt.'s Clerk.

A boat from the Porpoise in attempting to cross the bar on the afternoon of the 9th. inst. with, Purser Eldridge and Midshipman Heileman, on board, was capsized. We are happy to be able to state that no lives were lost. The letter bag for this place, which was in the boat, we regret to say was not recovered. Midshipman H.—also lost a valuable sword.

The U. S. flag ship, Portsmouth, Commander Pack bearing the broad pennant of Commodore F. H. The U. S. ship John Adams, Commander Powell sailed from Porto Praya on the 10th of June for the Gambia.

The U. S. brig Perry, Lieutenant Commanding Foote, is supposed to be still on the leeward coast. It is rumored, however, that the Perry has gone over to South America for provisions. Why will not the U. S. Goverment establish a depot at this place?—Apart the healthiness of Liberia; we are sure it will compare favorably with Porto Praya—especially during the rainy season.

The U. S. ship Dale, was to sail from New York about the 1st of July to join the African Squadron.

The National Intelligencer says;—"By an official communication to the senate, it appears that the cost of maintaining the United States squadron on the coast Africa is $384,500 per annum, and that the mortality on the station is less than in the home squadron or in the East Indies."

Commodore Benjamin Cooper of the United States navy, died at his residence in Brooklin, N. Y. June 1st aged 57 years. He lately had Command of the U. S. Squadron on this coast, and returned to the U. S. some months since on account of ill health.

The Ranger sailed on the 12th for Gallinas where Captan Miller expects to recive 50 or 60 of the slaves that were in the Barracoons at Gallinas, when they were attacked and destroyed by the British squadron, in 1849. Which slaves, the Gallinas Chiefs engaged themselves to deliver to Her Majesty's Government to be conveyed to Sierra Leone.

And all who have been accommodated left satisfied; our charges being as reasonable as any one else.

Rev. Dr. Alexander on Colonization.

The following letter, on the subject of African Colonization, was read at the annual meeting of the New-York Colonization Society in May last. Dr. Alexander has devoted much attention to the subject of Colonization, and understands thoroughly its principles and magnitude.

The Doctor says truly, and we do wish that our friends generally in the United States entertained the same just views with respect to our present position,—that "Liberia will long need the fostering care of the society, by whose efforts it has been brought into existence as an independent free republic. The resources for many years must be inadequate to the support and advancement of the nation."

Without some pecuniary assistance from the society, or other sources, the advancement of Liberia must necessarily be slow, and the progress of African civilization seriously retarded

PRINCETON, May 1, 1850.

REV. DR. PINNEY:

Dear Sir—Your obliging letter, inviting me to attend the anniversary meeting of the New-York Colonization Society, came duly to hand; and in answer, I would say, that I consider myself too old to make a speech on any public occasion; but if it were not so, my official engagements at that time, would render it impracticable for me to attend. But I wish you and the friends of African colonization to understand, that my "ardent devotion" to this good cause is undiminished. Indeed, I see much reason to think more favorable of this benevolent enterprise than ever before; because it has pleased a benign Providence to crown it with such extraordinary success. I have watched the progress of the Colonization Society from its commencement until this day; and though always favorable to the scheme of providing an asylum and a home for the free people of color, whose situation in this country is so unfavorable, yet, for a long time, I entertained no sanguine expectation of success in planting a colony on the coast of Africa with the feeble means possessed by the Society. But the design, I believe, was from God, and he has given efficacy to exertions which most men predicted must prove abortive. I have laid it down as a rule for myself, never to oppose any scheme of benevolence where the end was good, the means lawful and the motives pure; and, in regard to the Colonization Society, I am constrained to declare, that I have never known any enterprise in which selfish motives had so little opportunity for exercise; and in which disinterested benevolence has been more clearly manifested. In the prosecution of the plan, also, God has raised up men of extraordinary talents and heroic courage, who were willing to sacrifice their lives in the promotion of the object which they had so much at heart. And, indeed, the cause has been, as it were, consecrated by the martyrdom of such men as Ashmun, Bacon, Buchanan, and Lot Carey. And, at this time, there is not upon earth a more wonderful phenomenon than the little republic of Liberia; governed, as it is, by men of as sound wisdom as can be found in the councils of any country; and what renders this fact so truly remarkable is, that these men have grown up in Africa, and received their training in a country where only until lately the most ferocious savages had their residence!

In future ages, when the impartial historian surveys the events of the first half of the nineteenth century, he will be apt to fix on the planting of this colony, and the establishment of this republic, by a Society, unaided by government, as the most remarkable achievement of the whole period. Perhaps it is one without a parallel in history. I would, therefore, congratulate the friends of colonization on the extraordinary success which has attended their exertions. Whatever may be the destiny of the colony which they have planted in Africa, it must be admitted by all candid persons that they have achieved a glorious work. But the praise is not due to men, but to God, who has crowned their labors with success. But, in this little republic, I am of opinion that we behold the germ of a great nation. Those who come after us, will, I believe, see results from this small beginning, which, if they could be placed before our minds now, would astonish us all.

The British nation will probably be soon convinced of the inefficacy of their ships of war, as a means of suppressing the slave-trade, and will be constrained at length to do justice to American colonization by imitating our example: by bringing colored men from the West Indies and planting them on the African coast.

While we rejoice and are thankful on account of what has already been accomplished, we should not consider the work as done, but only partly begun. Liberia will long need the fostering care of the Society, by whose efforts it has been brought into existence as an independent, free republic. Her resources for many years must be inadequate to the support and advancement of the nation; and especially the aid of the Society will be constantly needed to defray the expenses of emigrants to that country. And if we are not mistaken in the interpretation of the signs of the times, those who have hitherto gone from the United States to Liberia, will be found to be no more than the first fruits of an abundant harvest. Some now living may see the day when the rush of the colored race to Africa, will resemble that of the Hibernian race to our shores during a few of the years just past.

On the point whether the whole of the descendants of Africa will in time be translated to the land of their fathers, we need not speculate. The value of the Colonization scheme is, that every step taken, every family removed, so much gained, whatever may be the event in regard to others. And this gain respects not only the individuals who go, but the whole native population of that dark continent. Already a light has been kindled on the Western coast, the rays of which begin to penetrate far into the interior. Potent kings, whose habitations are marked with the most horrid cruelties, are calling for the lights of civilization and religion. Already recaptured slaves converted to Christianity, have carried the glad tidings of salvation to their native lands, where the foot of white men had never trod. Go on, then, ye who are the true friends of the negro; go on, and never cease your labors, until unhappy Africa shall be redeemed from her degrading superstitions and ferocious cruelties, and be enlightened by divine revelation

I am, very respectfully, yours, &c.,

Mesmeric Influence.—The following very extraordinary circumstances respecting the arrival at Peterhead, on the 3rd instant, of the Hamilton Ross, whaler, early in the season, is beyond any former precedent. She has made the voyage out and in, in two months and three days, being the quickest ever made, and brings 153 tuns of blubber. This remarkable event was distinctly and positively announced by a boy under mesmeric influence in Peterhead. He stated lately, in presence of a large audience, that the Hamilton Ross would be the first vessel to arrive, on the 5th of May, 14,000 seals (about 150 tuns). The boy was asked what he saw on board the Hamilton Ross at the time he was speaking, and replied that he saw the captain and doctor in the cabin hanging over the mate, who had got his hand hurt, a circumstance which proves to have been true at the exact date mentioned. At the same time the boy stated Sir John Franklin was quite well, but looking thin, and would return safe. The above-mentioned circumstances have thrown the inhabitants of Peterhead into a state of great excitement—Morning Chronicle.

How to Make an Englishman.—Among the shipping detained by Sir W. Parker's squadron is a Maltese vessel, which, probably to secure the advantages of nationality in the ports of Greece, had procured Greek papers, and therefore, though really British as to ownership and crew, became liable to the consequences of the blockade. The master had married a young person of this town, and the time for the appearance of the first-born arrived during their detention. The parents could not bear the thought of their little one being a Greek, and as the lady was staying on shore at the Piræus, a union jack was landed, and substituted for the counterpane of the bed. In spite of the locality, therefore, it was undeniable that the child was born under the British flay.—Cornwall Gazette.

HAYTI.

The following curious account of the Emperor Soulouque is given in a letter from Hayti published by the Ordre:—

"Faustin Soulouque is completely black, but his features have nothing of the grossness marked in the African type. He is now 64 years of age, and scarcely looks 50. Of middling stature, his corpulence causes him to appear undersized. He looks well on horseback. He has been accused of not knowing how either to read or write. The truth is, that he signs his name legibly, can even write a letter, if necessary, and reads every evening the new History of Hayti, which a native of merit has just published. The caricatures and jokes of the Paris press wound him deeply; in that respect he is exceedingly susceptible. He was originally a slave on the plantation of M. Viallet, who now resides at Port-au-Prince. Soulouque, having lately met him, said:—'Emperor for every body else, I cannot help still looking on you as my master.' 'And I, Sire, look on myself as your subject,' was the reply—a strange dialogue, exemplifying the changes in human destinies. On the evacuation of the French, the slave becoming free, entered the army. Under Petion, he fought against Christophe, and at last became colonel at the moment of Boyer's fall. He was named general of division under Pichot, and owed his elect to the Presidency to the chance which caused his name to be pronounced in the Senate, where the votes were divided between two candidates. Soulouque was about two years Presi ent when, to the immense surprise of Europe, he was proclaimed Emperor. It is generally allowed that he did not seek for that dignity. Entering at once into the spirit of his imperial position, he soon created orders and titles of nobility. There are two orders established at present; one the military, one St. Faustin, and the other the civil one of the Legion of Honour. The titles are princes, dukes, counts, barons, and knights, the persons for each being chosen according to their military rank. An assimilation has also been made in this respect between the military rank and the high civil functions. The women, independently of the titles of their husbands, bear the title of Marchioness. A first ordinance created 4 princes and 57 dukes. The princes are Generals Pierrot, Lazane, Soustrant, and Bobo. The dukes take the name of some locality, and hence the denominations which have amused the European press. General Jeffrard is Duke de la Table, General Lindoing Duke de la Marmelade, General Alerte Duke de Limonade, &c. But all these names are down in the old geography of the country. Christophe employed them for the same purpose as Soulouque, and used to say, 'The French, when they jeer at my Marmalade and Limonades, forget that they have themselves their Bouillons and Poix.' Another ordinance created ninety-one counts. The princes and dukes are all Grand Crosses of the Order of St. Faustin and Grand-cordons of the Legion of Honour. All the counts are commanders of the first order, and officers of the second. Louis XIV., in the midst of his splendour, never assigned so many honorary charges as Faustin I. He has his grand almoner, grand marshal of the palace, gentlemen of honor, governors of the royal residences, masters of ceremonies, &c. The Empress has also her household, consisting of two ladies of honour, 56 ladies of the palace, 22 ladies of the chapel, chamberlains, squires, &c. The Imperial Princess, Madame Olive Faustin, has also a brilliant household, her gouvernante being Madame de Beauheur. The costume of the nobility has been carefully regulated. The princes, dukes, and counts are to wear a white dress, the barons a red one, and the knights a blue one. In addition, the princes wear nine feathers in their hats, the dukes seven, the counts five, the barons three, and the knights two. The etiquette of the Court enjoins the men to appear in uniform, and the ladies in their hair. The nobles are to guard their sword, the ordinance says, as their best ornament."

'THE "UNCO GUID."

Some of these persons, whom Burns quizzes so well, must have instructed Campbell to present on Monday night the petition in which they pray for such an alteration in criminal trials as will do away with the necessity of asking a prisoner whether he is guilty or not guilty, substituting in its place the question whether the prisoner wishes to go to trial or will at once confess his guilt." This is one of the pleasant absurdities of the particularly pious. They pretend that for a man to say he is not guilty may be to tell a lie, and therefore it ought to be abolished. Now "not guilty" means no more than this "the law will not pronounce me guilty," or "you cannot prove a state of facts which would make the law pronounce me guilty." No one believes the plea alone to be an assertion of innocence. It is a form which puts the prosecutor on proving the prisoner's guilt, and nothing more. It is not half so false as the "dear sir" or "obedient servant," or "yours faithfully," which these petitioners in all likelihood use in their letters, when the person addressed is not at all dear to them, nor are they his obedient servants nor his friends. These phrases are not a legal form, and cannot be a true expression of feeling, and therefore may mislead. The "not guilty" does not mislead. The hearers know that it is a defiance of a trial which defiance the prisoner hopes to make good by the default of his prosecutor's proof, or the inaccuracy of his prosecutor's legal forms of proceeding, much more often than by anything else. That which misleads nobody cannot be false, whatever is the form of expression it assumes. Boys, in one of their games, say "I am the king of the castle." Would these puritans abolish the phrase because the boy who utters it is not a king, and because the mound of earth he stands on when he utters it is not a castle? Perhaps so—they are silly enough for anything. With much more reason they might seek to abolish all the phrases of social life, which are deceptive because in some instances they may be true, and because they only acquire a value in ordinary usage from the possibility of their being true. It would have been more rational to petition for the abolition of the dear, obedient, and faithful; and it would not be unamusing to know how often these petitioners misuse these words, and commit a much more heinous sin than that against which they have petitioned.

WANTS OF LIBERIA.

Since the founding of this colony, new Republic, she has laboured under some seemingly imperative want, either real or imaginary, either felt by herself or by her many sympathising friends. These wants have been of a general or specific character, prospective or immediate. For years, like Greece, she was in want of a ruler, as one agent of the Colonization Society after another fell under the influence of the climate; then she wanted a constitution and laws; then protection; then missionaries and teachers. All these she has at last found herself capable of supplying without aid. Then she has wanted a steam, water, or wind mill, for sawing and grinding, a horse and ox power, for cultivating the soil, a model farm, a high school, a college, independence, recognition by foreign governments, extension of territory, means of coast defence, navy, &c., &c. Most of these wants were real; some have been, and the others no doubt will, in due time, be supplied; but more important than all, and underlying all these wants, has existed from the beginning, the want of men—intelligent enterprising, good-principled men. Give but Liberia these, and all other things shall be added unto her. We say this has been the great want of Liberia; but never the sine qua non, until now. Liberia must soon have a material accession of this class of population, or some of the most important benefits to be derived from her acknowledged national independence, will be lost to her forever. Let the question be thrice asked, as was another to the famed Grecian orator "What does Liberia want?" and the answer will thrice be then given—"men, men, men."

Let it not be supposed that we have estimated the characters of the more eminent Liberians, the brave men, who in times of peril, have offered their lives for their country's good, those through whose able conduct the feeble colony of a charitable society has assumed a respectable rank among nations. Their lives and their deeds are matters of history, and need not our humble praise. But Liberia wants, and must have, more men. Her few brave and skilful leaders sufficed for the colony, but the Republic demands many. A brief explanation of the present commercial position of Liberia will show for what special purpose she must have an accession of sterling, business men.

Liberia now includes a coast line of about three hundred miles in extent. To this may be added Maryland in Liberia, which, although not a part of the Republic, may be considered in nearly the same position. Gallinas and Sherbro, which no doubt will soon, if they are not already, be added to the Republic, will make her extent of sea-board near or quite five hundred miles. Commercially considered, this immense extent of coast-line, is one vast harbour or trading port for an almost boundless, rich inland country. There are not ten miles of coast without one or more trading towns and landing places for boats and canoes, large enough to ship off the productions of the country, a breast of which, vessels can anchor in safety at all seasons of the year. The commerce of this "section" of the coast, except the slave trade at Gallinas, Cape mount, New Cesters, and Trade Town, has been mainly in the hands of English, German, and American merchant vessels, at least one half English. Many French and Portuguese vessels trade at the colonies also. The native trade, as it is termed, that not transacted at the Liberian ports, or through Liberians, is conducted somewhat in the following manner.

The captain of a vessel, or the agent of some foreign commercial house makes a contract with some native chief, or the head man of a beach town, who allows him, for certain considerations, to land merchandise and in country parlance, make trade, at his or their town. A rude thatched hut is constructed for the residence of the trade man, whom the agent leaves in charge, and another for his produce, when purchased. This is what is called establishing a factory. After landing what amount or merchandise, oil casks, &c., he may judge proper, the captain proceeds to other places, making in each, similar arrangements. He then, from time to time, visits his factories, taking on board what produce has been collected during his absence, until his merchandise is disposed of, or the vessel becomes fully laden. Sometimes this operation is gone through with by the captain of a single vessel, often by the agent of some foreign house, which may have several vessels in the trade, in which last case, the agent generally remains a year or two at a time on the coast. These are called regular traders. In addition to which, much business is done by transient vessels, as they are termed, those bound on a long voyage to the leeward ports; in which cases, the trade is made by purchase of produce brought alongside by the natives, in canoes and boats. The factors are sometimes intelligent natives from European settlements, sometimes Liberians, often Europeans with native assistants or trade men. All this traffic has heretofore been free and uncontrolled, subject to no restrictions or custom-house regulations, excepting such as are imposed by the natives. It has been open to vessels of all nations alike. The Liberians, in their small sloops and schooners, have come in for a share. They have felt, however that they laboured under great disadvantage, from the fact of being obliged to purchase merchandise of their competitors, in the trade, and to sell them their produce, also. We have ever maintained, that, the low rate at which the Liberian could sail their small crafts, in comparison with the current expenses of larger vessels, was more than an equivalent for the above named objection; but this has now ceased to be a question. The Republic of Liberia claims sovereign jurisdiction over the principal part of the coast on which factories have thus been founded, and this jurisdiction has been recognized by those European powers most interested in this trade, and although the United States Government has not, as yet, followed their example, it cannot be supposed she will question the sovereignty claimed by Liberia. Over this coast-line the Republic has thrown her commercial laws and custom-house regulations, prohibiting all direct trade between foreigners and the natives, breaking up all factories within the limits of Liberia except those owned or managed by the citizens thereof. Liberia has therefore assumed a heavy responsibility, but a commercial responsibility, and one which must be met, too. There is a demand for foreign articles of merchandise by the native population of Liberia, which must be supplied. Foreign commercial vessels, laden with this very merchandise, demand the African produce in the hands of these natives, and the exchange must and will be made. By the laws of the Republic the Liberian merchant is the medium through which this transfer must take place. If they are competent to the task, well; the Republic becomes rich and powerful. If they are not, the laws must give way to the pressure of circumstances; illegal traffic or smuggling will of necessity ensue, and the government will have to connive at an habitual infringement of its laws, or to modify them: in other words, to retract! and allow foreigners to trade directly with the natives as heretofore. Either alternative it is most desirable to avoid.

But the question is, are the Liberians competent to manage and control the commerce of the Coast-line they now possess? We regret to say we think not;—to manage it to the best interests of the Colony, we know that they are not. In connection with, and as agents and factors of foreign traders, they may reap many advantages from their new position, but nothing in comparison with what they might, if supplied with the present and ever great want of Liberia, men, intelligent, enterprising, commercial, men!

We regret that we are unable to give any very correct estimate of the value and extent of the commerce heretofore existing between foreign vessels and the natives within the present limits of Liberia. We have no correct data from which to estimate it at this time, but we were well informed as to the number of vessels in that trade in 1840. Since which, it has no doubt nearly, if not quite, doubled, as we well know it more than trebled the ten preceding years.

We judge that in 1840, at least ten vessels obtained cargoes of Palm Oil and Camwood on what is now the Liberia Coast; independent of those which traded at the colonies. Some of these, to be sure, landed part of their cargoes at the colonies and took produce from thence, but the amount so disposed of was more than offset by the transient vessels which traded with the natives in their passage down the Coast. The average tonnage of these vessels we will set down at 200 each, making 2000 tons. They would average a cargo of merchandise of at least $10,000 each, making $100,000 in all. The value of the vessel, at the same amount, would make a capital of $200,000 invested in vessels and cargo, to say nothing of the expense of sailing them. In the above estimate we have put every thing within bounds, and it is made for a period of ten years past. At the present time, supposing the commerce of this part of the Coast to have doubled or even to have increased 50 per cent., the native trade of Liberia, independent of the demands of the settlements, requires a capital of $300,000. What amount the Liberians are able to supply for this purpose, independent of other demands, we will not undertake to say, we can judge better of the amount of their commercial marine and estimate prorata. We believe at no time have the colonists or citizens owned more than 3000 tons of shipping, probably not that, and estimating their capital in the same proportion, say for shipping $30 000, merchandize for the trade $30,000, total 60.000, and they are then able to assume but one-fifth of the native commerce of of their own territory, independent of that of their ports of entry. Even allowing the utmost advantage of credit, they could not master more n a quarter of it—Liberia therefore wants l must have—men—monied men. But in is, Liberia wants nothing but what she is le to pay for. She asks no one to sacrifice

r her good, alone. She offers an abundant quivalent for all she demands. She freely offers s golden harvest to the reaper.

And to whom does Liberia look for aid? To hom does she offer the inducements of a home d profitable pursuits? Does she expect a ealthy, privileged class to abandon their elence and ease in order to increase a wealth ready too great? Does she expect the pioers in our great western El Dorado to abandon eir golden harvest, for common commercial ursuits? Does she expect the free labourers of ir mighty west to forsake their new home and rgin soil and sail away for a newer world?
o such thing. She addresses herself to those ithout a name, home or country; those who e forcibly deprived of rights, dear,—yea dearer man life; those from whom is heard the y of complaint and the voice of wail; the ppressed and bowed down. These she has now r thirty long years invited to a home and free-om, which she has prepared for them through offering, toil, privations and blood. She now ffers to them a citizenship in a free Republic cknowledged by the first Nations of the earth.
he offers to them facilities of acquiring wealth nd distinction in a calling ever highly honor-
ble. And will her appeal be in vain?

For many years we have been so connected vith Colonization, that, it might be presumed ve would advise all people of colour in this ountry to emigrate to Liberia. In general erms we have so expressed ourself, and honestly too, for it has ever been our strong conviction, that, it was better to go than to stay here. This conviction is founded upon an intimate acquaintance with Liberia and with the people of colour in this country: supported too, by one most important fact, that we have never yet known a respectable coloured person, who had resided two years in Liberia, to return to the United States for a residence, and few, very few, to leave it for any other country. Yet, in many cases, as individuals will bear us witness, when consulted by persons in regard to the subject, we have rather dissuaded them from emigrating partly, because we conceived them not peculiarly fitted; or rather, peculiarly unfitted, for citizens of Liberia, and partly from an aversion to incur a kind of personal responsibility. This has generally been our feelings and course when consulted by persons of delicate habits living in cities, unused to labour, but without sufficient energy and intelligence to compete with others in mercantile pursuits. We have made it a rule not strongly to advise or urge individuals or classes of individuals to emigrate to Liberia, unless, we could see clearly how they were to be improved, independent of, and in addition to the enjoyment of civil liberty and equality with the rest of mankind. In fact we have ever declared, that the only cause for a coloured man's leaving this country, was, the enjoyment of that liberty which is, and we feel will long be denied him here. But at this time, with respect to men of intelligence and capital, the case is widely different. Here is a door open for the acquisition of fortune. Here is a commerce monop-olised by Liberia, which has furnished profitable employment for many European and American vessels, and made the fortunes of their owners. This commerce can be carried on to far greater advantage by citizens of Liberia than by those of any other nation, and we do most earnestly invite the attention of coloured men of ability and energy to the subject. We doubt not but in our Atlantic cities, there is wealth and intelligence enough among the coloured people, not only to master the trade on the Liberian Coast, but to extend it to other parts of Africa, and successfully to compete with the European traders on the Windward, Ivory and Gold Coasts. The result of a full and fair consideration of this subject by the coloured people of this country, we are confident, would be, not only to to whiten the waters of the Western Coast of Africa with Liberia vessels, but extend her limits thousands instead of hundreds of miles, and ultimately enable her to control the destinies of the mighty continent.

The above is from the pen of Dr. Hall. It contains matter of much interest to the people of Liberia; though indited more especially to awaken commercial interest in the U. S.

The sentiment of the following verses from Punch, fully accords with the views and feelings of every conscientious repudiator of the product of slave labor. The planters, however, of Cuba and Brazil will doubtless be amused at the sly hits at, as they are pleased to stile them, the pharasaical philanthropists of England.

I'm the Genious of Britannia, and you know, I rule the waves,
And I form'd a resolution to put down the trade in slaves,
So I've fitted out a squadron, and it costs me very dear,
At the lowest computation full a million pounds a year.
Yet the slave-trade I'm maintaining all the while I
'gainst it fight,
I support it with the left hand whilst I strike it with the right;
Of slave-grown sugar, being cheap, a vast amount
I eat,
I have such a tender conscience, but a tooth so very sweet!
Goose's liver is a dainty certain foreigners derive,
So I have heard, from roasting the unhappy goose alive;
My laws with punishment condign would visit any wretch
Who dared the culinary art so cruelly to stretch.
But where I the chief consumer of the fruit of this abuse,
I should surely be partaken in the torture of the goose:
Am I not then an accomplice in the wickedness and shame
Of lashing into sugar the tormented negro's frame?
There is negro in our puddings, in our pies, our cakes, our buns;
In our jellies, creams, and custards, there are Adam's sable sons;
There's negro in each cup of tea the smug precision
sips,
And thinks that he has done no wrong, and wipes his holy lips.
I am certain that the trade in slave my cruisers scarcely touch,
I repress it very little, and promote it very much:
If I mean that it should cease, I must renounce my toothsome sin,
Resolv'd from this time forth to take no slave-grown sugar in.
But I can't resign cheap sugar; so I'll keep up my blockade,
For appearance sake—by way of demonstration and parade;
Though I must confess I'd rather not be forced to spend the sum
Of a million pounds per annum to maintain a costly hum.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, SEPTEMBER 4th, 1850.

Punch is heartily amusing himself at Britania's sweet tooth. In our last we informed our readers that the motion of that indefatigable friend of the African race, Sir Edward Buxton—upon whom the mantle of his illustrious father has fallen—failed, in the House of Commons, by a small majority. Sir Edward's motion was to the effect "that it is unjust and impolitic to expose the freegrown sugar of British colonies to unrestricted competition with the sugar of slave trading countries." This motion of Sir Edward was unquestionably proposed on the ground of humanity, as an additional measure for the suppression of the African slave trade, and as a means eminently calculated to advance the cause of emancipation in every part of the world where slavery exists. The motion, however or the arguments adduced in support of it savored too much of the principles of protection to meet the free-trade views of Her Majesty's Ministers, therefore their co-operation could not be secured.

While we will not attempt to canvass the question with respect to the beneficial results which, in our opinion, would accrue to Her Majesty's West India Colonies, or the effect the measure proposed would probably produce infavor of emancipation,—we may be permitted to express our regrets that the motion was not entertained: for we do belive a revival of the differential duties in England, would have the effect of diminishing the African Slave Trade. Facts are stubborn things: And it has been clearly demonstrated that since the repeal of the differential duties the introduction of slaves into Brazil has increased more than two hundred percent. Is it therefore unreasonable to suppose that a revival of them would have the effect of reducing the traffic to the state in which it stood in 1845? We think not.

We however, console ourselves in the contemplation that the British Government is pledged to the annihilation of the African slave trade, and will not—may! cannot recede. Measures for its total overthrown will be adopted. Indeed lord Palmerston, in a recent speech in Parliament, assured the House that measures for this object were then in progress. His Lordship says, "We are, by treaties with native Chiefs in Africa, and by other exertions on the other side of the Atlantic, pursuing measures which, I trust, if properly continued, in the course of the next year will enable us to entertain better hopes that the slave-trade will be, if not extinguished, at least very considerably diminished.

"Now," enquires his Lorship, "what is the state of the slave trade at the present moment? There are now in Africa 1500 miles north of the line entirely free from the slave trade—of the entire 2000 miles north of the line there are now only about 420 in which the slave trade at all exists; and I trust the measures now in operation may lead to the extirpation of the slave trade from that remaining portion north of the line. I this very day received a dispatch from one of the commissioners at Sierra Leone, stating that during the quarter which had just expired, he can assert that not a single ship has left that place with slaves."

Now this is exceedingly encouraging to the friends of humanity; and not less gratifying to the citizens of Liberia; for it cannot be doubted that Liberia has been an important auxiliary in effecting all this, and that her citizens are entitled to some meed of praise. No greater slave marts existed on the whole coast than were to be found, a few years ago, between Grand Cape Mount and Cape Palmas: all these have been extirpated mainly by the arms and influence of Liberia; and cannot possibly be revived again within these limits. Further north, within the last few years, the preventive squadrons—especially the British—have been decidedly successful in their efforts against the slave trade. And we regret to find that the French Government have thought proper to with draw their squadron from the coast.

Protests, too, have been made in England against the African squadron as being insufficient to effect the suppression of the slave trade. While we readily admit, that, in our opinion, the Blockading squadron alone is not sufficient to put down the slave trade, we unhesitatingly assert that through that instrumentality the slave trade has been materially checked, and at some points upon the west coast extirpated; and further, that without a strong maritime police along the coast all other measures would be fruitless: this we rejoice to know is the impression of Her Majesty's Government.

And God grant that no retrogade movement may ever be entertained with respect to the annihilation of the slave trade. We do maintain that to with draw the preventive squadrons from the African coast would be relinquishing the good that has been effected; and entailing upon Africa a great calamity. But that such with drawal will take place before the unholy traffic shall have been totally abolished, we will not permit ourselves to believe. Nay, we have every reason to believe that Her Majesty's Government, instead of relaxing their efforts, for the suppression of the slave trade, will increase their exertion to put an end speedily to that horrid traffic.

That far seeing statesman, Lord Palmerston, is fully awake to its importace, and clearly comprehends the beneficial results which will accrue to the commercial interests of his country. What says his Lordship?

"I hold it to be by no means chimerical that the combinations of all the measures now being adopted (for the suppression of the slave trade) may tend at no distant period to accomplish that end. And I must say that no object—I speak not now of those higher considerations which have been adverted to, and which I think, nevertheless ought to influence a nation like the British in matters of the kind—but independently of these higher considerations, taking even the most narrow views of temporal interests, I must say that nothing can be accomplished that would tend more to further the commercial interests and prosperity of this country than the entire extirpation of the Slave Trade. No part of the globe offers more scope for the commercial enterprise of this country than the interior and the coast of Africa.

We have a demand for the things she produces, and she stands in want of the goods that we can supply. In many other parts of the world, where there is a larger population to consume what we can export, there is want of commodities to offer in return.

Our trade with China has been limited to a certain degree by want of the commodities to exchange for our products

But in Africa commodities for barter abound; there is hardly any thing of value which cannot be procured here, to offer in exchange for the goods that we can supply. Cotton might be grown on the western coast in infinite quantity and of the best quality. And, recollecting how precarious is the source of supply which we now derive from the United States of America—recollecting how the growing manufactures of America herself are now annually absorbing more and more of the Cotton which she produces—and recollecting what a vast amount of our own population depend upon the manufactures from that raw material for daily bread, it becomes matter of the most extreme importance that we should seek out other sources of supply. Palm oil, an article also of great value and much used, is found in abundance in that country, there are also coffee, ivory, gold, in fact hardly any thing of value and utility might not be produced or found in Africa, and might not be recieved in return for our exports.

I say, therefore it is an object of great national importance, that by an end being put to the Slave Trade, we should be enabled to enter into commercial intercourse with the vast population of that region."

These sentiments are encouraging whether considered in reference to the annihilation of the slave trade, or the attention which the commerce of this country is attracting in England.

Truly Africa presents an inviting field for commercial enterprise; and no people better understand its importance than the English.

The King of Dahomy and British subjects—We learn that serious difficulties have arisen between the King of Dahomy and British residents in his dominion. We are not definitely informed with regard to the misunderstanding: it appears, however, that the slavers in that country, having become alarmed at the recent efforts of the British Government for the suppression of the slave trade there, conceived the idea of inducing the King to send out of his dominions all British subjects. The King, acting under this influence, has, on some frivolous pretext, issued orders to that effect; and has threatened to massacre all British subjects, commencing with the missionaries, found on his territory after a certain short period. So alarming and critical was the situation of the English in Dahomy that captain Forbes, of Her Majesty's brig Bonetta, has been dispatched to England with the intelligence.

If true, which we have no good reason to doubt, that these demi-devils, to perpetuate their diabolical traffic, have procured these difficulties; we have only to say that they have quite over reached themselves, and will be caught in their own snare.

The least unjustifiable violence committed on British subjects will be held a sufficient pretext and Her Majesty's Government will most assuredly avail themselves of it—to blockade the Dahomy territory; cut off the communications by which the slave trade there is fostered; and be satisfied only with its total annihilation from His Majesty's dominions.

A Whale.—A few days since an enormous whale was seen a little to the eastward of the cape, moving leisurely towards the south, now and then showing himself, and spouting torrents of water. We will not venture a description of the size of the monster, as reported to us, but all who saw it agree that it was of huge dimension. At first some were half inclined to think that the famous sea serpent had made us a visit. But, O dear, how the fishermen, who were in the offing in their tiny canoes, did scamper when they saw the columns of water ascending into the air.

Hippopotamus.—An American speculator offers $2500 for a Hippopotamus to be delivered to him in Alexandria Va. We are not advised that it is necessary it shall be from the While Nile. What do you say friend Harris—can't you supply a "Hippopotamus Liberienses" from the St. Paul, and pocket this neat little sum?

Who will not procure them?—Somebody says "a good news paper and a clean shirt are two things needed by every man in the community." The former can be obtained cheaply at this office. For the means of procuring the latter, we refer to D. Moore Esquire, who has now on hand a large supply of good soap, of his own manufacture, which he is offering at moderate prices.

Grand Bassa County.—the Board of Managers of the Penn. Col. Society, in May last, adopted resolutions authorising Hon S. A. Benson to construct, in G. B. County for the accommodation of emigrants, soon to arrive, twenty houses, and clear and plant a lot of one acre attached to each house. "A title in fee to be given for the same provided the parties shall within three years erect a similar house and prepare a similar lot for succeding "emigrants." This is an excellent idea.

Sinoe County.—A rumor has just reached here—we hope unfounded—that Mr. S. Lomax of this Town, and an individual belonging to Greenville name unknown, in attempting to land from the schr. George R. Mc Gill, at Greenville, were drowned.

Report says that an Eng. barque is landing goods somewhere in the vicinity of Sinoe contrary to law—we hope the report is unfounded; as we know the Govt. is desirous of maintaining a good understanding with foreign traders.

Cape Palmas.—We are informed, by Mr. Bowen, that several deaths have occured recently, at the Cape, among the early settlers: the health of the Colony, however, was good when he left; and the prospects of the people were encouraging.

FOREIGN.

We learn from an American paper, by the arrival of the "Liberia Packet," that President Zachary Taylor is no more, having daparted this life in July after a severe, but short attack of sickness.

According to the Constitution of the United States of America, Willard Fillmore (Vice President under Taylor) is now President of that Union. Upon the death of President Taylor his cabinet having resigned,—President Fillmore upon induction to the Chief Magistracy selected a new cabinet,—Hon.——— Winthrop of Mass. (formerly, Speaker of the House of Representatives) being made Secretary of State.

The death of President Taylor, so sudden and unexpected, doubtless arrested for a while, the political excitement which has pervaded the U. S. for two years past,—and while a nation shall be mourning the loss of a Chief Ruler, a spirit may be imbued, which will exert a healthful influence upon the exciting topics of the day. We have no doubt, but the favorable feelings towards Liberia, possessed by President Taylor, will be revived in President Fillmore, who, we anticipate will effect all he can for our country, and administer his own goverment in purity and patriotism, according to the spirit of that Constitution, which is at once his guide, and the safeguard of American liberty and independence.

D. T. H.

THE death of President Taylor is deeply regretted by the citizens of Liberia. He had manifested much interest for the welfare of this infant Republic; and high anticipations were entertained here that through his kind offices Congress might be induced, not only to recognize the independence of Liberia, but also to assist the "New Republic" pecuniarily.

THE Emperor of China died on the 25th of Febuary last.

THE king of Prussia, who was recently wounded, is not expected to live.

THE difficulty between England and Russia respecting the Greek question, threatens a rupture. The Russian Ambassador has been recalled from St James. Public opinion, however, in England and France seems to think that there is a secret behind the alleged cause of dispute.

THE Portuguese Government continue to resist the payment of indemnities to American citizens. And, according to the tone of the American press, things have now been brought to such a crisis, that there appears to be no alternative but payment or war. At our latest dates, Mr. Clay, U. S. charge at Lisbon, had demanded his passports, and was on his way to the U. S. It is intimated that as soon as Mr. Clay arrives, the President will transmit a special message to Congress, "that will smell considerably strong of gun powder."

SMYRNA has been in consternation in consequence of continuous shocks of earth quake.

NAVAL.—August 22.—Sailed L. G. schooner Lark, R. Cooper Esquire, Commanding, for Grand Bassa, Sinoe, and a cruise along the leeward coast. Since the sailing of the Lark the weather has been unusually boisterous. She parted her cable in at Grand Bassa on the 25th, and had to put to sea.

The brig Excellent, captured by the U. S. ship John Adams off Ambreze, arrived at Norfolk on the 19th, of June, in charge of Lieut. Ganesvoort.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE

August 28th,—Arrived American barque Liberia Packet, Howe, 34 days from Hampton Roads, with 56 passengers. Among the passengers are Rev Mr Wood & lady from New Brunswick, and Mr. Robert Wood from Antigua. The Liberia Packet brings a large mail, and a valuable cargo of merchandise,—including emigrant stores, and goods for the purchase of territory.

August 30th.—Arrived sloop Maria. G. W. Gibson, from Cape Palmas, via Sinoe and Grand Bassa with a cargo of Rice consigned to order. Passenger J. B. Bowen Esqr. The Maria is a fine little craft owned by Mr. Bowen, an enterprising merchant of Cape Palmas. Left Hamburg brig Theresee Henrietteo. S. Peterson, at C. P. to sail soon for Monrovia, Capt. Gibson reports two English vessels, barque Venus, and brig——at anchor off Trade town, on the 16th Agst. On the 27th spoke, at sea, off Little Bassa, English barque Clydeside, in company with the English brig Firefly, standing down the coast: next day saw an English brig supposed to be the George. getting underway from Mar hall, Junk.

August 22;—Sailed American brig Lowder, J. R. Brown, for Cape Palmas, Gaboon, and Princes Island, and thence to the United States. Passenger for Gaboon Dr. Ford.

August 29th.—Sailed Cutter Eliza Frances. J. Howard, on a trading voyage coastwise.

August 31st.—Sailed Eng. Cutter Georgianna, J. K. Straw, for the Gold Coast.

COMMUNICATION

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr. Herald.

Not long since it was intimated to me that the government and people of Liberia are charged, in England with placing "unnecessary restrictions upon British commerce; that the laws of Liberia instead of encouraging the intercourse of British merchants are calculated to have a contrary effect." Now it is not for me to deny the existence, in Liberia, of laws regulating navigation and commerce upon the Liberia coast; but I do deny that such laws are more restrictive, or less calculated to encourage commercial intercourse than the maritime laws of any other country; and for the truth of this assertion I appeal to those British, American, and German merchants who are constantly in the ports of Liberia. The Liberian Government, in the performance of a necessary, just, and natural right, forbids the landing of merchandize upon the Liberian coast otherwise than at ports of entry—except under special permits, for goods on which the tariff duties have been paid. If this can be tortured into an "unecessary restriction upon British commerce," I have yet to learn the rudiments of the principles of commercial intercourse. Nor do these laws effect British more than the commerce of other foreign countries. No; but the fact is, there are one or two, I belive not more British traders on our coast, who raise objections against the operation of our revenue laws, and who have not hesitated to evade them whenever an opportunity has offered for them to do so; and it is presumed that it is to their owners in England we are indebted for the charges referred to above. It is not my intention to charge, those merchants with a wilful design to injure us in the estimation of our English friends. It is believed, indeed it is known that their servants trading on our coast have for some time past, been misrepresenting the people of Liberia to their owners. But it is to be hoped that their owners, when such representations are made will investigate the charges before they give credence to them, and publish them to the world.

The people of Liberia are under too many obligations to the Government and people of England to adopt any unnecessary restrictive measures against British commerce, or in any way endanger the good feeling which so universally prevails in England for the welfare of Liberia: and it is with no little regret that they hear such unfavorable and unfounded reports circulated respecting them.

I intend, Mr. Herald, on another occasion to say more on this subject if you will permit me.

Yours &c.
CITIZEN.

A PIECE OF LEGAL ADVICE.

Rennes, the ancient capital of Brittany, is a famous place for law. People come there from the extremities of the country to get information and ask advice. To visit Rennes without getting advice appears impossible to a Breton. This was true at the latter end of the last century, just as it is at present and especially among the country people, who are a timid and cautious race.

Now it happened one day that a farmer named Bernard, having come to Rennes on business, he thought himself that as he had a few hours to spare, it would be well to employ them in getting the advice of a good lawyer. He had often heard of Monsieur Potier de la Germondaie, who was in such high repute, that people believed a lawsuit gained when he undertook their cause. The countryman inquired for his address, and proceeded to his house in Rue St. Georges. The clients were numerous, and Bernard had to wait some time. At length his turn arrived, and he was introduced. M. Potier de la Germondaie signed to him to be seated, then taking off his spectacles, and placing them on his desk, he requested to know his business.

"Why, Mr. Lawyer." said the farmer, twirling his hat, "I have heard so much about you, that, as I have come to Rennes, I wish to take the opportunity of consulting you."

"I thank you for your confidence, my friend; you wish to bring an action, perhaps?"

"An action! O, I hold that in abhorrence! Never has Pierre Bernard had a word with any one."

"Then is it a settlement—a division of property?"

"Excuse me Mr. Lawyer, my family and I have never made a division seeing that we all draw from the same well, as they say."

"Well, is it to negotiate a purchase or a sale?"

"O, no. I am neither rich enough to purchase nor poor enough to sell!"

"Will you tell me, then, what you do want of me?" said the lawyer, in surprise.

"Why, I have already told you, Mr. Lawyer, replied Bernard. "I want your advice—for payment of course, as I am well able to give it to you, and I don't wish to lose this opportunity."

M. Potier took a pen and paper, and asked the countryman his name.

"Pierre Bernard," replied the latter, quite happy that he was at length understoood.

"Your age?"

"Thirty years, or very near it."

Your vocation!"

"My vocation! O, that means what I do. I am a farmer."

The lawyer wrote two lines, folded the paper, and handed it to his stranger client.

"Is it finished already! Well and good, what is the price of that advice, Mr. Lawyer!"

"Three frances!"

Bernard paid the money, and took his leave, delighted that he had taken, advantage of his opportunity.

When he reched home, it was four o'clock; the journey had fatigued him, and he determined to rest himself the remainder of the day. In the mean time the hay had been two days cut, and was completely saved. One of the workingmen came to ask if it should be drawn in.

"What, this evening!" exclaimed the farmer's wife who had come in to meet her husband. "It would be a pity to commence the work so late, since it can be done to-morrow without any inconvenience." The man objected that the weather might change; that the horses were all ready and the hands idle. But the farmer's wife replied that the wind was in a good quarter, and that night would set in before their work could be completed. Bernard, who had been listening to the argument was uncertain which way to decide, when he suddenly recollected that he had the lawyer's advice in his pocket.

"Wait a minute," he exclaimed; "I have an advice—and a famous one too—that I paid three francs for; it ought to tell us what to do. Here, Theresa, see what it says; you can read written hand better than I,"

The woman took the paper, and read these lines—

"NEVER PUT OFF TILL TO-MORROW WHAT YOU CAN DO TO-DAY!"

"That's it!" exclaimed Bernard, struck with a sudden ray of light. "Come, be quick; get the carts and away; boys and girls, all to the hay-field!"

His wife ventured a few more objections, but he declared that he had not bought a three francs opinion to make no use of it, and that he would follow the lawyer's advice. He himself set the example by taking the lead in the work; and not returning till all the hay was brought in. The event seemed to prove the wisdom of his conduct, for the weather changed during the night; an unexpected storm burst over the valley, and the next morning it was found that the river had overflowed, and carried away the hay that had been left in the field. The crops of the neighbouring farmers were completely destroyed: Bernard alone had not suffered.

The success of this first experiment gave him such faith in the advice of the lawyer, that from that day forth he adopted it as the rule of his conduct, and became, by his order and diligence, one of the richest farmers in the country. He never forgot the service done by M. Potier de la Germondaie, to whom he ever afterwards carried a couple of his finest fowls every year, as a token of gratitude.

Filing Newspapers.

One of the many things which I have to regret, when I review my past life, is, that I did not from my earliest youth, at least, as soon as I was able to do it, take and preserve—I believe the technical word is "file"—some good newspaper. How interesting would it be now to a sexagenarian to look into the paper which he read when he was twelve or sixteen, or twenty years old! How many events would this call to mind which he has entirely forgotten! How many interesting associations and feelings would it revive! What a view would it give one of past years! What knowledge would it preserve by assisting the memory. And how many valuable purposes of a literary kind even, might it be rendered subservient to! How much do I wish I could look into such a record, while composing this short article! But newspapers are quite different things to what they were sixty or even seventy years ago. They are unspeakably more interesting and saluable; in that respect, at least, (I believe in many others,) these times are better than the former. Formerly, the editors of newspapers were obliged to strain their wits and exhaust their means in order to obtain matter to fill their pages. Now, the great difficulty is, to insert all the valuable interesting materials poured upon them from every part of the world, and from every grade and place of society,

Now, newspapers contain many of the best thoughts of the most highly-gifted men on the most momentous subjects, and their reports and statements are far more accurate than they formerly were or could be. They have repudiated the character for lying, they once had, and have become records of truth.—Correspondent of the British Banner.

FORENSIC FUN.

We have heard of legal quibbles in our day, and we have heard some—but if a Philadelphia lawyer can beat the following (lately urged to a jury in this city) he can take our hat, aye, and our coroneye. The prisoner is on his trial for entering a house in the night time with intent to steal. The testimony was clear that he had made an opening sufficiently large to admit the upper part of his body, and through which he protruded himself about half way and stretching out his arm committed the thefts;

Mr. Obfusticate Brief addresses the jury:—

"What an outrage," (looking horrified, and with outstretched and trembling arms,) "I repeat what an outrage upon your intelligence and your common sense, is it for the State's Attorney to ask at your hands the conviction of my client on such testimony! The law is against entering a house—and can a man be said to enter a house, when only one-half of his body is in and the other half out! Gentlemen look to the Divine Law on this point—God commanded Adam and Eve not to eat the apple—i. e. the whole of the apple. And all the commentators agree that if they had only eaten one-half, they would never have been expelled from the blooming Garden of Eden." The jury brought in a verdict of "guilty" as to one-half of his body from the waist up, and "not guilty" as to the other half.

The Judge sentenced the guilty half to one year's imprisonment, leaving it to the prisoner's option to have the innocent half cut off or take it along with him.

N. B. (We mean the jury and Judge ought to have done so.)

Legal Anecdote.

A Novel Way of Deciding a Perplexing Case.—We are quite sure the case we are about to report never found its way into any of "the books." It occured in this city about thirty years ago.

A gentleman, fond of sporting having broken a part of the lock of his fowling piece, sent it to a gunsmith to undergo the requisite repairs. The gunsmith mended it as ordered and sent it back to the owner, with the message that his charge was one dollar. Shortly afterwards the sporting gentleman went a hunting, and upon the first discharge the gun broke in the identical place where it had been mended.

It may be imagined that he returned to town not in the most amiable humor; and upon repairing to the gunsmith's an altercation ensued between them, the result of which was, that the gentleman refused to pay the bill, and the gun-smith swore he would sue, which he accordingly did forthwith. The suit happened to be brought before Mr. N ——, who was then a Justice of the Peace, and who is now living in retirement at the Bay Biloxi. The sporting gentlemen upon receiving the citation, hastened in great wrath to lawyer H——, (who is still practising in our city, and familiar with the affairs of the Atchafalaya R. R. & B. Co.) and stated his case.

"Pooh, Pooh!" said lawyer H., "don't pester me with your one dollars case; go and pay the claim." The sporting gentleman reiterated his determination not to pay the claim unless "in due course of law," and declared that he would defend the suit, cost what it would. "Well," said lawyer H., "if you insist upon my appearing for you, I shall charge you twenty dollars for my services." The sportsman intimated his willingness to pay the fee. "But" said lawyer H., "I must have my fee in advance, for when the suit is finished I am afraid you will demur to pay me twenty dollars in a one dollar suit."

The twenty dollar bill instantly passed from the sportman's pocket into the lawyer's hand, and the necessary answer was soon filed. The case came on for trial; the plaintiff and defendant were present with their counsel, and as usually happens, the parties worried their lawyers, lawyers the witnesses and court. For four mortal hours the wordy altercation was kept up, until the patience of the worthy Justice being completely exhausted, and his mind sorely perplexed by the conflicting arguments of the advocates, he abruptly put an end to the case in the following novel manner.

With despair and vexation pictured on his countenance, he exclaimed with terrific vehemence: "Mr. Gun-smith!—here is your dollar!" at the same time throwing him the coin; and turning to the lawyer, "Gentlemen," said he, "there are NO costs in this case!"—Thereupon the Court adjourned.

Both parties afterwards expressed themselves satisfied with the decision: the gun-smith because he had received his claim, and the sportsman because he had not paid the debt.—N. O. Delta.

LONG SPEECHES.

The editor of the Richmond Whig finds it necessary to deal a little with the members of the Legislature now in session in that city.—This hint will apply as well to some speech makers in Liberia.

"From mensuration, it is certain that Demosthenes never spoke longer than about three quarters of an hour. Cicero's orations, any one of them can be delivered in even less time. Mirabeau condensed his thunders into a space of fifteen or twenty minutes. The great men of the Lord Parliament and the Commonwealth, Lord Somarhe, even Lord Bolingbroke, the most diffuse of British orators prior to the trial of Warren Hastings Walpole, the elder Pitt, and the elder Fox, brief and powerfully condensed—in other words, they were satisfied to present powerful thoughts, in a few simple (and the simplest) words, instead of pouring out words, as peas are poured out of a boot—verbet preterea nihil. Theirs was the eloquence of reason, of profound sense, high knowledge, and lofty thought—not ragged and disjointed declamation".

"The taste of this country in public speaking is most injurious to the public interests.—The Courts are stopped from doing the business of the people, by the horrible garrulity of the Bar—legislation is sorely impeded by it.

"Let us hope, for the sake of Virginia, that in view of the immense business it has to do, if it do the people justice, the Legislature will go to work seriously before Xmas: that done, and long speetings abolished, the public work can be easier completed, arduous as it is.

H. Teage.

W. J. ROBERTS,
High Sheriff

Monrovia September 14th 1850.

LIBERIA HERALD.

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled.

The undersigned, for himself and others associated, respectfully begs leave to present to the consideration of Congress the following propositions, to which they have given much reflection:

First. The suppression of the African Slave Trade.

Second. The carrying of the mails between the United States and the Republic of Liberia

Third. To extend and regulate trade between the United States and Liberia.

The Independence of the Republic of Liberia has been acknowledge by the greatest powers of Europe. It is an off shoot from our own country, and is peopled by emigrants from all the States of this Union. It already embraces within the action of its government and laws many of the natives and several of the Kings and Princes of the west coast of Africa, who seek its protection, trust in its beneficence, and offer their allegiance as citizens.

When the Republic of Liberia shall have completed the purchase of the Gallinas, for which negotiations are now in progress, the sea-coast will embrace upwards of seven hundred miles.

The first settlement from this country was made in 1821; and the infant Colony, under incredible embarrassments, against the combinations and efforts of an inhuman and mercenary spirit, and the earlier and almost indomitable prejudice and hostility of native tribes, has gradually and peacefully extended its borders; received, protected, and educated emigrants from the United States, and many of the natives; has triumphed over all obstacles, and now presents to the world a free, vigorous and permanent commonwealth.

Its destiny may be predicted.

Its extension on that heretofore desecrated coast; its ultimate influence over all that great division of the globe; the suppression of the slave trade, not only within the present limits of the Republic, but shortly from Sierra Leone to Cape Palmas, and eventually from the entire coast; the great and increasing emigration from this country to the fertile regions of the Republic; the diffusion of knowledge and civilization, of christianity, of the arts and sciences, and of extended and heretofore unknown commerce, indicate that destiny.

Its forests, its minerals, its soil, its climate, and the already various and extensive productions of the necessaries and luxuries of life, form so many unfailing sources for our commerce.

The undersigned and his associates, looking to the preceding high public objects, and also to their private objects of pecuniary results, propose to build four steam-ships, which shall combine, in a higher degree than has yet been attained, the necessary qualities of speed, strength, space and ventilation, each of which to be commanded by a Lieutenant of the United States Navy.

Each ship shall not be of less than four thousand tons, and warranted to be of superior quality in all respects, to any steam-ships now afloat, or in progress of construction, for war purposes, or for the proposed service, and capable of going from New York to Liverpool in eight days.

Each ship to make not less than four trips per annum, leaving New Orleans, Norfolk, Baltimore, and New York, or such other ports as may be reasonably indicated by the United States.

The Government of the United States shall have the power to take any and all of said ships, when required for war purposes, by paying the cost of construction, and a commission of ten per centum, and at all times the right to place on board of each ship two guns of heavy calibre, and the men necessary to serve them, and also to send out on board of any of said vessels any agent or agents of the Government to Liberia, free from cost for transportation or subsistence.

The undersigned and his associates estimate the cost of such ships, as heretofore named, at nine hundred thousand dollars each, and they ask the United States to advance to them two-thirds of the money in five per cent. stocks, to be repaid into the Treasury, with interest, in equal annual instalments, during the existence of the contract; which contract they propose shall continue for twenty years, renewable at the pleasure of the Government.

The sum of six hundred thousand dollars to be advanced in five per cent. stocks, from time to time, on each ship, as it shall progress in construction, and the Government to hold a lien upon each ship to secure the advance.

Two of said ships shall be finished and ready for sea on or before the the first day of October, 1852, and the two others on or before the first day of October, 1854; so that an opportunity may be given to ascertain the efficiency of the two first constructed, and make such improvements as will best comply with their obligations to the Government.

Each ship shall be in readiness to convey the mails to and from Liberia, and shall provide passage and subsistence for such mail agent as the Post Office Department shall appoint.

In consideration of the above-named services, and the creation of this powerful addition to the effective marine for public and national purposes, ready whenever the emergency shall arise to require its entire employment by the government, and for affording facilities for cheap and rapid emigration to Liberia, the undersigned and his associates shall be paid the sum of dollars for each and every trip to and from Liberia during said term of contract.

In further consideration of the mutual public benefits to the citizens of both countries, they ask to be permitted to introduce into the ports of the United States the products of the Republic of Liberia free of duty: provided, that the productions of this country be admitted into Liberia in like manner.

And on the further consideration that the American Colonization Society shall have the right and authority to send on each of said four ships, on each and every voyage they may respectively make, not exceeding four thousand emigrants, being free persons of color, from the United States to Liberia, on prepayment of ten dollars for each emigrant over twelve years of age, and of five dollars for each emigrant under twelve years of age, which also includes the transportation of the baggage, and the daily supply of sailors' rations, and to convey and bring back free from cost such agents, as they from time to time choose to send.

The public benefits to be derived from this enterprise, it is believed, are alike practical, philanthropic, and obvious; and its advantages to the emigrants may be ascertained from the fact, that the cost per head under the most untiring and favorable efforts of the American Colonization Society, is thirty dollars for adults, and half-price for children.

The undersigned and his associates believe that small ships, either steamers or sail vessels, cannot be successfully employed in the transportation of emigrants at so low a price. But the rapidity of the voyage, and the number to be transported, will enable them to reduce the cost of passage by a saving of subsistence during the voyage.

Small steamers could not carry the necessary fuel to make any speed in a voyage of over four thousand miles, and consequently they would not be efficient in the suppression of the slave trade.

Hence, therefore, the above projection of service is considered effective for all practical purposes; the suppression of the slave trade by the continued presence of such vessels; the encouragement and protection of our commerce, and the much desired object of quick, cheap, safe, and commodious transportation, which must necessarily lead to numerous emigration.

JOSEPH BRYAN,
of Alabama, for himself and his associates.

For the Liberia Herald.

Grand Bassa, September 4th, 1850.

MR. HERALD.

My only apology for addressing you at this time, is, that I am some what sensitive in whatever has a tendency to interrupt the harmony of our citizens; and the just operation of our laws. I have just received intelligence, which may be confidently relied on, that Capt. David Murray, since the arrival of his last vessel, has, as usual, been making misrepresentations and false statements up and down our coast. He is telling the Chiefs that his vessel has brought out instructions to him from England to procure the signatures of all the chiefs along the coast, who wish to place themselves under the protection of the British Government; and that he is authorised to purchase all the land that has not been sold to the Liberia Government, and that his government is determined that British traders shall be allowed to trade directly with the chiefs without accounting to any Liberian Custom House for duties &c; and that his vessel has brought out despatches to the English Commodore on this station to that effect.

He has had a number of Chiefs on board his vessel; nearly all, I believe, between Tobacconee and Trade-town; some of whom, I understand, have signed instruments—it is said deeds of conveyance for land bearing prior dates to those held by our government. I presume he had no great difficulty in obtaining such deeds. The natives, we all know, would sell their land fifty times over, (after the first sale,) if any one were fool enough to pay them for it. He has given them lots of powder and rum, and my friend at New Cess informs me that they are doing guns and carousing from Grand Bessa Point to Trade-town, and how far below I don't know.

I would not have you think that I entertain any fear that Murray has any such instructions, or that the British Government will sustain him in his unjustifiable course. I am no lawyer, but I have in my library read a few paragraphs of international law, which teaches me that such conduct is improper and reprehensible, and would not be tolerated in any other government.

My object in writing this is to call the attention of the proper authorities to this subject, that a check may be put to Murray's conduct, and the subversive influences he is exerting be counteracted. There is no question that he is sowing, or endeavoring so to do, discord and disaffection among the citizens of this Republic.

Nothing is more clear that the citizens of one government have no right to enter the territories of another and use means to disaffect the citizens thereof with impunity—this Capt. Murray is trying to do. Why should it be tolerated here?—

I know that our goverment appreciates the friendship of the English Goverment. This has been manifested in the forbearance with, and privileges granted to, British traders upon our coast. Of this I do not mean to complain.—The course, perhaps, was commendable, the opinion of others to the contrary notwithstanding:—But while the Government is manifesting its friendly disposition towards British traders, regard must be had to our own interest, our own safety and the Majesty of the laws. The time has come that we should let foreigners see that we know our rights, and will maintain them. I am loth to believe that even Murray's owners will countenance such conduct towards an inoffensive people. The fact is that Murry has been so long upon this coast, and unrestrained by law, that he thinks himself above the law.

Your most obt. Servent.

JUSTICE.

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr. Herald:—After an experimental voyage, of more than twenty five years, navigating an unknown sea, almost without chart or compass; driven by tempest and whirlwind: tossed to and fro upon the bosom of the surging sea; riding out storm after storm—attended with difficulties and dangers appalling to the stoutest hearts—frequently thrown upon our beam ends, and more than once threatened with sudden destruction upon a lea shore;—indeed, sometimes disparing almost of ever reaching our destined port; and encouraged only by the glimmering star of liberty, which peered steadily through the dark clouds that often times obscured our horizon, as it were to cheer us on. But as the love of liberty—Heavenly boon—had induced us to undertake the voyage, each one nerved himself to the task, uttering "liberty or death," and determined to do his duty, and exert every power within him to save the almost helpless ship from the perils which threatened to engulph her. Finally, driven by stress of weather almost upon the rocks of despair, and hope almost abandoned, it was suggested that one alternative remained of averting the impending danger, viz,—to cut away the sails by which our little barque had been so long propelled, and cast out the sheet anchor of nationality, securely shackeled to the cable of independence. These means were resorted to; and after a few more blasts of the fierce hurricane, the elements became composed. Our little ship was then newly rigged and fitted, and again launched upon the mighty deep—under exceedingly favorable circumstances, and all on board delighted in view of the encouraging prospects before them. For some two years we have been wafted along, upon a smooth sea, by favorable gales; all indulging the pleasing hope that the future of our voyage would be pleasant and prosperous—and that we should not again be called to contend against such difficulties as had hitherto impeded our progress. But hark!—The cry of breakers a head falls heavely upon my ear; and a storm seems to be gathering in the south.

But, Mr. Herald, to be less metaphorical, I have, for more than twenty years, suffered and toiled, side by side, with my fellow citizens to establish here a home; and a Government which would secure to me, and my children, and my down-troden race, the blessings of civil liberty, the protection of wholesome laws, and a character among the peoples of the earth. And, for a year or two past, with you, and, indeed, all my fellow citizens, I have been indulging the pleasing reflection that my fondest hopes had been realized. No one was fuller in his congratulations, or felt greater joy than myself when the pleasing intelligence reached us that Liberia, my beloved country, had been placed upon the platform of nations, by the recognition of her independence by two of the most powerful governments of Europe: and that all civilized nations sympathized with us, and would favor and encourage our efforts.

With such prospects before me, I joined my fellow citizens in renewed exertions to redeem Africa from her long degredation; and manifest to the world that Liberia is not insensible of the confidence that has been reposed in her.

It was my earnest desire that no difficulty should arise between the government or people of Liberia, and the citizens or subjects of any foreign country; but that harmony and a good understanding should be strictly maintained. Then, Mr. Herald, you may imagine the mortification and pain I have suffered at hearing the rumors, now rife among us, that Captain D. Murray, is not only landing goods upon our coast in violation of the express injunction of our maratime laws,—but is inciting the natives—citizens of Liberia by solemn compact—within our jurisdiction, to insubordination: advising them to sign documents placing themselves under the protection of the British Government: And who boldly asserts, I am informed, that he is acting under authority from His government. Mr. Herald can you enlighten me on this subject?—Are these rumors true?—Can it be within the range of possibility that Murray is authorized, by Her Majesty's Government?—I cannot think so. But what is our government doing in the premises?—Will she not bring Murray to account?—

Yours for the present,

JUNO.

For the Liberia Herald.

MR. HERALD:—

It seems difficult to cut an old acquaintance. Our connection was of so long standing—formed in 1835 and severed only in 1849, that I cannot maintain an entire silence. During that whole period you were the faithful herald, which was given you in charge to announce; and never in any one instance did you expose yourself to the imputation of adding one word to, or of substacting one word from any communication you were desired to make. And, although now that our connection is dissolved, and you are transferred to be the responce of a far abler and more profound oracle, I cannot speak to you in tone of command which our connection authorised to assume, yet I can speak through you in that language of frankness and candor which uniformly marked your past proclaimings.

In common with many amongst us, who are termed thinking men, I deem it of great importance that we shall secure a long line of coast.—that we shall extend our boundary line in the direction of the North, as far as will be agreeable to our neighbors at Sierra Leone, and of the South—not simply to Grand Cestors, because "Maryland in Liberia" is just on the other side, but as far beyond Cape Palmas as we can conveniently get. The fact that in the event of the advocated extention, the coast line of territory of "Liberia Proper," would be dismembered or disjointed by the intervening and indenting territory of "Maryland in Liberia," and the more plausible fact that, under the two different and distinct constitutions, there would be something approaching to an Imperium in imperio would furnish no solid argument against the propriety of the proposed extension. He is not only simple and short-sighted—but something worse; who does not see, that what is now only in name "Maryland in Liberia," must at no distant day be in verity, "Maryland in Liberia." It is perhaps, well for us, that "Maryland in Liberia" has not come in before this. The unpractised arm should not be subjected to a great weight at first, lest the strained muscles should contract a permanent debility. The limb attains its utmost power, by gradual developments, and by a series of exercise proportioned to the strength developed. When we are ready for them, and they are ready for us, the move will be easy. "Liberia Proper" will open her arms, and "Maryland in Liberia" will fall into their embraces. There will be a mutual drawing together; and the coalition will be easy, quiet, and mutual—and become natural—permanent. Other objections have been urged against the proposed extension, the most grave of which are;—first, that we are not able to protect a long line of coast;—and secondly, that we cannot afford its native inhabitants an adequate supply of suitable merchandize, and thus by a deficient stimulent to industry and enterprise retard the development of the country's resources.

Aside from the light in which a regard to those principles which regulate the great community of nations, would place these objections, and in the lowest possible view which can be taken of them, it may be affirmed that nothing can exceed their futility.

When it is said we are unable to protect a long line of coast, the meaning must be that we are unable to protect the present aboriginal occupants of the soil, or that we are unable to protect it from the agression of foreigners. If the first—it is a sufficient anawer simply to say, the coast cannot possibly have less protection in future than it has had in the past. What power has ever interposed to protect them against the depredations and impositions of unscrupulous traders? What peace maker has ever come in and employed a soothing voice to allay the ferment and excitement which foreign influence excited? What friendly arbitrator has ever quiet between combatting tribes, when paid to cut each others' throats and steal each others' children—whole villages have been reduced to a heap of ruins, burying and devouring the bones of its aged and infirm inhabitants! If the inhabitants of the coast were visited at all by a power superior to theirs, it was to lay upon them the hand of a double chastisement for imaginary or real wrongs commited in the way of retaliation. In fact, it is well known, that the coast of Africa, except at the few ineonsiderable sites of European settlements, is considered beyond the territory of law and justice, and deserving a main where all the passions and propensities of avarice, cruelty, lust—may throw off all restraint and go forth to boundless indulgence. This fact is notorious. These spectacles, so frequent a few years ago, are now of rare occurrence on any part of the coast under our jurisdiction; and these destructive feuds among the natives are nearly at an end.

It should be recollected, that the natives, if left alone to pursue their own avocations, in their own way, require no protection. Each tribe has its separate laws, regulating its own affairs; and the tribes collectively have a few simple, general laws—something like the public law of Europe—regulating their intercourse. Experience has taught them the sufficiency of these; and it is only when they are suspended, or violated by lawless brigandity, that any great inconvenience is felt: and it were but a tiresome repetition to state that nine tenths of this excitement have been evermore the offspring of the slave trade; to which, hitherto, what has been misnamed lawful and honorable trade, has contributed a melancholy share. If by the present it is intended to alledge an inability on our part, to enforce a system of judicious and equitable maritime laws on so long a line of coast, it is conceded if the force we may be called to protect against, is superior to ours.

But this is true of every nation of Britain, France—the United States. If France be so much more powerful and populous than England, that a small number only of its citizens would go freebooters, and successfully resist the maritime laws of England, it might be extended upon the same principle that Queen Victoria should not claim and possess the coast of Ireland and England!! If this doctrine should prevail very many nations that have been long undisturbed and undisputed possession of their domain, would have to contract their lines and throw open part of their governed and regulated dominions to the operations of lawless and unrestrained passion. For where is the nation whose force and vigilance are such as to keep its territory free from the pollution of piratical entry? Over all the coast which we may acquire, we shall, I trust exercise a salutary authority. It will I doubt not, be the aim of our legislators to establish such a system of law, and enforce such regulations, as the nature of the case demands. They have the past and present laws of other nations before them. They have also the past and present condition of those nations before them. Let them take the experience of others for their torch; and keeping the peculiarities of our position steadily and distinctly in view; let them avoid a Procustean legislation, avoiding alike the bigotry that would chain them to the mula of antiquity and the novelty that would wholly disregard all the lessons of experience. Having thus spun out my remarks on the first objection, I must defer what I may find to say to the second, to some future communication. In the interim, Mr. Herald, believe me to be ever

Yours &c.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, SEPTEMBER 18th, 1850.

Local.—We are very glad to see the improvements that have been made in Monrovia lately, by the present corporate authorities, especially that made on Broad, Ashmun and Cemetery Streets. The clearing the streets entirely of weeds, bushes, and rank grass, which serves only as so many harbors for poisonous and destructive reptiles, and throwing up on either side, comfortable and pleasent macadamized walks having the streets, so raised in the centre, that the water from the heavy rains, runs down on each side, into gutters constructed next the foot-walks, and thus the flood is carried off into drains and ditches!

These improvements, are not like a pump in a yard without a handle—neither ornamental nor useful—but, both enhances the good appearance and the pedestrian comfort of the Matropolis. We have long enough been mortified, in seeing our worthy ladies, young, and elderly, together with strangers from far off countries, walking through Monrovia, and hid in many parts of our [illegible] by bushes, and noxious weeds, much to our shame and disgust. The time has now fully arrived for us to be awake to our duty in this particular:—let us be up and doing, and keep our city clean and respectable in appearance. We should remember that Monrovia is the capitol of Liberia, and foreigners visiting our country, are certain to give the metropolis a call before they leave; and how we would rejoice to have the name, a clean, neat, and respectable place, in its appearance. Though in our presence they "may not indulge malice and nought set down in malice," yet they can not help attributing to some cause, (perhaps laziness) an exuberant growth of noxious weeds &c in our streets. We commend this subject to our enterprising citizens, and call upon all who have a sparks of local pride in them, to imitate, in front of their houses and property, the respectable and enviable appearance of the streets in the vicinity of the M. E. Church!

A word to the wise is sufficient.

D. T. H.

We publish on another page extracts—which we doubt not will be read by our fellow citizens with great satisfaction—from several exceedingly interesting and encouraging letters, recently received from eminent individuals in the United States, respecting the present prospects of African Colonization, and the deep interest which is now every where manifesting itself in that county, in favor of Liberia.

The scheme of Judge Bryan and others, for the establishment of a line of steam ships between the United States and this country, is certainly a gigantic one: and we confess, that on reading their memorial to Congress—which our readers will find on our first page—we were not less "electorized and astonished" than was our American friend; and the first question which presented itself to our mind, too, was, "can any thing like the proposition be carried successfully out." In view of the capacity of the vessels to be employed, and the large amount of money necessary to build and equip them, it seemed to us that the scheme was impracticable and, indeed, at present unadvisable. We could not imagine how it was possible to employ such mammoth ships, 4000 tons each, profitably in the present incipient stage of our commerce, and the comparatively small number of emigrants, now offering, for Liberia. But upon reflection, we are frank to confess, our views are changed, and we are truly gratified to learn that the memorial has been favorably received by the Committee, of the House of Representatives, to whom it was refered. And we hope ere this a Bill has been presented, favoring the views of the Memorialists, which will meet the concurrence of Congress.

We learn that Judge Bryan's proposition has been amended so that in lieu of four ships, that the contract be for six ships of the size and character described in the memorial, and to make seven monthly trips to and from Liberia: and in the homeward voyage to touch at some of the Islands and Ports on the African Coast—beyond the limits of Liberia; thence proceed to Gibralta and take the Mediterranean mails,—to go into Cadez, or some other port in Spain, to be designated by the Government;—also into the port of Lisbon;—and into Brest, or some other port in France, to be designated as above;—and to proceed thence to London, and convey the mails thence to the United States.

This is, indeed, a grand scheme, and altogether worthy the patronage of the United States Government. The vast importance of such a line of steam ships to the commerce of that country must be evident to every one. With respect to Liberia, great and important results may be anticipated—the facilities thus afforded will, unquestionably, augment emigration, and greatly increase the commercial intercourse between Liberia and the United States.

We sincerely hoped, under our new organization, that our laws would be observed and respected; and that our infant government would be entirely relieved from the improper interference, and perplexing annoyances of foreign traders visiting our coast. Such, however,—which we exceedingly regret—seems not to be the case—as our readers will observe by reference to the communications of "Justice" and "Juno," on our second page.

We know Captain David Murray; and also know, if we are permitted to judge by his past conduct towards our citizens, that, for many years, he has not entertained any good feelings for Liberia. Why; is, perhaps, best known to himself,—nor shall we go into any explanation, at present, to account for his ill-feeling. It may not, however, be out of place to remark that, as far as we are informed, it has not been produced by any injustice having been done him, at any time; either by the people, or the authorities of Liberia,—unless, which seems, after all to be the principal cause of his hostility, the competition of Liberian traders has, in some respect, interfered with his pecuniary interests along the coast. For the last fifteen years, this said Captain David Murray has been menacing and bullying the people of Liberia. Neither Cooper, nor Hunter, nor Cheeseman has forgotten the wanton destruction of his property at Tradetown, and Cestors, and, we think, at Manna many years ago, by this said Capt. David Murray. But these were days of yore; and we had hoped that, he, as all other traders—English, American, French, and German—have done, as far as we know, would cease his opposition to the government; conform to her laws; and carry on a profitable trade with her citizens.

We know that it is the earnest wish of the Government that the most friendly relations should subsist between the government and people of Liberia and foreign traders,—and that every indulgence has been extended to foreigners to encourage harmonious intercourse. But Captain Murray alone remains incorrigible. And why such obstinacy and determined rancor we cannot imagine. We have no idea that he is prompted by his owners. They are men of high character and enlightened principle, and would not give their sanction to such a course of conduct. Nor is it at all probable that he is, even, encouraged, much less authorized to conspire with our citizens, and defy our laws, by Her Majesty's Government. So we opine that "Juno" may dismiss his fears on that score. The only conclusion that we have been able to arrive at, is, that Murray, acting upon his own responsibility, has made up his mind to sacrifice something in an effort to produce a rupture between us and Her Majesty's Government, and, if possible, alienate the sympathies of our English friends. In this, however, we venture to affirm, he will find himself mistaken. Our government will act prudently, but firmly. And while she will create no just cause of dispute, she will teach Captain Murray to respect her laws.

Loss of four lives.—A melancholy accident occurred, at Grand Bassa, on the 6th inst, resulting in the death of a woman and her three children. The deceased, a Mrs. Clayton, widow, of Greenville, Sinoe, and her children had taken passage on board the English brig George Captain Townly, some three months ago—for what destination we are not informed.—The George, however, during this time, had been trading along the coast; and anchored at Grand Bassa a day or two before the sad occurrence. The surf on the bar had been unusually high for some days, and the unfortunate woman, while passing in the boat from the George, was entreated by persons on board the Liberia Packet, lying in the harbor, not to attempt the passage of the bar. But entreaty was unavailing;—and the boat had scarcely entered the breakers when she was upset. And sea after sea in quick succession tumbling in, baffled all attempts at rescue, except of the kroomen, in the boat, who were expert swimmers.

More Lives Lost by Drowning.—Two young men—one the son of Prince Boyer, King of Tradetown, and the other a Vey, brought up in the family of Major F. Payne of this town—were drowned, in our harbor, on the 12th; inst. They had, for several months been employed on board the Eng. barque Clydeside, the latter as cooper. It seems, that a canoe, belonging to the ship, broke a drift,—and these two lads were sent, in another canoe, to pick it up. But they had not proceeded far when the canoe in which they were, was, by some means, upset. They clung to the bottom of the canoe, which was drifting rapidly to leeward, for some time; and then struck out for the vessel. It so happened that all the ship's boats were away, and no assistance, except to throw over casks, boards &c, &c., could be rendered. But in consequence of the roughness of the sea, at the time, and a strong adverse current—or it may be they were taken by sharks—they were not able to reach the vessel, or gain the cask or boards. Their bodies have not been recovered.

To King Boyer, this is an afflicting dispensation, and we deeply sympathise with him. We hope, however, he has made sufficient advancement in civilization as to attribute the death of his son to its real cause; and not to the intervention of witch-craft, and be for sacrificing some poor wretches to such superstitious notion. The employer of his son, however, may expect a bill for a pretty round sum.

Grand Bassa County.—We are pleased to learn that the long contemplated expedition, gotten up by the enterprising citizens of Grand Bassa, to penetrate into the interior—to explore the country &c &c, is now nearly ready, and will set out in few days. We wish the party much success.

Sinoe County.—The bill, charging Nimney with the murder of Preston and Thomas—whose bodies were found in the Sinoe river a few months since—was ignored by the grand jury, at the late term of the cour of Com. P. and Q. Session in said county.

Cape Palmas.—No news of importance from the Cape since our last.

NAVAL.—Arrived Sept. 3rd; from Sinoe and Grand Bassa. L. G. schooner Lark, R. Cooper, Esqr. Commanding. The Lark, during her cruise to leeward, experienced heavy weather, lost an anchor; and suffered much damage in sails and rigging. The Lark sailed on the 12th, inst. for Cape Mount, Sugaree, Manna, and Gallinas. Passenger, General Lewis, who is Commissioned to close the negotiations for the purchase of the Gallinas territory—the political jurisdiction of which has already been ceded to this Government.

EDUCATION IN LIBERIA.

THE "TRUSTEES OF DONATIONS FOR EDUCATION IN LIBERIA" were encorporated by an Act of the Legislature of Massachusetts, approved March 16, 1850. Its members are, His Excellency George N. Briggs, President; the Hon. Stephen Fairbanks, Treasurer; the Hon. Simon Greenleaf, LL. D., Hon. William J. Hubbarb, Hon. Joel Giles, Hon. Albert Fearing, and Amos A. Lawrence, Esq. The Rev. Joseph Tracy, not a member of the Board, is Secretary.

The Trustees are authorized to "hold real and personal estate to the value of One Hundred Thousand Dollars, the income whereof shall be applied to the promotion of Collegiate Education in Liberia, by the establishment and support of one or more seminaries of learning, and also, if necessary, to the training of proper instructors for the same, at the discretion of the Trustees."

The necessity of such a movement as that now announced, is obvious. The Republic of Liberia is now a regularly organized, sovereign and independent State, acknowledged as such by most of the leading nations of the earth, and bound to perform all the duties, domestic and foreign, of such a state. Its population comprises only a few thousands of civilized colored people from the United States, and their descendants, whose means of education have been limited; with more than a hundred thousand native Africans, who have just learned to understand the advantages of civilization, and who have placed themselves under the jurisdiction of the Republic, in the hope of acquiring those advantages. A community founded so recently, and in such circumstances, must need pecuniary aid in establishing the necessary institutions of learning, civilization and religion; and the funds for that purpose can best be collected and managed in this country.

The Trustees design to give an education which shall qualify those who receive it for the study of the several learned professions, for the office of teachers and the various departments of public life, and for the scientific practice of the useful arts; differing from collegiate education in this country, only as the different circumstances of that country may be found to require.

It is intended to invest the funds in a safe and productive manner in this country, and to apply the income to the support of an institution in Liberia, to be chartered by the government there, with such instructers as may be approved by this Board.

Donations in aid of this enterprise are requested, and may be made to the Treasurer in Boston, either directly, or through any member of the Board,

By order of the Board of Trustees,

JOSEPH TRACY,

Secretary.

Boston, May 21, 1850.

Extracts from letters received by the Liberia Packet.

Washington June 26th 1850.

Sir.

By the Liberia Packet, about to sail from Baltimore, you will receive certain documents of great importance, in my opinion, relating to the mutual interests of your Republic and our Society.

I allude to the memorial of Joseph Bryan Esquire, and his associates, and the circular accompanying it. Next to the creation of your Republic, and the concession of the right of soil at our late convention, where your worthy commissioners were present, in New York, I regard the present proposition now before Congress. In truth, that proposition when first submitted to me, electorized, astonished, and finally delighted me, and the paramount question was, "can any thing like the proposition be carried out."

The memorial has been presented to the House of Representatives, and was referred to the Committee on naval affairs. It has been considered in the committee, and the Chairman has been instructed to draw up a report favorable to the proposition, for submission and correction by the committee. I have no doubt that a Bill of some complexion will be ordered to be reported. Whether any thing can be perfected during the present perplexing session, is very doubtful—but that we can eventually succeed in some degree commensurate with the vast importance of the subject, I do not permit myself to doubt.

You will readily perceive that there are divers subjects, questions, and relations soberly to be considered by both Republics. On the first point—the anxious and righteous desire is mutual, and we feel as if we were only responding to Liberia in her declaration that an extension of coast, sovereignty, and population will accomplish the great good contemplated—not by an overwhelming and unprovided for promiscuous flood—but by enlarging our means on this side the ocean, and the same careful and humane provision of subsistance and settlement, following out to the letter our mutual arrangements heretofore made.

On the second point—the United States, and the memorialists must agree, for every facility of communication thus procured for Liberia, would of course be satisfactory and pleasant. On the third point—sober financial questions, great and magnificent results, present themselves, for mutual, increasing and permanent benefits.

I pray that God may spare my life to see some such consumation of this great work to which, as you know, I have devoted days and nights for more than a quarter of a century.

Washington July 2nd: 1850

Dear Sir.

A number of capitalist, some of them Gentlemen from the south, have presented a memorial to Congress, asking for means to construct several large steam-ships, to run regularly from the United States to Liberia, and I am informed, that a Report will be made in favor of the project to the House of Representatives. Without any exact knowledge of all the details of this scheme, I should be pleased to see it adopted, as any great and earnest movement, on the part of the Federal Government, for colonization and civilzation of Africa, must lead on to important and beneficial results.

Since I began this letter I learn that the Naval Committee of the House have agreed to report in favor of a line of steamers to Liberia; that they recommend the construction of three such ships, and that they are to return from Africa by the way of Gibraltar and London. This report, it is confidently expected, will be adopted, and if so, it will give a new and mighty impulse to all your great interests.

The time is near at hand, I imagine, when a movement will be effectually made to induce the civilized nations of the world to make the Slave Trade Piracy, by universal law, and to unite all good men in all countries in generous endeavors for the civilzation of Africa. In the mean time as Providence may give you means, you will explore the interior, multiply and extend your negotiations with the interior Tribes, increase your agricultural and commercial resources, and add to the number and improve the character of your schools, and other civilized Institutions. When our colored population know the advantages which you are securing to yourselves, and the wide field of wealth and honor, of beneficence and renown which is opening before the citizens of Liberia, they will hasten in large numbers to become your associates in that greatest work ever assigned to any people; that of converting a region of slavey and barbarism into one of liberty, and civilization, and christianity.

Philadelphia June 26th 1850.

Dear Sir.

I was very much gratified to hear of the improvement of things in Liberia—building brick houses is certainly a great matter—and the energy and enterprise of your people not less so. This is certainly very encouraging to the friends of Liberia: for as one of the warmest friends of Liberia, and of the colored race, the only fears I have had for the success of the enterprise has been in the want of industry and energy of the people,—but with the right spirit, with a determination to succeed, with enterprise, and industry, and enlarged views on the subject of education, I believe that Liberia will be one of the most important nations of the world. I say Liberia, which is at present the starting point of civilization on the western coast of Africa;—but from present indications I believe that Liberia, as one of the States of the "United States of Liberia," or the United States of Africa, stretching from Sierra Leone or the Gambia at the north—including both—and taking in all the different European settlements and factories on the South and East to the Bight of Benin, will at no very distant day form a Republican Government, that will, I trust, in all that constitutes true glory, rival the United States of America—and that both nations either acting together, or in a generous rivalry of good works, be the means of civilizing and christianizing the world.

I often think of the wonderful spread of the English language, starting from the small island of Great Britain, having already spread over the whole contenent of North America, from New Brunswick to New Orleans, and now on the Pacific coast; spreading so rapidly over New Holland, New Zealand and other parts of Australia—spreading rapidly over India, Persia, and even into China—in Africa at Sierra Leone, Liberia, and the Cape of Good Hope; and also in the Mozambique channel, and in Eastern Africa;—through missionary influence in Syria and the isles of the Pacific Ocean,—and carrying with it christianity and civilization, and as it seems to me is to be the means of spreading both over the world.

Future Spread of the English Language.—In the London Examiner, of November 24th there is an article by Walter Savage Landor, in which he predicts that the United States will proceed in annexing foreign states and establishing in them the English language and laws, until the Union will embrace all fraternities and climates. Within two or more centuries, Rio de Janeiro and Valparaiso will be the richest of the cities in the forty United States, and will contend with each other which of the two speaks with most purity the Anglo-Saxon tongue. Germans, Polanders, and Hungarians, will sing their insurrectionary traditions in the same tongue, &c.

Varieties.

The Albany Knickerbocker says, the meanest thing a man can do is to get into your confidence, and then go and betray your secrets. Such a fellow would dig up the coffin of his mother, and sell her shroud for paper rags.

"I hope you will be able to support me," said a young lady to her intended while crossing a brook on rather slender poles, "Why yes" said the somewhat hesitating swain, "with a little assistance from your father."

No man has a right to do as he pleases except when he pleases to do right.

A COLORED PRIMA DONNA.—The Parisians are in ecstacies with the singing of a black woman, named Martinez, who is said to have been born in Havana. She is styled "the first chamber singer to her Catholic Majesty the Queen of Spain." In coming from Madrid to London, she has decided to sing at Paris.

She has, says a Paris paper, a magnificent soprano voice, whose notes vibrating and [illegible] high, soft and velvety in the medium, have low tones the masculine ring of the contralto. There is something very strange and savage in the extreme sounds, which have never been heard from our European throats. Madame Martinez prides herself on the guitar, which in her skilful hands, is completely transformed: the instrument is no longer grinding or monotonous, but as sweet and delicious as a harp. She plays flutes like boys; then, it lets fall a few passionate notes rolling like a drum."

This goes to corroborate the opinion we have long entertained—to wit: that the Christianization and civilization of Africa is necessary to the full development of our race, in many parts. An educated refined negro may excel [illegible] all other races in many traits where sentiment is more than pure intellect is concerned.—The New Orleans Presbyterian.

It has been decided by the General Court of Virginia, that the mere inability of a jury to agree was not such a necessity as warranted their discharge—and in a case before the court in which the jury, on a criminal trial, had been so discharged, the prisoner was ordered to be freed from custody.

A Pagan's Answer.—Euclid, the disciple of Socrates, having struck a robber, the brother cried out in a rage, "Let me die, if I am not avenged on you for your insolence to me!" Euclid replied, with a sweetness next to a Christian, "And let me die, if I do not soften you by my kindnesses, and make you love me as well as ever."

A shrewd farmer in the Vermont Legislature, declined answering a speech of a member, who was remarkable for nothing but his frothy and pugnacious impudence and conceit, thus—'Mr. Speaker, I can't reply to that 'are speech, for it always wrenches me terrible to kick nothing.'

"So here I am, between two tailors," cried a beau at a public table where a couple of young tailors were seated, who had just begun business for themselves.

The Committee of Thirty six met, pursuant to appointment January 21st 1850, in the Basement room of the First Colored Baptist Church

Rev. John Berry Meachum was appointed President,—N. D. Artist Secretary—

After Prayer, by the Chairman, Mr. James C. Walker inquired the object of the meeting; Wherefore the Chairman called on the Secretary to state the object for which they had met, who rose and stated, in substance, that having received from honorable citizens of the Republic of Liberia (Africa) by late arrivals of the Liberia Packet, three letters—ten or twelve news papers, and a copy of their National Flag, he believed it the duty of this meeting and of every free colored man in the west, to give an expression of kind feeling towards the Liberians for their bold struggles and stand for Liberty and Republican Independence.

Thirty six free colored citizens, already having signed the call—a number of the same having convened for the purpose of making arrangements for a Mass Meeting, in the city of Saint Louis.

On motion the list of the signers' names was read, and on a second motion, which was adopted that members present, give their opinion, as to the propriety of holding said mass meeting

The Rev. Israel Cole arose and made some very appropriate remarks, doing great honor to the Liberians and their national Independence.

On motion, it was resolved that an appropriate address and resolutions, expressive of the feelings of the free colored citizens of St. Louis be forwarded to the people of the Government of Liberia.

N. D. Artist and J. B. Meachum and J R Anderson were appointed a Sepecial Committee, to draw up the said address and Resolutions. It was also made the duty of the said special committee to find a place to hold our mass meeting in. After which, the meeting adjourned, in order to meet on Thursday, the 24th Inst, at 3 o'clock P. M. at the same place.

N. D Artist. Secy.

Tuesday, Janury, 24th. The Special Committee met pursuant to appointment. President in the Chair.

After preliminary remarks by members present, the following addesses and Resolutions were read and adopted.

Whereas the free colored citizens of St. Louis deeply sympathizing in the recent glorious struggles and trials of the Liberians, in establishing their Independence by the organization of a liberal Republican government, and imbued with profound feeling and gratification, at the successful consummation of their object, and extending, at the same time, the most sincere avowals of affection, and intense interest and regard for its full maintainance and for the greatest prosperity and happiness of its supporters;

Therefore, be it, unanimously, by us, in mass meeting assembled,—Resolved, that we believe that the people of Liberia, have been an instrument of Providence, in awaking to a sense of their moral degradation, the hitherto, abandoned Africans, and of planting among them the seed of religious liberty, and mental elevation.

Resolved—That we believe that religion and education are the only sure foundation on which to establish a free and independent government, and that to such a foundation, do we ascribe the present tranquil condition, and greatness of prospects of prosperity of the Republic of Liberia.

Resolved—That we believe that its successful maintainance depends on the virtue and integrity of its citizens; that it is the duty of every philanthropist and friend of humanity, to aid in the extension of those noble principles; in the regeneration of others, less kindly blessed, in order that they may arrive at the end designed them, by their Creator.

Resolved,—That the hand of fellowship and union is extended by us, to the citizens of Liberia, hoping that they may continue perpetual in their independence.

Address of the free colored citizens of St. Louis, State of Missouri, in mass meeting assembled, to the citizens of Liberia.

Friends and Kinsmen,

As brothers we greet you with admiration and love; and hope that this feeble and humble offering may prove acceptable, as well as instrumental in encouraging and urging you onward in the bright and holy path, in which you have already made such glorious progress. It is with amazement, that we behold, springing up, from the deepest obscurity and weakness, a Government, instituted and sustained by our beloved and revered kinsmen; based upon the purest Republican principles.

We have reason to hope and believe, that the brilliant day has arisen, which will release from the chains of superstition and ignorance, the whole of our long suffering race. Liberia sits, enveloped in the radient beams of glory, on the mountain of Liberty and Happiness She is the great instrument prepared by the overruling providence of God to deliver from bondage and misery, the whole African race

Joseph Jenkins Roberts, the first President of the African Republic,—like the great Washington of America, became an instrument in the hands of the almighty of solving the problem of self rule, and of proving the efficacy and practicability of a democratic form of government. Whatever may be the peculiar prejudices and opinion of our people elsewhere, with regard to such government, we, in this assembly, soundly approve and encourage your course, express our warmest hopes for your continued prosperity, and view with the greatest delight, your elevation to civil and religions liberty. We hazzard but little, in saying that if we were conversant with the thoughts of all; this would be their unanimous expression.

Your treaty with England lies before us, and we look to an early day, when America will follow the example of her illustrious predecessor, in the recognition of your country's Independence.

That great, and noble statesman, Henry Clay, has presented a memorial, numerously signed, to the Thirty first congress of the United States in order to gain this object. With profound admiration, respect and love, we view that glorious "Lone Star" whose—

" Ray
Brings open day
To her sons afar"

The lovely banner, on which it is inscribed, is now gallantly unfurled in our midst, we receive it with joy, for it is the harbinger of liberty, of independence and greatness.

Oh! long may it wave "o'er the land of the free, and the home of the brave." Consider this as a legacy bequeathed to you, by your brethren in a foreign land as a guarantee of their affection and sincere wishes for your happiness and the maintainance of your independence, to inspire and support you, in whatever trials and inconveniences you may be subjected to; and to be transmitted to your children as a bond of fidelity and patriotism; and that succeeding generations may know, that the glory of God shall cover the earth, as the waters cover the great deep.

Whereas the present missionary operations within the Republic of Liberia, are supplied and conducted, entirely by foreign missionary societies and consequently, not under the control of the citizens of the Republic,

1. Therefore, be it Resolved that the free people of color of the city of St. Louis, petition the citizens of Liberia to constitute home missionary societies among themselves, for the purpose of educating and evangelizing the native tribes within the Republic of Liberia, in order that the free colored people in that city, and throughout the Union, may have an opportunity of co-operating with them, in spreading the blessings of education, civilization and religion among that dark and benighted people.

2 Resolved,—That the friends of Liberia, in this meeting assembled, return our thanks to the city authorities for protecting us, at our Liberia Mass Meeting, on Monday the 11th inst.

3 Resolved,—That we tender our thanks to Elder Samuel S Ball, Dr. S. E. M. Goheen and others, who have manfully advocated the principles of Liberian independence, at our mass meeting of the 11th, and 17th February, 1850

4 Resolved,—That we return our thanks to the Rev. A. Lyon, Messrs J. H. Alexander, Charles C. Carroll Esqrs, Geo. F. Roots, Dr. Mc Pheeters, the Pastor, Trustees and members of this Church, for kindly granting us their church, to hold our Saint Louis, Missouri, June 21st, 1850.

Messers Jno. H. PAXTON,
Jno. N. Lewis, and
H. TEAGE.

Gentlemen and friends, we ask this favored privilege, to address you, and through you the President and his Cabinet, on the all important subject of encouraging and establishing, a Liberia, a Western or Missouri Colony, and before going further we beg to acknowledge the receipt of fourteen news-papers three letters, and your National Flag, all came safely to hand, in good order.

We hope you will pardon the liberty of strangers; we are strangers, but of the same blood, kinsmen of the same destiny, and alike in every interest. We wish you, gentlemen, to present the whole subject of our plan, (which is hereto appended,) to the President and the people generally, for without aid and attention from the President, and people of the Republic of Liberia, we can do nothing.

What we have already done has been accomplished against the greatest opposition, and that opposition coming from our own people here. But if the Liberians, will but say yes, to our movement, we think that there is no doubt, but that we will accomplish our great object.

We hope then that our project of addressing your President and his cabinet, on this occasion may be well and fully understood by every Liberian, and that they may respond, and speak out, in such manner as will effectually destroy the prejudices of every colored person who is opposed to the growth and prosperity of your glorious Republic.

Much depends on the answer we get to these requests. We wish you to examine all the newspapers we send you, for in them you may see what they think of our Missouri Colony. As regards a colony of free and enlighted people of color from the western part of the U. S. A. we will push the matter forward, and accomplish the settlement of it if possible. Our people, here, can be persuaded to love Liberia. But will always hate the old scheme of colonization, therefore, it must be admitted by all, that some independent measure must be put on foot, by the people of Liberia with the colored residents of America. Our plan is intended to obviate all difficulties, and completely win over many thousands of the most intelligent and influential of our people in favor of emigrating independently, to the Republic of Liberia.

It was the intention of the authors to have requested, our plan, with the proceedings of our Mass Meeting, &c., to be published, first, in the Liberia news-papers, to obtain a large number of them and send them to friend and foe, or to whoever took an interest in the cause.—If it is possible to forward four hundred copies of both; the Luminary and Herald containing any of our doings, it would greatly advance the cause. If that number cannot be sent, we will be thankful for as many as can be spared. The Liberia Flag, and news-papers sent by Mr. Paxton and letters from him, C. L. Hicks and Gen. Lewis, have done more good than all the colonization lectures that have ever been delivered in St. Louis. Many things of African growth and production, such as, coffee, rice, sweet-potatoes, African oils, and African wood, minerals; shells, ivory and various curiosities, could be used to excite and arouse the people in favor of the interests of Liberia, if we could possibly obtain them. The constitution and laws of Liberia, are totally unknown to all of us here; none of us having seen the constitution of Liberia.

If it were possible, money would be sent, to purchase four hundred Liberian news-papers, the constitution and specimens of African productions and curiosities; but there are obstacles in the way which prevents us from doing so at this time. However if you can send some or all the above things, the writer will see that the whole amount of cost shall be sent, in clear cash.

In conclusion I will say to you all, we are the uncompromising friends of Liberia; and whatever advances the interests of her people, except and secures our highest ambition and love. If (dear) our plan can receive your approval, you will please induce every person possible to sign it, and send to our address, with the opinion and sentiments of the President and his cabinet and other influential gentlemen of your country.

It is desirable, that we should ascertain the actual cost of clearing one acre of ground and building one house; also on what terms land can be obtained, how much per acre, and how many acres to each male adult. A map or chart of the country is greatly desired.

Relying firmly on your wisdom and patriotism, we submit our cause, for your consideration and approval.

Very Respectfully Your obt. servts.

PLAN

To the President, officers and members of the Missouri, State Colonization Society.

Gentlemen and friends,—your servants, and friends to the cause of Liberian Independence, and the independent emigration of the free people of color to the Liberia Republic, ask leave through this medium to communicate and submit for your consideration, approval and endorsement a plan for the establishment of a Missouri colony, of free and enlightened people of color, under the government of Liberia. As we deem an apology on this occasion unnecesary, the proposed plan is respectfully submitted as follows, to wit

1st. To Colonize three hundred families

A Constituted Board of Directors should be formed, and properly organized of Twelve colored men, who shall have full power and control over all and every thing belonging to, or in any way connected with the interests of the colony, or emigrating companies.

2nd To raise money and other necessaries, agents appointed by the Board, should be sent through the States of Illinois, Missouri, Iowa and Wisconsin, for the purpose of soliciting yearly subscribers, collecting money and other donations beneficial to the emigrating companies: The said agents to report every two weeks.

3rd. Twenty five families to emigrate every Six months and so on for Six Years, from the time the first company starts.

4th. A Ship to be purchased or chartered for the purpose and use of the emigrants, and each emigrating family, to receive one hundred and seventy five dollars, as a reserve sum of money, provision, equipments and passage all free.

5th Nine acres of land to be cleared and put under cultivation, with the general products of Liberia for the use of each and every company, so emigrating.

6th. Each and every family-of-say from three to five persons or more shall have a house built, and prepared for their reception in the colony.

7th. The constituted Board, to remain, undissolved for Eight years, or as long as is necessary to establish and settle the affairs of the colony.

COMMUNICATION.

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr. Herald.

Only a few weeks have elapsed since I referred to the reports circulated in England charging the government and people of Liberia with placing "unnecessary restrictions upon British commerce;—that the laws of Liberia instead of encouraging the intercourse of British merchants are calculated to have a contrary effect." I denied then as I do now, that such restrictions and laws existed in Liberia to the prejudice of British merchants, or the merchants of any other country. I admitted that there are revenue and navigation laws in Liberia, and that those laws compel all persons coming within their operation to submit to its provisions; and I can see no reason why the government of Liberia are not entitled to the same privileges as the government of other countries. Ask those two British traders who are now violating our revenue laws if they could carry on the same game on the coasts of England—their answer if truly given, will be in the negative. Why then do they violate the laws of Liberia? Is it because they think that the sincere friendship which the people of Liberia entertain for the government and people of England will shield them from the punishment which their reckless conduct so richly merits? It is high time that our government had called them to account—our people are loudly demanding that the laws should be enforced on foreigners in the same manner as they have to bear them.

Mr. Editor. I did propose to enter into a calculation as to the advantages the honest trader has over the unprincipled or smuggler; but I have nearly filled my sheet; but will take another occasion to do so. I will however, state what has come under my own observation since April last, two German brigs and two English vessels a barque and a brig—all of large size have been filled with oil; and their trade have been carried on under our laws—their owners complain of no "unnecessary restriction" on their commerce, but are making arrangements to extend their business very extensively. It would be gratifying to learn if the two unprincipled traders have in the same time accomplished as much as the honest merchants. Liberians can give a satisfactory answer, and it would be well if the owners of those lawless men will consider seriously if they are benefited by the operations of their servants in their illegal traffic on our coast.

Yours.

CITIZEN.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, OCTOBER 2nd, 1850.

We publish below, an extract of a letter received by a commercial firm in this city, from Mr. Francis Bowers of Baltimore, Md. U. S. A.—The letter is of a business nature, and not intended for publication, but, it was thought advisable to publish the extract here given, in this impression, as it shows the state of feeling in Baltimore, now subsisting towards Liberia. Of course; we will know how to appreciate, the highly flattering remarks concerning the periodicals of Monrovia, which the gentleman gives in his letter. We are disposed to believe the extract a conscientious statement of the writer's feeling on the subject; and we are fully corroborated in the opinion, we have so long entertained of the colored people of the United States,—that, they were so blinded by ignorance, and the supertranscendental nonsense of the ultra-abolitionist mania, that, notwithstanding, they have been told repeatedly of the perplexing labyrinth they were running so heedlessly into; that the good promised them by their sinister-disposed leaders, they could never realize; and that Liberia was the only place under heaven's wide canopy where perfect freedom was accessible:—yet, regardless of all this, and against the evidence of their own senses, they blindly and madly continued in their course, ti l, now quagged, and bespattered in the slough of despondency, they begin to turn their attention towards their only home The course they have pursued, reminds one very much of the anecdote of the man and the poker. He said he would have a hold on the poker, though it be on the red hot end: so he seized the end inflamed with heat and became so badly burnt that ever afterwards he disliked even to hear of the poker. So, with those who have followed their deceiving guides, in search of equality in the U. S., they seized the wrong end for liberty, (the ultra abolitionist end, being the red hot end.) until becoming burnt and blistered thereby, they now begin to abandon their quasifriends, and coming to Liberia, they, dislike to hear of the poker by which they have suffered pain confusion and contempt. We are glad to see them shaking off the garment of wild fanaticism, and political delusion, and acting the part of wise men—of sober-minded enquirers after truth!

We therefore say to all our colored friends, in the United States, in reference to the following extract —"Go thou and do likewise!"

D. T. H.

"Baltimore July 2nd 1850."

Dear Sirs;

"It is with pleasure that I take pen in hand to write you a few lines. Notwithstanding deep waters between us roll, I recognize you, and all Liberians, to be my brethren. I had the pleasure of obtaining some of your papers per Liberia Packet, and myself with many others, have read them with great satisfaction, and we consider them for beauty and sublimity, equal to any, and surpassed by none. Since reading Africa's Luminary, many who were opposed to Liberia, have become favorable thereto, —and among them, is myself. I, with the rest of the ignorant part of the community, have been bitterly opposed to Liberia, but we now begin to see our error, and believe that Liberia is our home. We have been so full of incredulity, that many of us would not believe the reports, nor the voice of men we have seen, who doubtless gave us true statements concerning Liberia and Africa. But since reading that heart cheering paper—"Africa's Luminary,"—with the President's Message to the people, it has ravished our hearts: and suffice it to say,—good luck and prosperity to the Republic of Liberia."

Yours &c.

To Messrs. * * * FRANCIS BOWERS.
Monrovia Liberia

Are not all those institutions which have for their object the improvement of the mind,—beneficial? Are not literary institutions fraught with consequences of lasting importance to community? If so, what excuse can we have for discontinuing such institutions? We presume there can be no excuse, other than a want of energy to conduct, or a want of mental acumen, to appreciate their import.

We believe that well regulated, and properly conducted, literary societies, have a tendency to good: they exert an enlightening influence upon the community in an equal ratio with the amount of intellect, of which they are composed. If they produce from minds, of which they are constituted dissertations, essays, and treatises on moral, political, social, or scientific subjects;—some persons thereby may be informed, and the entire community (if they will spare time sufficient, to read such productions,) will have their pure minds stirred up by way of remembrance.

We allude not to the general process of pseudo—literary incubation, which has of late obtained among us; a determination to hatch something to be seen, though it be a monster, or an object ludicrously contemptible:—no, we mean not this emulation to give existence, for such productions, with their authors earn or themselves an early oblivious consignment: but, we refer to that exertion of intelligent, well-informed minds, which brings forth such material, as is calculated to become useful aliment to the community, that the mass may feed thereon, and grow in general intelligence—in mental power. The world, has produced many such, and Liberia only a few: But she may and ought to produce more. She has minds, and master-minds: why suffer them to remain inactive? Let those who we know can, be engaged and, give us something to regale our mental appetites, that we may no longer be forced to eat what is musty and long-standing, but have what we would eat as dessert. W want no maimed and crippled efforts upon scientific subjects, that we know just nothing about; but give something practical—something of general importance. If the waste paper of well written documents and papers, would form a mountain, it is certain, that, if the manuscripts of crippled hobgoblin effort; and abortive attempts, at literary distinction—were thrown upon it, it would be like piling the mountains of the moon, upon Grand Cape Mount. A visit to an editor's room, would give some information upon the subject.

As we like to be practical, we will apply the foregoing. Where are those institutions that once flourished among us, seeming to rival the fame of Aristotle's sequestered grove? Where are those whose proud names were "Liberia Lyceum" and "Young Men's Lyceum!" Are they numbered with the things that were! Have they become scrips of history, or are they drowned in the sea of forgetfulness? They purported to be useful; and would have been (were they not?) had they been properly attended to. We know that the best institutions cannot prosper, unless duly appreciated: they cannot move along with any degree of success, if they are encumbered with a body of death; the feces of society, and obesity of ignorance, will enervate, and paralyze the energies, and finally sap the existence of any literary institution. We do not attribute the suspension (and if dead, the death) of those Lyceums to any of the causes mentioned;—but there must, upon principles of sound philosophy, be some cause. The fame and prosperity they have had, should, by reflection, serve as an impulse to awaken them to renewed actions. "The Liberia Lyceum," has been identified with the history of the country for years; she was a powerful auxiliary, (some say, she was the primum mobile) in bringing about the change in our political affairs, by bringing the subject before the community, and discussing and deciding upon it affirmatively. Then, we ask, are you satisfied with what you have done, and determine that you will do no more!

D. T. H.

Another opportunity will offer itself on the first Tuesday in next month for freemen to exercise their constitutional right, and discriminating judgment, in the choice of a Senator to fill the place of Hon. H. Teage, resigned. It is necessary at all times, when selecting men for offices particularly for legislative offices, to have an eye to worth, and not with a fawning sycophantic favoriteness, place such persons in authority that will prove as sores in the body politic, by wielding an influence deleterious to our public interests. The time has arrived for Liberians to evince a sound judgment at the ballot box;—our public domain is increasing, our population is enlarging, conflicting interests and opinions are arising, our foreign relations are more extensive, and men are wanting.

We therefore call upon voters, to be awake to their interest, and not only now, but at all times, give us a good legislature, composed of such men as are acquainted with the wants of their constituents, and their country. Let your legislature be truly your representatives, not in name, but in fact, in reality! We judge the intelligence, worth, and practical sense of a people, by the intelligence, worth and practical sense of their representatives. Then let all anomalies in this matter for ever cease to exist, —let not this department be filled with the weakest, feeblest, and lamest material to be found in the whole length and breadth of the land. And as to the present emergency, we look to the lovers of their country, to meet it promptly, and wisely, that they may not have hereafter to regret, the action they may now take.

☞ Correction.—We correct with pleasure an error, to which our attention has been called, in the list of passengers, by the Liberia Packet; published in our last.

Rev. Dr. Wood and Lady are from England, and not "from New Brunswick" as we stated. Dr. Wood was born in St. Mary's, London, and left Liverpool for the United States via. New Brunswick in 1848, at which latter place he remained only a short time.

The U. S. brig Perry, Lieut Commanding Foote, is still in the Bights. A few weeks ago, off Loango, she captured a large American barque fitted for 1000 slaves. The Perry was lying quietly at anchor, pretty close in shore, without any national insignia flying, and the master of the slaver, supposing her to be an English cruiser, ran boldly down with the American Flag, floating gracefully on the breeze,—nor did he find out his fatal error until a boat from the Perry was along side his ship, and the boarding officer, looking up, discovered to the astonished scoundrel the absence of the English Crown on the cap, and that the officer was verily an American. With all haste the fellow doused the United States Flag and run up the Brazilian—turning to the officer, and audaciously enquiring—"Do you know sir, that this is Brazilian property." But the fellow reckoned without his host. He could produce no papers to sustain her Brazilian character—so she was marched off to the United States.

POETRY.

LIBERTY.

As when on Carmel's sterile steep
The ancient prophet bowed the knee,
And seven times sent his servant forth,
To look toward the distant sea.

There came, at last, a little cloud,
Scarce broader than the human hand,
Spreading and swelling, till it broke
In showers on all the herbless land.

And hearts were glad, and shouts went up,
And praise to Israel's mighty God.
As the sear hills grew green again,
And verdure clothed the naked sod.

Even so our eyes have waited long:
But now a little cloud appears,
Spreading and swelling as it glides
Onward into the coming years.

Bright cloud of liberty! full soon,
Far stretching from the ocean strand,
Thy glorious folds shall spread abroad,
Encircling our beloved land.

Like that sweet rain on Judah's hills,
The glorious boon of love shall fall,
And our bond millions shall arise.
As at an angel's trumpet call.

Then shall a shout of joy go up—
The wild glad cry of freedom come,
From hearts long crushed by cruel hands,
And songs from lips long sealed and dumb—

And every bondman's chain be broke,
And every soul that moves abroad
In this wide re lm, shall know and feel
The blessed liberty of God!

A HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

BY LONGFELLOW.

Who peopled all the city streets,
A hundred years ago?
Who filled the churches with faces meek,
A hundred years ago?
The sneering tale
Of sister frail,
The plot that worked
A brother's hurt:—
Where, O, where are plot, and sneers,
The poor man's hopes, the rich man's fears,
That lived so long ago?
Where are the graves where dead men slept,
A hundred years ago?
Who, when they were living, wept
A hundred years ago?
By other men,
That knew not them,
Their lands are tilled.
Their graves are filled;—
Yet nature then was just as gay,
And bright the sun shone as to-day,
A hundred years ago.

PATRICK HENRY.

It appears that soon after Henry's noted case of "Tobacco and the Preserves," as it was sometimes called, he heard of a case of oppression conscience sake. The English church, having been established by law, in Virginia, became as all such establishments are wont to do, exceedingly intolerant towards other sects. In prosecution of this system of conversion, three Baptist clergymen had been indicted, at Fredericksburg, for preaching the gospel of the Son of God contrary to the statute. Henry hearing of this, rode some fifty miles to volunteer his services in defence of the oppressed. He entered the court, being unknown to all present save the bench and the bar, while the indictment was being read by the clerk. He sat within the bar, until the reading was finished, and the King's attorney had concluded some remarks in defence of the prosecution, when he rose, reached out his hand for the paper, and, without more ceremony, proceed with the following speech:

"May it please your worships: I think I heard read by the prosecutor, as I entered this house, the paper I now hold in my hand. If I have rightly understood, the King's attorney of the colony has framed an indictment for the purpose of arraigning and punishing by imprisonment, three inoffensive persons before the bar of this court, for a crime of great magnitude—as, disturbers of the peace. May it please the court, what did I hear read! Did I hear it distinctly, or was it a mistake of my own! Did I hear an expression, as if a crime, that these men, whom your worships are about to try for misdemeanor, are charged with—what!" and, continuing in a low, solemn, heavy tone, "preaching the gospel of the Son of God!" Pausing amidst the most profound silence and breathless astonishment, he slowly waved the paper three times around his head, when, lifting his hands and eyes to heaven, with peculiar and impressive energy, he exclaimed: "Great God!" The exclamation—the burst of feeling from the audience—were all overpowering. Mr. Henry resumed:

"May it please your worships: in a day like this—when truth is about to burst her fetters—when mankind are about to be aroused to claim their natural and inalienable rights—when the yoke of oppression, that has reached the wilderness of America, and the unnatural alliance of ecclesiastical and civil power, are about to be dissevered—at such a period, when liberty—liberty of conscience—is about to awake from her slumberings, and inquire into the reason of such charges as I find exhibited here to-day in this indictment!" Another fearful pause; while the speaker alternately cast his sharp piercing eyes on the court and the prisoners, and resumed: "If I am not deceived, according to the contents of the paper I now hold in my hand, these men are accused of preaching the gospel of the Son of God! Great God!" Another long pause, while he again waved the indictment around his head—while a deeper impression was made on the auditory. Resuming his speech: "May it please your worships: there are periods in the history of man, when corruption and depravity have so long debased the human character, that man sinks under the weight of the oppressor's hand—becomes his servile, his abject slave; he licks the hand that smites him; he bows in passive obedience to the mandates of the despot; and, in this state of servility, he receives his fetters of perpetual bondage. But, may it please your worships, such a day has passed away! From that period when our fathers left the land of their nativity for settlement in these American wilds—for liberty—for civil and religious liberty—for liberty of conscience to worship their Creator according to their own conceptions of Heaven's revealed will—from the moment they placed their feet upon the American continent, and in the deeply imbedded forests, sought an asylum from persecution and tyranny,—from that moment, despotism was crushed—the fetters of darkness were broken, and Heaven decreed that man should be free—free to worship God according to the Bible. Were it not for this, in vain were all their sufferings and bloodshed to subjugate this New World, if we, their offspring, must still be oppressed and persecuted. But, may it please your worships, permit me to inquire once more, for what are these men about to be tried? This paper says, for preaching the gospel of the Saviour to Adam's fallen race." And, in tones of thunder, he exclaimed: "What law have they violated?" While the third time, in a low, dignified manner, he lifted his eyes to heaven and waved the indictment around his head. The court and audience were now wrought up to the most intense pitch of excitement. The face of the prosecuting attorney was pallid and ghastly, and he appeared unconscious that his whole frame was agitated with alarm; while the judge, in a tremulous voice, put an end to the scene, now becoming excessively painful, by the authoritative declaration, "sheriff, discharge those men.

YANKEE DOODLE.—A late number of the Knickerbocker contains some amusing adventures of Yankee Doodle. The following is a pretty fair illustration of the adventurous and wandering character of the hardy sons of New England. Speaking of the wonderful ubiquity of the true Yankee, the writer says:

"It is harder than a Chinese puzzle to put your finger on a bit of territory, disputed or undisputed, where the Yankee Doodle is not. If you go to Land's End, he is there; to Mount Ararat, he is there; to Chimborazo, Himalaya, the Mountain of the Moon, or the Pyramid of Cheops, he is there, any where, in fine, where an ark, a dove, a camel; a snake can arrive, by their several faculties; bartering, and scratching his name on trees, stones, and African slaves. He knows the whole map of the ancient dominions of Prester John, and every nook and corner of Mozambique, and he is hand-and glove with all the savages in the world. He has been to Ichaboe until he has scraped it perfectly clean; and if your English trader has discovered a new bank of Guano, and is getting ready to fire a gun or two and take possession of it in the name of her Majesty, imagine his concerment to discover a dozen of these fellows twenty feet deep in a guano cavern, scooping it out with their fingers, and a Bangor schooner bouncing up and down in a little cove like a duck among bulrushes. Now, if you walk on the seashore at Bildaraxa, you will find that you are not the first there, perhaps to your great sorrow, as Captain Jix swore violently, when, in walking through the streets of Rundown, at the very limits of the dominions of Prince Pompadello, in Africa, he heard a sharp whistler going through the tune of "Yankee Doodle," with an easy execution, and a devlish unconcern, which threw him at once into a coast fever. And just so it was with the poor soul who discovered Bimpaz, and was just uncorking a bottle of Madeira in commemoration of the event, when he saw a Yankee on a hillside administering the cold-water-pledge to three natives."

PROF. STUART'S VIEW OF SLAVERY.

In his "critical history and defence of the Old Testament," Prof. Stuart makes the following remarks on Slavery as connected with the Jewish and Christian dispensations.

We cannot reason, I allow, in all cases with entire certainty, as to what is allowable under the Gospel, because it was allowed under the old dispensation. Polygamy was allowable; and if concubinage was not, it, was generally practised, and does seem to have been regarded as not forbidden, but only regulated. Slavery was allowed. Great latitude of divorce, at the will of the husband (but not of the wife) was allowed. Does the Gospel allow any of these? I know that some serious and well-meaning men are disposed to argue, that the Gospel allows of slavery. It is my opinion also, that where it has become a part of the constitution of any society of men, the Gospel does not require the whole system to be broken up and abandoned in a single day; for this might endanger the welfare of the whole. But I can never entertain a doubt, that the precepts and principles of the Gospel forbid the making of slaves. When it is required of us, that we should love our neighbor as ourselves; and in explanation of this it is also required that we should do to others whatever we would that others should do to us; and when, with all this, it is expressly declared that God has made of ONE BLOOD all the nations that dwell on the face of the earth; I understand this as settling all questions respecting any slavery, which is not the result of crime or a forfeiture of liberty by evil doing, or of voluntary compact on the part of the slave.

ENGLAND.

Seizure of British Subjects at Charleston S. C.

In the House of Commons, on the 29th of April, Mr. Cockburn asked the noble Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in reference to the case of the steward of the British bark Mary Anne, who had been seized and imprisoned by the authorities of Charleston, S. C., for no specified offence, but that he was a man of color, whether the noble lord had used any endeavors with the government of the United States to prevent British subjects from having their liberty invaded, and persons incarcerated, by so scandalous a violation of the principles that should regulate the intercourse of civilized nation?

Lord Palmerston regretted that the subject to which the honorable and learned member had drawn the attention of the House was by no means new to the Government. It was a fact that there existed a law in Carolina and Louisiana by which free men of color, whether foreigners or citizens or some other State of the Union, were subject to imprisonment, with a view to their ultimate removal from the territories of these States. It was unnecessary for him to express the opinion which every member who heard him must entertain with respect to such a law In 1847 her Majesty's Government caused a note to be presented to the Government of the United States, remonstrating against the law as not only inconsistent with the established polity of nations, but at variance with a portion of the first articles of the treaty of 1815 between Great Britain and the United States, under which all subjects and citizens of the two countries were to be permitted reely to enter; freely to reside in and freely to quit the territories of each. To this note, Mr. Buchanan, then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of the effect that the Federal Government had no power to induce the legislature of the State of Carolina to revoke the law; and that, if the British Government insisted on its right, the Government of the United States would find the question so impssible to deal with that it would be obliged, however reluctantly, to take advantage of the stipulation contained in the treaty of 1827, and put an end to the treaty of 1815, upon giving twelve months notice. It did not appear to her Majesty's Government that any commensurate advantage would, under the circumstances, result from further pressing the matter.

SLAVE PROPERTY—We observe that it is going the rounds of the newspapers, that there are fifteen hundred millions of dollars worth of slave property in the fifteen slave states of this Union This we do not believe; allowing three million slaves, this estimate would be five hundred dollars a head for old men, old women, and children, lame, halt, blind, &c, as well as the young and middle aged men and women. This estimate is to high, Two or three hundred each at most, would be nearer the value of all sorts, sizes, &c considered, which would make the market value frem six to $900,000,000 only: but the real value is less than nothing: the slaveholders are eaten up by them; they must keep them, find and clothe them, and pay the doctors bills, winter and summer, whether they have work for them or not indeed in most cases it would be far cheaper to hire their labor. And again, not only the slaveholders, but the country is impoverished by the foot-print of the slave. Slavery is a loss and a curse both to master and slave, but more particularly to poor whites residing in the slave states.—Wilmington (Del.) Chicken.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

GENTLEMEN of the SENATE

And HOUSE of REPRESENTATIVES:—

It is with the greatest pleasure that I again meet you in this new Session of the Legislature. The great purposes for which you have assembled, are first, for the redress of public grievances, and secondly, for making such laws as the general good may require,—Therefore the labors in which you are about to engage are of the most important nature, and lie at the very foundation of the future welfare and happiness of the people of this Republic.

In the various and constantly changing avocations of an industrious and intelligent people, it may often become expedient, either to make new laws, or modify or repeal old ones—and for this the constant recurrence of our elections provides, by bringing from all parts of the Republic, legislators, who have learned from the people themselves, the practical operations of old laws, and the necessity of enacting new ones.

You, gentlemen, have come thus immediately from the people, and if you consider their demands, and consult their interests, as you doubtless do, with the blessings of Divine Providence—without which no undertaking can prosper—you have little cause to fear either for your own honor or the prosperity of the government.

By our inestimable charter, in you are vested the conservation of the rights and interests of the whole people of this Republic. Whatever alteration in the laws the urgency of affairs, or the authority of the people can be conceived to justify, or render expedient—that authority is fully delegated to you: and your constituents look to you, as entrusted with their most sacred rights. I have every confidence that in general, they will cheerfully be governed by whatever your wisdom may ordain. And your zeal for the good of your fellow citizens, and your knowledge and experience in the affairs of the government, inspire, in me, the belief that your present meeting will be productive of lasting benefit to the whole people of our infant state.

According to the concise and comprehensive language of the constitution, it is incumbent on the Executive "to inform the Legislature, from time to time, of the condition of the Republic, and recommend any public measures for their adoption, which he may think expedient." But before I proceed directly to the discharge of this duty, permit me, gentlemen, to remark, that every revolving year brings with it new and just occasions for our mutual congratulations and thankfulness to that benificient Being who, in his goodness continues to favor us as a people, with such distiguished mercies,—these should create in us devout feelings of gratitude and praise.

It affords me unspeakable satisfaction to be able to inform you that during the past year, our beloved country has been greatly favored and blessed. An unusual degree of health has been dispensed to its inhabitants;—in no previous year has greater attention been paid to agriculture; and the earth has rewarded the labors of the husbandman with abundant harvests;—the commercial operations of our merchants have been greatly extended. Indeed, the progress of general improvement, throughout the Republic, was never more encouraging than at the present time. Nothing of a very serious character has occurred to disturb the harmony of our citizens at home; or the friendly relations subsisting between this government and foreign powers, or the native tribes around us.

In the midst of these blesseings, however, the government have not been altogether exempted from perplexing difficulties and embarrassments.

Some of the circumstances connected with these difficulties and embarrassments I shall recur to hereafter.

I would remark here however, that we have no just reason to expect that our progress in national prosperity is to be uninterrupted by the evils incident to all governments. Nay, such evils are often wholesome and produce good results. The waters that stagnate, you know, corrupt. The storm that works the ocean, sometimes into a rage, renders it salutary. The rose is not without the thorn. Heaven has given us nothing unmixed.

Difficulties and embarrassments, in public affairs, frequently call forth great virtues and efforts, which would otherwise sleep in the gentle bosom of ease and quietness. They open resources which would be concealed under the inactivity of tranquil times. They arouse and enlighten the citizens. They produce a people of animation, energy, adventure, and greatness. If we consult history we shall find this to have been the case in all ages. Did not the Grecian republics prosper even amid continual warfare! Their prosperity, their power, their splendor grew from the all-animating spirit of war.—Did not the cottages of shepherds rise into imperial Rome, the the nursery of heroes—through the invigorating operation of unceasing wars? Trace back, if you please, the history of the United States of America, and see how those states flourished and grew strong under the difficulties which surrounded, and more than once threatened the annihilation of some of them. But these very difficulties produced an exceedingly enterprising people; and hardy legions that have subsequently proved themselves equal to any emergency.

I do not wish to be understood, gentlemen, as desiring war—I pray God to deliver us, for ever, from such calamity—or difficulties or embarrassments of any kind, to incite the citizens of Liberia to greater exertion, and to call forth their latent talents and energy. There are some among us, I know, who tremble at every occurrence that in any degree threatens to interrupt the even course of our political affairs. They fear that it may put an inevitable stop to the further progress of the government, and ruin irretrievably our furture happiness, and deprive us of those civil and religious blessings which the early veterans in the cause of freedom here, and ourselves have called forth from this once savage land. We may commend the anxiety of such men, however, without praising their judgment. It is true patriotism, boldly to front every difficulty;—and with a determined purpose overcome every obstacle which may oppose our progress; then we shall defend our natural and national rights, with dignity and success. With a firm trust in the Great Governor of the universe, and right on our side we have nothing to fear.

Gentlemen, with all our quick perception of the existence of public evils, to which many years enjoyment of prosperity, and freedom has made us peculiarly sensitive, it is not easy, in a survey of the condition of the Republic, to point to any thing which justly calls for the exercise of the first of your prescribed duties; nothing, certainly, which in any other age or country would be regarded as a "public grievance."

Imperfections in our system of government and in its operation undoubtedly exist, as well as in every other work of human hands: but its guiding and fundamental principles of freedom, justice, and equality, are unchangeably right and true, and are firmly established, not only in our written codes, but in the universal consent and affections of the people. We can have no further controversy as to the great objects and aim of political organization, or the source of its power. The sovereignty of the people is with us, a familiar, practical truth; and the happiness of the people, the only legitimate end of all civil governments.

Their unlimite and unquestioned power, prompted by an ever active spirit of inquiry and reform; and directed in its exercise by an enlightened perception of their true interest, will be sure to interpose a remedy for public wrongs before they become gross or intolerable.

In a government like ours, peculiarly situated as we are, the necessity and demand for new laws will probably never cease. The advancing tide of civilization and improvement with its attendant complications of interests, and the changes of opinion which result from the lapse of time and the light of experience, will constantly require modification and amendments of our laws to meet the varying exigencies of our condition.

There rests, therefore, upon us the obligation to see that legislation is kept in practical and harmonious conformity with the broad principles of freedom upon which are based our much cherished institutions.

Gentlemen, I have the honor to inform you that since your last meeting the territorial limits of the government have been considerably extended. On the north-west—excepting about ten miles of sea coast—the political jurisdiction of the Republic extends to the entrance of the River She Bar. This jurisdiction—comprehending the notorious Gallinas—has been regularly and formally ceded to this government by the native proprietors. The native title to the soil of several of these tracts have been extinguished—the deeds for which will be laid before you—and negotiations are now pending for the extinction of the native title to the soil of the whole of them. And I apprehend no great difficulty in being able, soon, to bring these negotiations to a favorable termination. The principal difficulty hitherto has been the want of funds to meet the large advances demanded by the chiefs. I am happy to state that this embarrassment has been partially removed. By the Liberia Packet, in September last, the Secretary of the Treasury received, from Rev. Wm. McLain, Secretary and Treasurer of the American Colonization Society, an invoice of merchandize, amounting to Three Thousand Eight Hundred and Thirty four dollars, to aid this government in the purchase of territory. This assistance is very opportune, and places us under renewed obligations to the friends of Liberia and of Africa, in the United States. No time shall be lost in applying this amount to the purpose for which it was granted. I beg also, to state here, that I have drawn on our good friend, S. Gurney, Esquire, London, for £500 of his donation; which bill, he writes me, will be honored.

The acquisition of the political jurisdiction over those territories is exceedingly important, in as much as it effectually abolishes the Slave Trade from this part of the African coast, and enables the government to extend a wholesome and beneficial influence over the tribes inhabiting them. And I am happy in being able to inform the Legislature that the influence of the government is already producing salutary results among the aborigines of this district. And not only these—there is evidently a great and important revolution commenced in the condition of our whole native population, which is now rapidly going forward; and only needs, on the part of the government, prompt and encouraging measures for promoting their civilization, to raise them speedily to respectability and usefulness.

This is a subject, in which I know gentlemen, you are deeply interested and concenred. The citizens of Liberia have kept steadily in view the two great objects of African Colonization—and, I believe, the principal objects which prompted the philanthropists of America in establishing colonies upon this coast,—viz: the closing of the coast of Africa against the ravages of the Slave Trade; and the best means of introducing civilization and christianity among the barbarious tribes of this continent. How far we have succeeded in effecting the first, I leave the world to judge. Of the second, gentlemen, we have yet much to accomplish; and past success, in this great and important work, should incite the government to renewed exertion.

It is very evident that the natives are improving more rapidly at present than at any previous time. There are more instances of laborious industry among them every returning year. It used to be said the natives can never acquire the habit of labor. But facts abundantly disprove this opinion. There are now numerous instances among them of very laborious industry. Some of them not only provide an abundant supply of food for their families, by the labor of their own hands, but have a surplus of several hundred bushels of rice with which, and sundry articles of commerce they are in the habit of collecting, they procure their supply of foreign manufactures. And there can be no question that the current is setting more strongly in favor of agriculture and other laborious pursuits now, than at any previous period. Notwithstanding these encouraging appearances, however, there is yet much to be accomplished before this people generally can reach the proper standard of rational and immortal beings.

According to the law of nations, this government holds jurisdiction over a territory, comprising at the lowest computation, over two hundred thousand of the aboriginal inhabitants, who are almost in total ignorance of God, his law, and the plan of salvation; and who are also to be taught nearly all the useful branches of human knowledge.

In this view of the subject—may we not ask ourselves gentlemen, what do we owe them!—and what are our duties in reference to them, in a civil and religous light! This government has assumed the guardianship of these perishing thousands; and they have claims upon us of high importance to them, and to our own character as an enlightened, just, and christian people. In return for what they have yielded to us, they are undoubtedly entitled to expect that we will do all in our power to impart to them the blessings of civilization and religion. They are entitled as citizens of this government, for such they are, to justice in all our dealings with them, to education in the useful arts and sciences, and in the principles and duties of the christian religion. In a word they have a right to expect, and to receive from our civil, and religious communities combined, that sort of education and training which will raise them, ultimately to the enjoyment of all the blessings of civilization; the rights and priviliges of freemen; and make them useful citizens of this Republic. This I conceive to be the precise object of the government. And if we fulfil not these duties, which grow naturally out of our connection with, and relation to them, we cannot avoid the imputations—which, by the way, have already been falsely charged against us—of injustice, unkindness, and unfaithfulness to them.

It cannot be denied that the work of civilization is no easy task, and is exceedingly slow in its progress. But when we look back in the pages of history five or six hundred years, and see what was then the state of the Anglo-Saxon race; and whence sprang the most polished and scientific nations of Europe, we find much to encourage us in our efforts to extend the blessings of civilization; and sufficient to convince the most skeptical of the practicability of civilizing the barbarous tribes of this continent.

Gentlemen, these people sustain a peculiar relation to us, and must be civilized,—and the work is ours. They are not to share the fate of the innumerable tribes of North American indians, which a few centuries since roamed fearlessly in their native forests; but have been swept into oblivion, and are with the generations before the flood—and of others not a trace remains but in tradition, or in the person of some solitary wanderer the last of his tribe, who hovers like a ghost among the sepulchres of his fathers—a spark still faintly glimmering in the ashes of an extinguished race. But happily the circumstances growing out of our relation and connexion with the aborigines of this country, are altogether different, and cannot, possibly, in the nature of things produce such results. They are not only of the same nature, and of one blood with ourselves—but they are our brethren our fellow citizens, and of the same race. And must be raised to a condition to partake with us in all the blessings we enjoy; to participate with us in all the affairs of the government; and to be in all respects on an equal footing with other citizens of this Republic. The best informed and more influential of our native population are fully sensible of the evils of their present state, and feel that a change in their situation has become necessary, and are strong in the conviction that we sincerely desire their welfare, and they are steadfastly looking to us to relieve them from their present degradation.

The chiefs of several tribes within our jurisdiction have recently expressed to me an earnest wish to have missionaries and schools established among their people who they say, are anxious to receive instruction. And there is nothing now to prevent the sending of missionaries and the establishment of schools, except what results from the want of pecuniary means. I sincerely hope the time is not distant when this difficulty will be removed, and that the present generation may have lights kindled in all their borders; and that generations to come may be saved from the darkness and wretchedness of their fathers.

This object is truly worthy of the continued efforts and persevering efforts of the government. And I am exceedingly gratified to observe, that there seems to be a most remarkable reciprocity of feeling and union of sentiment on this subject, which plainly indicate that the hand of Heaven is in it—as no power short of this could ever have produced such a state of things. This is for our encouragement, and it is encouragement enough to induce us to persevere. Indeed, in such circumstances we cannot relax our efforts.

Honor, justice, humanity, and all that make man respectable in the sight of God and men imperiously require us to go forward, in full faith till this work, so auspiciously commenced shall be accomplished.

My enthusiasm, gentlemen, on this subject, and I am not ashamed to acknowledge that I possess it, does not blind me to the difficulties and obstacles which are to be overcome; past experience impresses this on me. But I hold that these difficulties are not insurmountable, and if the government will persevere in its duty, the thing, which we so earnestly desire, will be accomplished.

The pecuniary embarrassments of the government, I am aware, presents a serious obstacle to the carrying forward of the work of civilization as rapidly as we could wish. I am also aware that economy in our public expenditures is "the order of the day"—indeed the fashion of the time. This to a certain extent, and in reference to particular objects, is undoubtedly wise and proper. There is, however, a just and politic economy, the result of extended and liberal views; and there is also a false and spurious economy, the offspring of narrow views and little minds. The one is wholesome to the reputation, and to all the true interests of a nation. The other is hollow-hearted and mean, and disgraceful to a nation's character. But gentlemen, I doubt not your discrimination in this matter; and I also feel that you agree with me as to the importance of the subject on which I have been speaking—I, therefore, scarcely need invite your attention to its serious consideration, or impress upon you the necessity of adopting measures which will so increase the public finances as will enable you to spare an allowance sufficient, for the purposes and plans of the government, for the improvement of our native population.

I must also be permitted to remark, gentlemen, that it is absolutely essential to the success of our efforts, for the civilization of the natives, that the legislature speedily adopt measures to increase and preserve the reputation and influence of the government in the estimation of this part of our community, and secure for it full confidence and respect; without which your best concerted plans must fail.

You are not ignorant, gentlemen, of the attempts which have recently been made by some designing, bad men, to create discord and jealousy among the natives, and to incite them to insubordination. And I regret to say, that in one or two instances, they succeeded too well; and at one time created no little concern for the preservation of the Authority and influence of the government.

In reference to the natives, this government unquestionably, should be, in its nature kind and mild, but firm and absolute. Laws and regulations must be formed to meet their advancing state, and which should remove the perplexing and provoking differences which so extensively exist between various tribes.—Which evil, in itself, if not effectually cured will hinder for many years, the progress of every effort which may be made for their benefit.

Another evil, perhaps, equally destructive to the natives, and equally necessary to be provided against, by proper laws and regulations is, their intercourse with unprincipled civilized, if I may employ the term, men, who visit them for the purposes of trade. Many of the natives complain, and justly too, that the morals of their youth are corrupted by bad foreigners,—of which we have sad proofs,—as well also as by some of our own people, who trade with them. This is a well known fact, and the cause of incalculable injury to the natives and seriously retards their civilization. As we would hope to promote their welfare, this evil must, in some way, by the wisdom of the Legislature, be removed. It can be done effectually in one way, and in one way only; and that is, as I recommended to the Legislature on a former occasion, "that the government interpose and regulate the manner of conducting trade with the natives."

I am fully sensible of the delicacy of this subject, in the view I am now taking of it, but its importance in order to the attainment of the object of the government, forbids that I should pass it unnoticed: or that the evil should longer continue Some people are so sordid in their views and affections, that when you come in contact with their pecuniary interests, they loose sight of every other consideration, however high or important; and such doubtless will raise their voice against any measure, which in their opinion, may in any degree, restrict their trading operations. But I dare not be unfaithful to my trust, to my conscience, nor to my God.

I therefore, earnestly recommend that in future all trading establishments connected with the natives, shall be made in reference to the influence which those establishments are expected to exert over the natives—and that they be made to bear upon every measure which may be put in operation for the civil, moral, and intellectual improvement of the natives.

Gentlemen, I have endeavored faithfully to spread before you, in as concise a manner as I could, the actual condition of a large and very interesting portion of our population.

I have stated, and have aimed to do it faithfully, their just claims upon the government. The plans and measures best adapted to satisfy these claims, have in part been suggested—others, in the course of your deliberations, will doubtless, present themselves to you.

The work is now before you, and the scene it presents is certainly adapted to fill and to delight minds bent on doing good.

The view and contemplation of it by such minds, I am sure will never tire. Do good and communicate to all men as ye have opportunity is a divine command. And every man of real benevolence finds his chief happiness in obeying this command. Therefore to do good and communicate to those heathen tribes, whom God has placed under our special care, is unquestionably our indispensible duty—a duty than which, I can conceive of none more imperative upon the christian, the philanthropist, and the statesman.

It affords me much pleasure to be able to inform the Legislature that this government has happily succeeded in settling the difficulties which subsisted between Kings Dour-wee and Zio—and in terminating the cruel war, which, for the last five years, has completely cut off all communication with the interior tribes of the section; and which has produced incalculable sufferings among the inhabitants of a large portion of the Grand and Little Bassa territories.

Kings Dour-wee and Zio have solemnly pledged themselves never again to make war one upon the other, under any circumstance whatever; and in case any dispute or misunderstanding should hereafter arise between them, it shall be referred to this government for adjustment;—whose decision shall be final. I have great pleasure in stating that King Peter Harris, of Grand Bassa, made himself particularly serviceable to the government in bringing about a reconciliation of the above parties. He was, indeed, instrumental in his exertions, and at one time was absent from his home, on a mission to them as an agent of this government, more than [illegible] days. We are also indebted to King Barnes, a Settler of Little Bassa, for [illegible] rendered our Commissioners while employed in negotiations. Nor can I omit [illegible] knowledgements to valuable [illegible] of this government, in this [illegible] Stephen A. Benson, and Lott [illegible] Esq's, —whose judicious exertions [illegible] effects of the [illegible] terminating the war and restoring [illegible] country. I am gratified in being able to state that the expense incurred by the government, in settling this war, was partly met by the patriotic and liberal minded citizens of Grand Bassa County, by voluntary contributions. The balance was paid from the public Treasury—which [illegible] you will find entered in the Treasurer's account.

I regret to have to inform you, gentlemen, that the same success has not attended similar efforts of the government in other quarters. In the latter part of June last, at the earnest solicitation of a number of the Chiefs, Vays, Gizzies and Deys, I appointed a Commission, consisting of three gentlemen, to visit the Vey Country for the purpose of arranging and settling the disputes existing between the several parties occupying that territory,—and if possible, put a end to the war, which was then, and is still being vigorously prosecuted between a part of the Vey and Gola tribes. But I am sorry to say, after an absence of several weeks, the Commissioners returned without being able to accomplish all that was desired or anticipated. The causes of their failure you will find fully set forth in their report, which will be laid before you. I beg, however, to recommend that further, and immediate efforts be made to settle those disputes and difficulties; and terminate this war.

Knowing as we do, what violent resentments, and implacable animosities these discords generally generate, and how they are apt to exasperate and inflame the contending parties and prompt them to acts of the greatest cruelty, you are called upon, and required, gentlemen, by [illegible] obligations to Almighty God, and to your fellow citizens, to use all the means in your power, for stopping the further effusion of blood, and for averting the impending calamities that threaten the inhabitants of those territories.

A messenger is now here from the Chiefs of the Vey country soliciting the interposition of this Government in settling the dispute and wars, which are represented as producing great distress among the people. I beg gentlemen, that you will give this subject early attention, that the messenger may be dispatched, as early as possible, with such communications as you may direct to be transmitted to the chiefs.

I have the honor herewith to lay before you, for your consideration a Communication I received a few weeks since from the cheifs of Tumbo, asking the protection of this government, and to be received within its jurisdiction by the annexation of the whole of their territory to the Republic,—and requesting that one Will Buckler —who, some years ago settled among them, but has since succeeded in collecting around him a large force, composed principally of strangers, and now threatens the extermination of the original inhabitants, and who has recently committed, with impunity, several cruel murders in the country—be moved from the territory.

I beg also to submit to your consideration the propriety of adopting measures to relieve the Authorities and people of Grand Bassa from the annoyances of Fisherman Grando, who, by some means, has obtained an influence in that country—though himself a Pickanniny Cess man,—which he exerts improperly by creating difficulties and disturbances, sometimes of a very serious character among the people:—which greatly interrupt friendly intercourse, and not a little retard the progress of civilization among the inhabitants of that district.

During the past year I had an interview with Grando, at his town, and explained to him the folly of his course, and the pernicious effects of his conduct, not only upon his own people, but upon the happiness and prosperity of the people of the whole country. I assured him that the government could not longer tolerate such conduct; and, unless he changed his course, legal proceedings would be instituted against him. To all of which he listened attentively;—and, with seeming penitence, readily admitted the error of his course, and the wrongs he had been guilty of, and promised never again to interrupt the peace and harmony of the people.

I had scarcely left the country, however, before his evil genius got the better of him; and he has since been as mischievous as ever—and has recently been guilty of sundry gross infractions of the law, and of using threats against the local authorities of Grand Bassa County.

This man Grando has given the government more trouble decidedly, than any other headman, or chief within the limits of the Republic. He has never yet been made properly to atone for the murder of Governor Finley, and rather thinks himself above the law—but the time has fully arrived that he be taught his obligations to the government; and convinced of the majesty of the laws.

Gentlemen, in connection with this subject, and as a means of counteracting Grando's baneful influense, and checking his bad practices I would suggest that the Legislature authorise the establishment of a settlement at the Cove, near his town—which will bring him under the immediate eye and control of the authorities, and which will also have a good effect upon his people by bringing them more closely in contact with civilized habits. There are other considerations, gentleman, of a commercial nature, which seem to favor the establishment of a settlement at that place. Its commercial advantages, as a convenient landing place especially, are generally admitted; and the idea of forming a settlement there to secure these, is by no means new. And I think no difficulty need be apprehended in carrying out the measure proposed. Indeed many of the citizens of Edina, Bassa Cove, and Bexley have expressed to me a desire to locate there, and will do so immediately provided the government will make them small grants of land, and extend to them certain assistance specified in a communication addressed to me on this subject—which I have the honor herewith to lay before you—and which I beg to recommend to your favorable consideration.

Gentlemen, during your recess I have used my best endeavours for the preservation of harmony and friendly relations with all nations, by encouraging the intercourse of foreigners—without distinction of country—and by extending to them every facility in my power for conducting trade with the citizens of this Republic—and it would have been a source of much gratification to me, if the conduct of all those traders had been such as to enable me to assure you that, on their part, a similar desire existed to maintain a good understanding with the government. Such, however, in every instance, has not been the case;—and I am pained to have to inform the Legislature that unworthy attempts have been made by one or two of these traders to alienate the affections of certain native tribes within the jurisdiction of this Republic—to induce them to disavow their obligations to this government—and to incite them to insubordination; and indeed, encourage them to actual hostilities. Means were adopted, however, as far as possible to counteract these pernicious influences—to preserve the attachment of the natives—and to maintain the influence and authority of the government over them. But gentlemen, to obviate the consequences of a repetition of such practices, the passage of a law providing adequate punishment for such offences may be necessary.

I am also sorry to have to say that some difficulties have arisen in regard to the operation of the law of the Republic regulating Navigation, Commerce, and Revenue.

One Mr. David Murray, the agent of Messrs Laurie Hamilton &Co, London, a few months since landed a quantity of merchandise at certain points, on our coast, in direct violation of said law; at the same time informing the inhabitants that he had received express instructions from his employers not to acknowledge the authority of the Liberian government over said points of territory, and that the government, or its officers, if they thought proper to assume the responsibility, might seize his vessel and the goods thus landed.

Upon this information from the officers of the revenue—who understanding the policy of the government and anxious themselves to avoid any collision with British merchants by using compulsory measures to compel obedience to the laws, communicated the facts to the Treasury Department, and asked to be instructed as to the course they should pursue—I addressed a note to Captain Murray stating to him my earnest desire to avoid the necessity of seizing his property; and calling his attention to an interview I had had with him, in the early part of the year, on the subject of the jurisdiction of this government &c

At which time he assured me that in future he would respect the laws of the Republic, and would give no further cause of complaint. In reply to which, I received from Captain Murray on the 23rd; of October the following.

"Sir:—In answer to your letter of the 3rd inst, I beg to say that I am instructed by Messrs Laurie Hamilton &Co: not to pay any duties on goods to be landed on the Kroo coast, they having laid their claim to exemption therefrom before Viscount Palmerston, and from a copy of a letter received by them bearing the date 2nd July, 1850, Commodore Fanshawe had been instructed to institute enquiries into the matter. and he may be expected up in all this month for that purpose."

It has already been intimated to me that representations had been made to Her Majesty's Government respecting the exercise of jurisdiction, by this government, over certain territories on our leward coast, and that the Liberian Authorities, in said communications, were accused of imposing unreasonable and unjust restrictions upon British commerce; and that Commodore Fanshawe would probably visit Liberia soon to ascertain the facts in relation to these representations. In view of this and other considerations, and especially to convince British merchants of our desire to cultivate and maintain a good understanding with them—I informed Captain Murray that compulsory measures would not be resorted to until I had had the honor of an interview with the Commodore;—in the mean time, the government would hold him responsible for the duties accruing on all goods which he might land within its jurisdiction: and that it would no be difficult for me to prove, in the most convincing manner, to Commodore Fanshawe, as well by solid reasons, as by the authority of the best authors, who have written on the law of nations and the judgment of civilized states in general —the right of his government to exercise sovereignty over the territory in question.

Upon what grounds Messrs Laurie Hamilton &Co. claim exemption from paying duties on goods landed, on what they term the kroo coast, or at any point within this Republic, I am not fully informed. With respect to the said Kroo Coast, Captain Murray is well aware that, that territory is within the jurisdiction of this Republic—that the right of soil and the political jurisdiction over it were obtained for a just and valuable consideration, and that it is held by titles as fair and unequivocal as any human property can be held; and that the aboriginal inhabitants, of that territory voluntarily recognized their allegiance to this government. I am aware that attempts have been made there, as well as at other points within our jurisdiction, to induce the native chiefs to disavow their formal and solemn Conventions with this government—and to accuse the Liberian Authorities of misrepresentation and fraud in treading with them for lands.

But, I thank God as far as I know, at our hands, gentlemen, the natives, have no just cause of complaint. Would that all with whom they have had to do could say as much. But ah! how solemn the reflection, that on the great day of retribution, what thousands of these poor benighted heathen will appear at the bar of judgement to arraign those, who would attach to the Liberian Authoriteis frauds, of which they themselves have been guilty. But I entertain the hope and belief that the people of Liberia will then appear in the whiteness of innocence,—and that they will not only be free from all accusations of injustice to these their unfortunate and degraded brethren, but that the testimonials of their acts of justice, kindness, and benevolence towards them will plead the cause of their uprightness in all their dealings with them. as it is now authenticated by records upon earth.

On the 11th, ultimo I received a dispatch from Commodore Fanshawe informing me that he had been directed by his government to visit Liberia for the purpose of conferring with the Authorities respecting the complaints which have been made by British merchants, who occupy trading establishments on the coast of Liberia; but in consequence of circumstances of considerable importance on the southern part of his Command, he could not at an early period visit Monrovia in person—but to avoid delay he had deputed Commander Patten, the Senior officer of the Division of Her Majesty's cruisers on the north coast. to confer with this government on these matters.

Under cover, from Commodore Fanshawe, I received the same day a dispatch from the Right Honorble Viscount Palmerston, Her Britannic Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, calling the attention of this government to the said complaints of British merchants engaged in trade to the Coast of Africa, who represent that Regulations have been established by this government; the tendency and effect of which is greatly to obstruct and cripple the commercial operations of British merchants.

His Lordship has been pleased to enumerate in said dispatch the principle complaints, which have been addressed to Her Majesty's Government by British merchants engaged in trade on the Liberian coast. Some of these complaints are founded upon certain provisions of the law of the Republic regulating Navigation, Commerce, and Revenue,—the tendency and effect of which, they say greatly obstruct and cripple the commercial operations of British subjects.—

Others are mere fabrications—vile accusations without the slighest shadow of truth to sustain them—charging the government with adopting measures and restrictions, which I may confidently say never existed, except in the imagination of some of the servants, whom these merchants have employed on the Liberian coast, who, doubtless, have been making, from time to time, to their employers these gross misrepresentations.

1st. Of the Navigation, Commerce, and Revenue law, pased December 26th 1849, they complain that no foreign vessel is allowed to unload at any ports except Monrovia, Marshall, Grand Bassa and Sinoe—that the imposts duties to be levied under said Act are in many cases excessive, in regard to some articles amounting to 30 per cent, and that these duties are levied not on the cost price merely, but on the value realized by the actual sale of the goods; that no goods shall be admitted without the production of a declaration containing minute details not usually required in any other country, as to their origin, their destination, and their nature; and that although the 17th. Section of the 4th, Article of said law authorizes the Collector of Customs to relax the stringent provisions of the 2nd Section, in regard to the four ports of entry, by allowing him to grant official permits to land goods at Factories owned by citizens of Liberia on any part of the Liberian coast; this facility is not afforded to British subjects, and that thus an advantage is given to Liberian citizens which is unjustly and injuriously withheld from British subjects.

These, gentlemen, will of course claim your attention, and I doubt not, but that you will give them serious consideration, and will willingly remove every restriction which either unjustly or unnecessarily obstruct the commercial intercourse of British, or the merchants of any other country.

2nd: It is represented, by these said merchants, to Her Majesty's Government—that the Liberian Government exercises sovereignty over territory fraudulently obtained from the native proprietors—that it designates the aboriginal inhabitants of the coast as aliens, and endeavors to prevent British subjects from transacting business with them, except through the medium of citizens of Liberia—meaning, I suppose, those who immigrated from the United States;—that it is required that a license should be taken for each trading station at a cost of £270:—That the Liberian Authorities monopolize the market for two days, in order to get the advantage of whatever demand may happen to exist for Tobacco, Gun-powder, Muskets, Crockery, Salt, Rum and Soap;—that all purchases of land or houses made by foreigners are ordered to be null and void;—and that American traders ridicule the regulations and restrictions of the Liberians, and tell them—British traders—plainly that if they are driven to abandon the trade, they will at once take it up.

Is it not astonishing that men in their senses should make such representations, so totally void of truth, to Her Majesty's Goverment?

Captain Patten, of Her Majesty's Brig Hound, arrived here on the 18th, ultimo, and entered immediately upon the investigation of the various complaints of Messrs Laurie Hamilton &Co, London, who appear to be the principal complainants; and who certainly have indulged unjust and unwarrantable charges and accusations against the Liberian Authorities.

It is possible, indeed I will not doubt, that those gentlemen, acting upon statements made to them by their agent, believed that they were making correct and truthful representations to Her Majesty's Government. It is to be regretted, however, that they so readily gave credence to such statements—without, apparently, giving themselves the least trouble to ascertain the real facts of the case.

Full explanations of the several items of complaints were furnished to Captain Patten; and every facility afforded to enable him to examine thoroughly the invidious charges and imputations that have been prefered and insinuated against the Government and People of Liberia. No one could be more particular and minute, in the investigation of the charges and complaints refered to, than was Captain Patten. And I have great satisfaction in being able to inform the Legislature that he expressed himself fully satisfied and convinced, that gross misrepresentations have been made to Her Majesty's Government: in which, great injustice has been done the Authorities and people of this Republic; and distinctly condemns the course of Captain Murray in resisting the laws of this Government.

Captain Patten, however, without naming any particular prevision of the law regulating Navigation, Commerce, and Revenue, intimated a wish that the Legislature would reconsider some of the sections of said law, which he considered rather restrictive, and would extend to British traders every possible facility for conducting business with the citizens of the Republic.

I assured him that the Government and people of Liberia entertained the most friendly feelings towards British subjects; and that the Legislature would not hesitate to rescind or amend any existing regulation,—which may be done without seriously prejudicing the interests of the Government,—that can in any respect obstruct or cripple British commerce. The various correspondence on the subject of the complaints refered to above, will be laid before you.

Gentlemen, permit me to remark here, that [illegible] duty on articles of merchandize specified in an Act titled "An Act to raise a Revenue," the rate of which the government monopolizes, that foreigners consider excessive; I beg, therefore, particularly to recommend that said Act be wholly repealed; and that you adopt other measures for supplying an adequate Revenue.

With respect to trading establishments along our coast, whether owned by citizens or foreigners, I am still of opinion that a license should be obtained from the Government, for which a reasonable and liberal sum shall be paid, to be applied exclusively to the promotion of civilization and education among the aboriginal inhabitants.

I beg also to recommend that the amount realized from the sale of licenses under the 1st: and 3rd: Sections of the 8th Article, of the Navigation, Commerce, and Revenue law, be granted to the several corporations for the improvements of streets, &c, in their respective townships.

Gentlemen, in view of the primary importance of providing every facility for carrying the laws into prompt and faithful execution, and to render the administration of justice as convenient to the people as may consist with their present circumstances,—I cannot omit, once more, to recommend to your serious consideration the Judiciary system of the Republic. No branch of our political organization is more interesting than this to the public happiness; and to none can those improvements which have been suggested by experience be more beneficially applied.

The [illegible]ulation of the laws of the Republic, as authorized at your last session, I regret to say, has not been accomplished, to the extent of your wishes. I ask the appointment of a committe of the legislature to examine the work, as far as it has gone and to report upon its correctness, and the circumstances which have delayed its completion.

The importance of agriculture, as an efficient auxiliary to the welfare and prosperity of the human family, and especially of the people of Liberia, is so fully recognized and understood, that I deem it quite unnecessary for me to urge upon you, at any length, its claims to all the aid, and encouragement it may be in your power to give to every well directed effort for its improvement. It cannot be doubted that the cultivation of the earth, with other branches of rural economy, supply the vital principle—the very life blood—to every other department of human industry.

Among the most successful of the various measures adopted, in other countries, to give impulse to agricultural improvements, are agricultural societies,—and I could wish to see such societies established in every part of this Republic.

But, in my opinion, a central agricultural association, is at present, particularly needed. One that would be able to extend its beneficial influence, so generally as to awaken and keep alive through-out the country an active interest in its proceedings. Such an association would certainly deserve in a liberal degree your countenance and aid.

Many of you, gentlemen, are from agricultural districts, and are entitled, far better than myself to interpret the wishes of those engaged in agricultural pursuits; therefore, on the present occasion, I have only to say, that whatever measures you may adopt for advancing the interests of agriculture shall have my ready and cheerful concurrence.

With respect to common schools, and the importance of extending the means of education—I feel that I cannot do better than to invite your attention to what I had the honor of communicating to the Legislature, on this subject, at its last session. I am quite sensible of the feeling of the legislature with regard to the extension of the facilities of education; and I exceedingly regret, gentlemen, the pecuniary disability which still exists; and which alone, I am sure, prevents your doing all that you desire to do for the promotion of useful knowledge. It is, however, a source of much gratification to know that our friends abroad—especially in the United States—in this respect, are interested in our behalf. Besides the valuable assistance we are receiving, in the education of the youth of this Republic, from various missionay societies in the United States: you are doubtless, aware gentlemen, that an association has been formed in Boston, U. S. and has been chartered by the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, for the purpose of receiving and managing the funds, and the general scope and plan of a college in Liberia. A member of the corporation in a letter to me dated June last, says:—"We shall soon need a free communication of your views on this subject of education, on all points that may occur to you.

It is obvious that a charter from your government will be needed for the proposed college, with suitable ground for such buildings as may be required, and such patronage and aid towards the erection of buildings as the government may be able to bestow. We shall of course do nothing more than collect and invest funds, until we receive a communication of your mind, on the subject.—Whether the instructors shall be appointed by our Board of Trustees, with the concurrent approval of your government, or by the latter alone; or by the corporation to be chartered in Liberia—are questions which you will consider and favour us with your minds. In reply to this communication I have assured the gentlemen that every facility that this government can afford for carrying out the important objects of his Board, will readily be granted; I, at the same time, intimated to him the embarrassed state of our public finances, and that but little, if any, pecuniary assistance could, at present, be rendered by this government; but that I would call the attention of the legislature to the subject, and communicate to him the result of your deliberation. I therefore ask an expression of the Legislature on the points, suggested above, for transmission to the Board of Trustees.

The experience of another year has but strengthened the conviction entertained and expressed in my address to the legislature at its last session; that our present militia system was rapidly tending to utter disorganization. It is with much regret that I feel obliged to say, that in my opinion all hope of reviving or sustaining it in its present form may as well be abandoned at once. It is evident that circumstances demand its entire reorganization upon other principles and with essentially different features. My own sense of the importance of establishing, cherishing, and supporting a strong and efficient militia force, is undiminished—not, however, that I advocate war, to this my feelings are decidedly averse; and it is in view of this, that I advocate the embodying of a militia. Surrounded as we are, gentlemen, by heathen tribes whose ruling passion is war; I look upon the military organization of this government as the most efficient anti-war measure that can possibly be adopted. But how to organize such a system, as will answer the ends contemplated, in the present state of popular feeling on the subject, is to me a problem of difficult solution. I must confess, gentlemen, my own inability to suggest a plan that is satisfactory to myself, or that I would take the responsibility of offering to your consideration. I recommend the subject to your attention, and pledge my ready concurrence in the adoption of any system that shall give the promise of being an improvement upon the present one.

Gentlemen, I have the honor to inform you that your resolution, of the 24th. of December last, authorizing the removal of the cannon from central Fort, to Fort Norris Battery, has been carried into effect; as yet, however, these cannon have not been mounted. The carriages are being prepared, and it is hoped to have them in a short time ready for use. I regret very much that we were not able to have the carriages constructed of more durable materials, as cast iron for instance, which would relieve the government of the almost annual expense of supplying new ones, or keeping wooden ones which rapidly decay, exposed as they necessarily are to the weather, in repair. I hope that the legislature will, as soon as it may find it convenient, to do so, order iron carriages for all our stationary cannon.

In this connection I beg to call your attention to the dilapidated condition of nearly all the gun carriages in our frontier settlements.

Hitherto, the citizens of those settlements with the exception of a very little aid, some year or two ago from the government, have met the expense of the repairs of those carriages. But for some time, feeling themselves in no danger, they have neglected the repairs, and now look to the government to relieve them from this tax.

I scarcely need remind you, gentlemen, that the fiscal Affairs of the government will demand your serious attention. In the early part of the year the most flattering anticipations were indulged of relieving the government from its pecuniary embarrassments. No one I belive entertained a doubt on the subject: and I fondly cherished the hope of being able, at this session of the legislature, to congratulate you on the efficency of your present revenue system. But, gentlemen, by reference to the Treasurer's accounts, you will observe that there still remains a balance against the government of $36,000: of which amount, about two thirds are due to foreigners. I sincerely hope that the legislature will adopt measures that will enable the Secretary to discharge speedily these claims. Necessarily a great proportion of the public resources is derived from duties on imports, and, as you are already aware, various circumstances, which were impossible to foresee and provide against, have concurred, during the year to embarrass the officers of the customs, in collecting the tariff dues; and in some instances large quantities of merchandise have been landed on the Liberian coast, upon which the duties could not be secured, and of consequence, produced a serious deficiency in the receipts anticipated from that scource.

The Secretary of the Treasury has been directed to lay before you, at an early day, an estimate of the appropriations necessary for the ensuing year: and also accounts, in detail, of the receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year ending 30th. September last. The following is a concise statemen of the accounts, the Secretary will lay before you, viz. * * * * * * * *

In Conformity with a resolution of the Legislature adopted the 28th of December last, authorizing the appointment of auditors of public accounts, &c &c,—I appointed Messrs Warner and Hicks to that duty. They have been laboriously engaged, for some months, in examining the vouchers and accounts of all transactions at the Treasury Department, since the new organization; and they will have ready in a few days, to be laid before you a full report of their doings.

There are other matters, gentlemen, that deserve Consideration, and to which I shall take occasion, during your present meeting, to invite your attention, by special Communication.

Gentlemen, I now commend you to the Source of all wisdom and knowledge; and I pray that God will guide and direct all your deliberations to His praise, and to the happiness and prosperity of the people of this Republic, and of Africa in general. Feeling, as I most certainly do, that you will avoid all hasty, and ill-considered projects; and that you will avail yourselves of the current experience of the times; and that that experience will not suffer delay, in its application in consequence of any obstinacy in the exercise of delegated powor—I beg to assure you that your labors, to promote the general good will receive from me the most prompt and decided co-operation.

Full Particulars of the Losses at Sea of Three Ships—the Nonantum, Humayoon and Fanchon.

WONDERFUL ESCAPE OF THE PASSENGERS AND CREW!

In our paper of the 12th inst. we gave a brief account of the destruction of three ships by fire; these ships were laden with coal. A remarkable fact was then mentioned, respecting the wife of Captain William Bates, of the ship Nonantum; who was in succession on board these three ships when on fire.

The Boston Journal has been furnished with the following very interesting particulars of the destruction of these ships, furnished by Mrs Bates. It is seldom the lot of a woman to pass through such a continued series of dangers of a character so trying as those recorded in Mrs. Bates's letter. The letter is dated Bay of Sechura, Coast of Peru, Jan. 17, 1851 and after a few lines of a private nature, says:—

I will now commence my narrative. After we left Baltimore we proceeded on our voyage pleasantly, and I assure you I never enjoyed myself more. Nothing occured to mar our enjoyment until we were about in the latitude of the River Platte, when William discovered smoke issuing from the after hatch, and then the startling truth flasked upon our minds that the ship was on fire. She was loaded very deep with coal which was taken out of the mines, brought directly down to the ship in the cars, turned (sometimes soaking wet from the rain that fell on the way) directly into the ship's hold— and there it had remained heating through all the hot weather, until the gas that originated from it had generated fire. This result was feared by some before we sailed.

Imagine our situation—eight hundred miles from land on board a burning ship, with very inclement weather, so rough that boats like ours could not possibly live for any length of time. There was no other way but to smother the fire as much as possible, and bear up for the nearest land—the Falkland Islands. The crew immediately commenced getting up provisions and water sufficient to last until we could arrive at the Islands, and during the short time they were employed between decks, so powerful was the gas that some of the men fell down senseless from its effects. They then caulked every seam and the hatches as tight as possible, and yet gas and smoke would escape through seams which were apparently water tight.

The gas finally filled the cabin so that we were obliged to vacate it. We were in monentary expectation of an explosion, as such things had been known to occur in similar situations. We had our boats ready to launch in case the fire krok out, although we did not suppose for a moment they could live. It was extremely cold weather, and I was wrapped up in all the warm clothes I could get on, and was obliged to stay on deck for fear of the effects of the gas. Before I left the cabin it nearly suffocated me. I was so fatigued for want of sleep that I lay down on the floor and fell asleep, and when I awoke I could not stand, and could scarcely breathe, until after I had a fit of vomiting which relieved me. We were eight days in this situation before we discovered land. There were two men stationed aloft to keep a look out, and William was on the hottse.—It was very thick, and soon William sung ont "Land ho!" I shall never forget that joyful sound.

Presently the high rocks, called the Volunteer Rocks, which make off two miles, began to heave in sight and I can assure you those barren rocks presented to us a most welcome appearance. We ran into a little cove, under the lea of the land, and anchored that night, for it was blowing a close reefed topsail breeze, right down the harbor. The next day we beat up to the settlement called Port Stanly, an English colony consisting of 400 people. We had a survey upon the ship—opened the hatches and found her all on fire. We commenced throwing water into the hold with an engine, but the fire still increased we had no alternative left but to run the ship on shore and scuttle her.

This was done, and after the fire was extinguished we went to work and stripped the wreck. Everything between decks was saved in a damaged state and was sold at auction. She was dreadfully burnt inside. Her beams and stanchions were burnt off and her lower deck had fallen in. She was so burnt at the bottom that she bilged immediately although she was run on shore were it was very soft bottom.

After the business was all settled we should have come directly home, but the island being little frequented by vessels we might have remained there a year, perhaps, before an opportunity would have enabled us to return. There was in port a Scotch ship from Dundee, bound for Valparaiso, called the Humayoon, Capt. McHenry, master, and he said he would take us to Valparaiso, from whence we should be more likely to have an apportunity of returning home. We left the Falklands about the 25th of November, in his ship, which was loaded with coal, but which had been in so long that we thought there was no danger from it. We had been at sea twelve days, and was just round Cape Horn, when we discovered the ship to be on fire, and it increased so rapidly that in three or four hours she was in flames.

We were at this time seventy miles from land, and immediately made preparations to tak to the boats preferring to take our chance of gaining the land, although it was an inhospitable coast, inhabited only by savages. Just at this moment a sail hove in sight. We holsted a signal of distress, and she bore down for us. She proved to be an English ship called the Symetery, loaded with coal, bound to Acapulco. Capt. Thompson, her commander, took us all on board, and in a short time we saw the fine ship Humayoon burn to the water's edge.

We remained on board the Symmetry twelve days, when a large ship hove in sight, and in answer to our signals hove to. She proved to be the American ship Fanchon, of Newburyport, Captain Lunt, bound to San Francisco. She loaded at Baltimore with coal at the same time we did, and was well acquainted with William. Judge of his astonishment to learn that we were on board the Symmetry. He immediately invited us to come on board his fine ship, and we at once accepted the invitation. The ship was 1000 tons burthen, and had in 1200 tons coal.

On the 25th of December, when we were in the Pacific, 1200 miles from land we discovered the Fanchon to be on fire. Efforts were immediately made to make her as tight as possible and Captain Lunt shaped his course for the main land. We were on board this burning ship three weeks and immagination cannot conceive the anxiety of our minds during this time. We never saw a sail of any kind from the time the fire was first discovered until we saw the land, and then nothing but those little "Catamarans."

Capt. Lunt ran the ship into a small bay called the bay of Sechura, and anchored about two miles from the shore, at 4 o'clock P. M. He immediately commenced ladding the dunnage in the surf on a good sandy beach. A tent was built, and after taking everything of the ship's deck they opened the hatches, and no sooner were they raised than she was one sheet of flame below. The batches were put on again and she was run on shore and prevent her from burning. And there lay that noble ship in this lonely bay, and burned to the water's edge. Oh! it was awfully grand; it was a scene never to be forgotton. Give the freest flight to the imagination, and it cannot conceive anything to surpass the reality.

Think of the danger we incurred in remaining so long (three weeks) on board that burning ship. She was actually all burnt out, inside. In one day more it would have burst out at her sides. Twelve hundred tons of coal with all her other cargo, and all on fire, made no trifling hear to be living over. But then we hesitated to take the boats until we were compelled to, on account of the sufferings we should have to endure in an open boat at sea.

The coast where we are now staying is uninhabited. The nearest settlement is fifty miles from us. The bay of Sechura is on the Coast of Peru, about fifty miles from Payta. The first officer, with a boat's crew, have now gone up to Payta to get the American consul to render us assistance in getting us away.

This is a most picturesque spot where we are encamped. We have four tents pitched on the beach, while close behind us are cliffs rising hundreds of feet above us, and as far as the eye can reach are mountains rising one above another. The burning of the ship was an event which will long be remembered by us all. The flames roaring and raging to the very topmast heads, lighting the whole heavens—the mountains in the back ground brought into full view—with us poor mortals standing upon the beach witnessing this sublime scene, presented a picture well worthy the artist's pencil.

The roaring of the surf, for once was completely drowned by the louder and crackling of the flames. It was an awful sight to see the ship Humayoon burnt at sea. But then it was day time, and it had not the grand appearance of a fire by night.

I have been on board four different ships since I left Baltimore, and have been burnt out of three of them. They were all coal laden. While at the Falklands we heard of a large American ship, loaded with coal, being burnt off Cape Horn; the crew took to the boats and succeeded in arriving at Cape Negro. We did not learn her name. It seems impossible for any of the ships that loaded at Baltimore at the time we did, to arrive at their destination. The Fanchon was the best fitted in respect to ventilation and she has not escaped. It is a dangerous cargo to have so long in a ship—it may do for a short voyage.

[A postcript to the letter says that the writer remained on the beach for one week, when the whole party were taken off by a brig and carried to Payta, where they where entertained at the American consul's house. From Payta the witer, with her husband, intended taking passage for San Francisco in an American vessel, then loading for that port.]

A Good Story.—An old lawyer of the city of New York tells a good joke about one of his clients.—

"A fellow had been arraigned before the Police, for stealing a set of silver spoons. The articles were found upon the culprit, and there was no use in attempting to deny the charge. Lawyer G——was applied to by the prisoner as counsel, except on the plea of insanity or idiocy, he instructed the fellow to put on as silly a look as possible, and when any question was put to him, to utter, in a drawling manner, the "spoons." If successful, the fee was to be twenty dollars.

"The Court proceeded to trial; the charge was read, and the question put to the prisoner—'Guilty or not guilty!'

"'Spoons,' ejaculated the prisoner.

"The Court put several questions to him, but 'spoons—spoons' was all the answer that it could elicit.

"'The fellow is a fool,' said the judge; let him go about his business.'

"The prisoner left the room and the lawyer followed close in his wake, and when they had got into the hall, the counselor tapped his client on the shoulder, saying—

"Now, my good fellow, that twenty dollars.

"The rouge looked the lawyer full in the face, and putting on a grotesque and silly expression and winking with his eyes, exclaimed —'Spoons!' and then made tracks."

Cornelius Paulding, the millionaire, who died lately at New Orleans, bequeathed the bulk of his estate to his impoverished relations, made generous donations to the Orphan Asylum, and Public Schools, and appropriated $30,000 for the Baptists of New Orleans.

At the last Court ball at Vienna, a lady belonging to high noble family, refused, rather disdainfully, to dance with a young officer, decorated, but not noble. The Emperor, observing what had taken place, exchanged a few words with his mother, the Archduchess Sophia and then addressing the officer, said—"My mother wishes to walk with you."

Gen. Houston on his way Home.—We find the following incident of Gen. Houston, on the way to his home in Texas, in the Lawrenceburgh Indiana Register of the 31st inst.

We had the pleasure of meeting with Gen Houston last Saturday on the Mail Boat as we returned from Cincinnati. Gen. H. is a plain spoken and a plain appearing man; none of that pompous exhibition of himself to attract the attention of strangers that we have seen in would be great man. While present, reference was made to the present, state of Texas, it seemed to give new fire to the old hero's eye, and he spoke of Texas with that pride and satisfaction that a father would refer to a noble son.

He said he had known Texas a wilderness. He now saw he inhabited by thousands of industrious and enterprising citizens.

He had seen her in deep distress, and had been permitted to take part in her desperate struggles.

He now saw her without a foe, in the peaceable enjoyment of civil and religious liberty.

He once knew her as a department of insignificant Mexico. He now saw her an acknowledged sister of the great American Republic.

And should he now retire from public life—which he had in view—he could look back and say with truth, that his highest anticipations for her were fully met—the great object of his life had been accomplished—and he rested satisfied in knowing that Texas was loyal to the Union and true to herself.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THEODORE PARKER'S "DISCOURSE ON THE STATES OF THE NATION" is published in a neat pamphlet by Crosby & Nichols, and sold by C. S. Francis & Co. It speaks of the leading public topics of the day with an explicitness that reminds us of the plain speaking of the old Puritan pulpit. Mr. Parker is one of those who believe in a Divine Law superior to Human Legislation, and he does not hesitate to apply this principle with a stringent severity to recent enactments. We will give an extract or two from this juicy homily:

WRONG NOT MADE RIGHT BY LAW.

I have sometimes been amazed at the talk of men who call on us to keep the Fugitive Slave Law, one of the most odious laws in a world of odious laws—a law not fit to be made or kept. I have been amazed that they should dare to tell us the law of God, writ on the heavens and on our hearts, never demanded we should disobey the laws of men! Well; suppose it were so. Then it was old Daniel's duty at Darius's command to give up his prayer; but he prayed three times a day, with his windows up. Then it was John's and Peter's duty to forbear to preach of Christianity; but they said, "Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye." Then it was the duty of Amram and Jochebed to take up their new born Moses and cast him into the Nile, for the law of King Pharoah, commanding it, was "constitutional," and "political agitation" was discountenanced as much in Goshen as in Boston. But Daniel did not obey; John and Peter did not fail to preach Christianity; and Amram and Jochebed refused "passive obedience" to the King's decree! I think it will take a strong man all this Winter to reverse the judgment which the world has passed on these three cases. But it is "innocent" to try. However, there is another ancient case, mentioned in the Bible, in which the laws commanded one thing and Conscience just the opposite. Here is the record of the law: "Now both the chief priests and the Pharisees had given a commandment, that if any one knew where he [Jesus] were, he should show it that they might take him." Of course, it became the official and legal business of each disciple who knew where Christ was, to make it known to the authorities. No doubt James and John could leave all and follow him, with others of the people who knew not the law of Mosses, and were accursed; nay the women, Martha and Mary, could minister unto him of their substance, could wash his feet with tears, and wipe them with the hairs of their head. They did it gladly, of their own free will, and took pleasure therein, I make no doubt. There was no merit in that—"Any man can perform an agreeable duty." But there was found one disciple who could "perform a disagreeable duty." He went, perhaps "with alacrity," and betrayed his Saviour to the marshal of the district of Jerusalem, who was called a centurion. Had he no affection for Jesus? No doubt, but he could conquer his prejudices, while Mary and John could not!

Judas Iscariot has rather a bad name in the Christian world; he is called "the son of perdition," in the New Testament, and his conduct is reckoned a "transgression;" nay, it is said the devil "entered into him," to cause this hideous sin. But all this it seems was a mistake; certainly, if we are to believe our "Republican" lawyers and Statesmen, Iscariot only fulfilled his "constitutional obligations." It was only "on that point," of betraying his Saviour, that the constitutional law required him to have anything to do with Jesus. He took his "thirty pieces of silver"—about three dollars—a Yankee is to do it for two, having fewer prejudices to conquer—it was his legal fee, for value received. True, the Christian thought it was "the wages of iniquity," and even the Pharisees—who commonly made the commandment of God of none effect by their traditions—durst not defile the temple with this "price of blood," but it was honest money, it was as honest a fee as any American commissioner or deputy will ever get for a similar service. How mistaken we are! Judas Iscariot is not a traitor: he was a great patriot; he conquered his "prejudices," performed "a disagreeable" duty as an office of "high morals and high principle;" he kept the "law" and the "constitution," and did all he could to save the "Union;" nay, he was a saint, "not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles." "The law of God never commands us to disobey the law of man." Sancte Iscariote, ora pro nobis.

PASSIVE OBEDIENCE NOT TENABLE.

It is a little strange to hear this talk in Boston, and hear the doctrine of passive obedience to a law which sets Christianity at defiance, taught here in the face of the Adamses, and Hancock, and Washington! It is amazing to hear this talk, respecting such a law, among merchants. Do they keep the usury laws? I never heard of but one money-lender who kept them, and he has been a long time dead, and I think he left no kith nor kin! The Temperance Laws—is that kept? The Fifteen-Gallon Law,—were men so very passive in their obedience to that, that they could not even "agitate?" yet it violated no law of God—was not unchristian. When the Government interferes with the rum sellers' property, the law must be trod under foot, but when the law insists that a man shall be made a slave, I must give up Conscience in my act of prayer, and stoop to the filthy law men have made in their act of passion!

It is curious to hear men talk of law and order in Boston, when the other day one or two hundred smooth faced boys, & youths beardless as girls, could disturb a meeting of three or four thousand men, for two hours long, and the Chief of the Police and the Mayor of the city stood and looked on, when a single word from their lips might have stilled the tumult and given honest men a hearing.

Talk of keeping the Fugitive Slave Law!—Come, come we know better. Men in New England know better than this. We know that we ought not to keep a wicked law, and that it must not be kept when the Law of God forbids!

But the effect of a law which men cannot keep without violating Conscience is always demoralizing. There are men who know no higher law than the statute of the State. When good men cannot keep a law that is base, some bad ones will say, "Let us keep no law at all,"—then where does the blame lie? On him that enact the outrageous law.

The idea that a statute of man frees us from obligation to the law of God, is a dreadful thing. When that becomes the deliberate conviction of the great mass of the people, North or South, then I shall despair of human nature; then I shall despair of Justice, and despair of God. But it will never come.

One of the most awful spectacles I ever saw was this: A vast multitude attempting at and orator's suggestion, to howl down the "higher law," and when he said, Will you have this to rule over you? they answered, "never!" and treated the "higher law" to a laugh and a howl! It was done in Faneuil Hall; under the eyes of the three Adamses, Hancock, and Washington; and the howl ran round the venerable arches of that hall. I could not but ask, "Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing, and the rulers of the earth set themselves, and kings take counsel against the Lord and say, 'Let us break his bands asunder, and cast off his yoke from us?'" Then I could not but remember that it was written, "He that sitteth in the Heavens shall laugh; the Lord shall have them in derision. He taketh up the isles as a very little thing, and the inhabitants of the earth are as grasshoppers before Him." Howl down the law of God at a magistrates' command! Do this in Boston! Let us remember this—but with charity.

THE MARCH OF FREEDOM IRRESISTIBLE.

It is not for men long to hinder the march of human freedom. I have no fear for that, personally,—none at all,—simply for this reason, that I believe in the infinte God. You may make your statutes; an appeal always lies to the higher law, and decisions adverse to that get set aside in the ages. Your statutes cannot hold Him.—You may gather all the dried grass and all the straw in both Continents; you may braid it into ropes to bind down the sea; while it is calm, you may laugh, and say, "Lo I have chained the ocean!" and how does the law of Him who holds the universe as a rosebud in his hand—to whom every ocean but a drop of dew. "How the waters suppress their agitation," you may say. But when the winds blow their trumpets, the sea rises in its strength, snaps asunder the bonds that had confined its mighty limbs, and the world is littered with the idle hawsers. Stop the human race in its development and march to freedom? As well might the boys of Boston, some lustrous night, mounting the steeples of the town, call on the stars to stay their course! Gently, but irresistibly, the Greater and the Less Bear move round the pole; Orion, in his mighty march, comes up the sky; the Bull, the Ram, the Heavenly Twins, the Crab, the Lion, the Maid, the Scales, and that shining company, Berenice's hair and all, and the new day finds even the idle urchins in their lofty places, all tired, and sleepy, and ashamed. It is not possible to suppress the idea of freedom, or forever hold down its institutions. But it is possible to destroy a State; a political party with geographical boundary may easily be rent asunder. It is no impossible to sever this American Union. But how? Why drive asunder the great British Party, one nation once in America and England. Did not our fathers love their Queen and, Aye. They called it home, and were loyal with abundant fealty; there was no lack of love for Rome. If was the attempt to make old English injustice New England law! Who did it,—the British people? Never. Their hand did not sacrilege! It was the merchants of London, with the "Navigation Act;" the politicians of Westminster with the "Stamp Act;" traitors of America—who did not die without issue—who for office and its gold would keep a king's unjust commands. It was they, who drove our fathers into disunion against their will. Is there no lesson? We love law, all of us love it, but a true man loves it only as the safeguard of the Rights of Man. If it destroy those Rights, he spurns it with his foot. Is there no lesson? Look further then.

Do you know how Empires find their end? Yes, the great States eat up the little. As with fish so with nations. Aye, but how do the great States come to an end? By their own injustice, and no other cause. They would make unrighteousness their law, and God will's not that it be so. Thus they fall, thus they die. Look at these ancient States, the queenliest queens of earth. There is Rome, the widow of two civilizations,—the Pagan and the Catholic. They both had her, and unto both she bore daughters and fair sons. But, the Noble of Nations, she boasted that her children were holier and more fair than all the pure ideas of Justice, Truth, and Love, the offspring of the eternal God. And now she sits there, transformed into stone, and the ruins of her children's house. At midnight I have heard the owl hoot in the Coliseum and the Forum, giving voice to desolations; and at midday I have seen the fox run the palace where Augustus gathered the wealth, the wit, the beauty and the wisdom of a conquered world, and the fox and the owl interpreted to me the voice of many ages, which came to tell this age, that THOUGH HAND JOIN IN HAND, THE WICKED SHALL NOT PROSPER.

Come with me, my friends, a moment more, pass over this Golgotha of human history, treading reverent as you go, for our feet are on our mother's grave, and our shoes defile our father's hallowed bones. Let us not talk of them; go further on, look and pass by. Come with me into the Inferno of nations, with such poor guidance as my lamp can lend. Let us disquiet and bring up the awful shadows of empires buried long ago, and learn a lesson from the tomb.

Come, old Assyria, with the Ninevitish Dove upon thy emerald crown. What laid thee low? "I fell by my own injustice. Thereby Nineveh and Babylon came, with me, also, to the ground."

Oh queenly Persia, flame of the nations, wherefore art thou so fallen, who troddest the people under thee, bridgedst the Hellespont with ships, and pouredst thy temple wasting millions on the western world? "Because I trod the people under me, and bridged the Hellespont with ships, and poured my temple wasting millions on the western world. I fell by my own misdeeds!"

Thou muselike, Grecian queen, fairest of all thy classic sisterhood of States, enchanting yet the world with thy sweet witchery speaking in art, and most seductive song, why liest thou there with beauteous yet dishonored brow, reposing on thy broken harp! "I scorned the Law of God; banished and poisoned wisest, justest men; I loved the loveliness of flesh, embalmed it in the Parian stone; I loved the loveliness of thought, and treasured that in more than Parian speech. But the beauty of Justice, the loveliness of love, I trod them down to earth! Lo, therefore have I become as those Barbarian States—as one of them!"

Oh manly and majestic Rome, thy sevenfold mural crown, all broken at thy feet, why art thou here? "It was not injustice brought the low; for thy Great Book of Law is prefaced with these words: "Justice is the unchanging, everlasting will to give each man his Right!" 'Twas not the saint's ideal; it was the hypocrite's pretence! I made iniquity my law. I trod the nation under me. Their wealth filled my palaces,—where thou mayst see the fox and bear their own,—I fed my courtezans. Wicked men were my cabinet councillors,—the flatterer breathed his poison in my ear. Millions of sordines wet the soil with tears and blood. Do you not hear it crying yet to God? Lo here have I my recompense, tormented with such downfall as you see! Go back and tell the new born child, who sits rich on the Alleghanies, laying his either hand upon a tributary sea, a crown of thirty stars about his youthful brow—tell him that there are Rights which States must keep, or they shall suffer wrongs! Tell him there is a God who keeps the black man and the white, and hurls to each the loftiest realm that breaks His just, eternal law! Warn the young Empire that he come not down dim and dishonored to my shameful tomb! Tell him that Justice is the unchanging, everlasting will to give each man his Right. I knew it, broke it, and am lost. Bid him to know it, keep it and be safe!"

THE FEVER AT RIO.

You have been fully advised of the late dreadful mortality in Rio Janeiro in consequence of the introduction there by a slaver, of a kind of fever peculiar to the coast of Africa. At the period of my departure from Rio, some three months ago, the disease had partially subsided; but in consequence of the near approach of warm weather, its reappearance, in a more dreadful form, was daily apprehended. I learned during my stay that so profoundly impressed was the Government of the necessity of doing something to prevent a revival of the disease, that the Cabinet was discussing the propriety of shutting its ports against all vessels from the coast of Africa. Such a measure would seriously affect the slave trade; which in spite of the laws of Brazil and her treaty stipulations, is still carried on.

THE SLAVE TRADE.

There are to the Brazilian Government other conclusive reasons why an embargo should be placed upon vessels from the ports of Africa. One which might be urged, was the prospect of difficulties between Brazil and England, arising from the severe and active measures which the latter country is taking against vessels engaged in the slave trade. The English Government has signified, in various ways, its belief that the Government of Brazil secretly encourages the slave trade. Hence the port of Brazil are constantly blockaded by English, men-of-war, and every vessel entering or departing is boarded and searched, if in the judgment of the English, there are good reasons for suspecting that she is a slaver. I have already informed you that the American steamer Confidence, from New-York, in which I entered the harbor of Rio Janeiro, was boarded off that port at 4 o'clock, A. M. by an armed boat from an English vessel of war. This incident is a conclusive proof of the accuracy of the statement which I have just made respecting the searching system.

PARTIES IN BRAZIL.

From the best intelligence which I was enabled to gather in Rio Janeiro during a very brief stay in that city, I was persuaded that there were some good grounds for the suspicions entertained by the English in relation to the supposed encouragement given to the Slave trade by the Brazilian government. There are in Brazil two distinctive parties—distinctive, and antagonistic, not in politicts alone, but in Society, and in the various commercial and financial enterprises in which that country is so largely engaged. One of these is called the Portuguese party—the other the Brazilian party. Both are represented in all the department of the government; but their strength is unequal; the Portuguese party is the strongest, not in blood and sinews, but in money and in intellect. The Portuguese party is represented in the person of the Emperor, who is brother to the present Queen of Portugal. The influence of the Church, which in Catholic countries is always overwhelming, is also enlisted on the side of the Portuguese. They are in fact the great monetary and monarchcial power of the country which the Brazilians only half succeeded in throwing off in the late revolution. The Brazilian party is the popular party—the strongest numerically, but the weakest in talent and money. The animosity subsisting between these parties is most inveterate and irreconcileable. It is a deep and implacable hatred which can only be eradicated by the utter extinction of one or the other. The identity of these parties will be sufficiently indicated when it is observed that one is "the party of the people" and that the other is "the monarchical party." The last is the part which it is universally conceded, secretly encourages the slave trade while the former discourages it by every means in its power. So far then as the Brazilian or popular party is responsible for the acts of the Portuguese, in their individual but not in their public capacity. (For the Portuguese representatives in the government profess to be warmly opposed to the slave trade) so far they are amenable to the charge which is made against "the government of Brazil" of encouraging the slave trade. The truth is that the masses of Brazil are cruelly oppressed by the lordly Portuguese; and that if they must suffer the horrors of war they will have to bear it as one of the train of evils which despotism and misrule has brought upon them.

A YOUNG MAN CHARGED WITH THEFT BY A CLAIRVOYANT.—A singular circumstance has recently occurred in the First Ward of this city, which has caused some considerable excitement. The facts, near as we have been able to ascertain, are as follows:

On Sunday night last, the store of James Campbell, in the First Ward, was entered through a hole cut in the floor over the store, and about $12 in silver take from the drawer. The room over the store, through which the robber had entered, was occupied by a man named Jos. W. Warrick as a carriage shop. Mr. W. is a young man who has always sustained an unblemished reputation, and although some suspicions were entertained that he was guilty, they were not deemed of sufficient importance by Justice Gies, of the First Ward, to warrant his arrest.

A short time afterward a clairvoyant, named Mr. Taylor, was consulted in relation to the robbery, in the presence of a large company. The clairvoyant stated that the money was taken by a person who was then among the company assembled in the room. He refused to give the name, but described the dress and personal appearence of Mr. Warrick, and upon several of the company presenting themselves before him, he selected Mr. W. from the rest, and insisted that he was the guilty man.

The clairvoyant also stated that Mr. W. had some of the money upon his person, and the remainder, or a portion of it, was hid away in an outbuilding, described very minutely the place where it might be found.

A search was made, and the money found in the place pointed out. Some money was also found upon the person of Mr. Warrick, which being the common coin in circulation, we believe, could not be identified.

Justice Judson issued a warrant for his arrest, but there was not sufficient testimony, aside from that of the clairvoyant, to justify his commital for trial, and he was discharged. [Syr. Standard.

THE AMERICAN COLONIZATION SOCIETY.

The lateness of the hour at which this Society adjourned last night renders us unable to more than briefly allude to its proceedings.

On calling the meeting to order, the President, the venerable Clay, spoke for some fifteen or twenty minutes, in terms most eloquent and hopeful. Rev. Dr. Fuller's address was of considerable length and pregnant with eloquence, with patriotism and with wisdom.

Messrs. Latrobe and Stanton, yielding to the necessity of the occasion, spoke briefly; but their words found a warm respone in the bosoms of their hearers.

The President of the United States, several members of the Cabinet, and other distinguished citizens were present. The meeting was large and highly respectable, graced by the presence of many ladies; and the feeling throughout appeared to tell that a new and brighter era had dawned upon the cause of African Colonization.

PHILOSOPHICAL happiness is to want little and enjoy much; vulgar happiness is to want much and enjoy little.

Never speak to deceive, nor listen to betray.

Friendship once injured is for ever lost.

It seems a constant plan of nature's to build exquisite structures with worthless and often loathsome materials; the brilliant plant and the phosphorescent light spring from rottenness; and among the decay of expectations and the mangled relics of happiness, hope blossoms and shines at once a flower and a star.—Misery of the Beautiful.

We are authorized to say that the New York Colonization Journal will be supplied to Liberia subscribers at the very low price of twenty five cents per annum paid in advance at this office—

The Journal is published monthly by the New York State Colonization Society, and contains much interesting information upon general subjects and especially in regard to the progress of Colonization. The New York Society, to place the Journal within the reach of every man in Liberia, furnishes it at the nominal price of 25 cents. Every head of a family certainly, will subscribe to it. Please send in your names and the cash, the both may be forwarded to the United States, by the next Ship.

"For the Liberia Herald"

From our Bassa Correspondent.

(Concluded)

In our last number we gave an account of the encampment at Fishtown to the 26th ult. We shall now attempt to close the narrative by noticing, briefly, the progress of the "New Settlement" and the subsequent movements of the natives and Fishmen. We then introduced to our readers their highnesse', King Governor, ——Governor Jack and Gentleman Jumbo, in company with two Young Bassa Princes. We shall now give the result of their interview with Pres. Roberts.

The Bassas modestly requested Jumbo, the principal speaker, in their vernacular, to ask President Roberts "If the country people had urged the Americans to drive Grando away?"—for it appears the Grando had cunningly fabricated this tale to incite the natives to open hostilities against us and thus be revenged—Jumbo hesitated, but mumbling, confessed that the fact was disclosed—as some of the Americans present understood Bassa—reluctantly complied.

On being answered in the negative the Bassas appeared much elated, and informed his Excellency that the Bassa Chiefs had been persuaded that they would have been caged for a season, had they ventured to appear in his presence. For they had been advised that Grando had accused them of pressing him to assume a hostile attitude and that, he plead in justification of himself his dependence on the native sovereigns of the country, and though the Fishmen arrogated unto themselves princely prerogatives "on the Beach," yet in fact they were denisons in subordination to the Bassas'.

Soffy John and most of the Bassa Chiefs had previously sent President Roberts many assurances of their friendship but Zo was silent, and report says that he is disposed to hostility.

It appears from what we can ascertain from friendly natives that the Bassa Chiefs, and Cape Fishmen held a Council together, & Zo advised them to wage war against the Americans, and assist the Fishtown Garrison. Whereupon Soffy John immediately responded. Why has Grando deserted his town without firing a gun? Why does he call upon us when he is flying and his own fortified against invasion, to prejudice our lives and country to regain a place that he has foolishly abandoned? He then assured them that he prefered peace and plenty, to war and famine and that they could go to war if they chose, but that he intended to go home and attend to his farm.

Since which time Grando has been skulking about the country asking help and sympathy.

Every thing has been going on smoothly and quietly at the "New Settlement," the town has been laid out and the volunteers have drawn their lots. And now we flatter ourselves that it will become one of the most thrifty commercial towns in Liberia, as it possesses in a high degree many commercial advantages. It is situated in a beautiful little bay where the landing is considerably protected by a natural brake-water which may be greatly improved by art, and made one of the best harbours of Liberia.

It occupies a central position in the heart of the Palm Oil and Camwood Country, and in this respect enjoys a decided advantage over any other settlement.

Trade is getting brisk again. Large quantities of Palm Oil are daily coming into the different villages.

The farmers of Bexley are putting in large quantities of arrowroot this season.

There are also numerous patches of Rice just springing up encouraging the prospect and cheering the heart of the husbandman—

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, MAY 21st, 1851.

We are indebted to friends across the water, and we beg they will accept our thanks, for a goodly supply of American newspapers, by the brig "Sea Mew" from New York.

Congress adjourned without establishing the ebony line of steamers—the enterprise however, is pretty generally advocated by the American Press; and we learn from a private source that the "bill" introduced by the Naval Committee of the House, is a very popular one and will doubtless be adopted at the next session of Congress. The House of Representatives passed the Senate "bill" of last Session, authorising the Secretary of the Treasury to reimburse the expense incurred for medical attendance, six months support &c, &c., of the recaptives landed here from the Slave Ship "Pons." We believed that this justice would be done. —And we believe further, that justice will now be done to all concerned.

A bill is pending before the Legislature of the State of New York; to incorporate the New York State Colonization Society, and to appropriate $10 000 a year, for five years, to aid its funds. Good.

Other State Legislatures are taking up the subject of colonization with a right good will.

The Fugitive Slave Law is doing its office in the free States. Massachusetts has surrendered ten or fifteen, New York, eight or ten, and Pennsylvania as many more fugitive slaves. The law, however, is very unpopular in all the Northern, and many of the Western States of the Union. Great excitement prevailed in Boston, not long since, in consequence of the arrest and subsequent rescue, from the U. S. Marshal, of one Shadrach or Sherwood—claimed as a fugitive slave. He was hurried off to Canada by his friends, and safely reached the domain of Her Britannic Majesty.—Others of the proscribed class are seeking refuge there. Better come to Liberia. Should Canada be annexed to the United States, you will have to run for it again.

Drowned—Last Saturday night, Mr. Daniel Moton, of the Virginia settlement, was drowned in the St. Paul, river. It appears that, in company with several other persons, he was returning home, from this place, late at night,—where he had been with a load of vegitable—and in the darkness his canoe became entangled either among rocks or logs, and was capsized.

A few weeks since Mr George Taylor, of this town, in attempting to swim across a narrow stream at Grand Cerce, was drowned.

Missionary Operations—We have noticed in one of two American papers, complaints of the paucity of religious information in the columns of the "Liberia Herald." We beg to say this is no fault of ours. The "Liberia Herald" is a secular paper—totally free from sectarianism, and its columns are open to all religious communications. We therefore invite Missionary correspondence which we will publish with much pleasure.

Landing goods contrary to law.—We forbear, at present, to name the parties—but information has been communicated to the Authorities here, that the Captain Supercargo of the schooner—— not long since landed a quantity of merchandize, at a certain point on our coast, in violation of the "Navigation Commerce and Revenue Laws," of this Republic. The proper officer of the Government, has the matter in hand, now taking measures to collect the facts in the case. We are glad of it,—the commercial regulations of the Government have long enough been trampled upon by foreigners.

If people will dance they must pay the piper.

Barque Baltimore.—This fine vessel stood in our harbour on the 19th inst, and communicated with Gen. Lewis, the Agent of the American Colonization Society. She had on board 127 immegrants from Savannah to be landed at Sinoe. She had been out from Savannah 83 days. Captain Cooper represented the health of the immegrants as being good.

Brig "Sea Mew"—J. G. Attridge, Master, arrived in our harbour on the evening of the 18th inst. bringing 15 immigrants under the auspices of the New York Colonization Society. This vessel called in at Sierra Leone, and remained there some fifteen days; the immigrants were frequently visited by some of the inhabitants of the place, and every persuasion was made to influence them to remain there, and not to come to Liberia. We pity the ignorance of the colored people living in Sierra Leone—they should know, that men of intelligence coming from the U. S. know full well, that in Liberia only, can their race enjoy the privileges they are seeking after. Sierra Leone, at present, is not the place for American immigrants; nor do we believe that any one of inteligence there, would advise such to remain.

We copy the following precious bit of intelligence from the "Spectator" March 8th 1851. It is an extract from a book written by one Captain Forbes, R. N.—and entitled, we believe, "Dahome and the Dahomans."

Truly, at the present day, romances or works of fiction are extensively circulated, and greedily devoured by a certain class of readers. And There seems to be no want of authors to supply food for such appetites. But we seldom find even such books wit out some speciousness to recommend the story there told. Captain Forbes', however, has wholly overshot the mark: And, we are bold to assert, if all what he has written respecting "Dahomey and the Dahomans" are as fabulous as the story he tells of Liberia, no correct information has been gained by his "two visits to the King of Dahomey and a residence at his Capital."

But hear what he says about Liberia,—Liberians keep you temper!!—

"The Liberian people are doubtless held up as an example to the general state of the African, but I prefer not instancing that state further than to prove I have not over looked it. For in Liberia there is as much, if not more, domestic slavery—that is, the buying and selling of God's image—as in the parent state of America, over which flaunts the flag of Liberty? It is difficult to see the necessity or the justice of the Negro who escapes from slavery on one side, crossing the Atlantic to enslave his sable prototype on the other; yet such is the case: and so long as it lasts, notwithstanding the attractive reports that emanate from this new republic, it cannot be held as an example of future good, but if possible, should be remodelled, even if at the expense of internal revolution or even total annihilation. I doubt if many benevolent christians in the Country are aware, that the Model Republic is in reality a new name and form for slavery in enslaved Africa, and, until the system be altered, totally undeserving of the high support and liberal charity it receives from the benevolence of Englishmen."

Now, who could believe that any man in his senses, especially one who had visited Liberia, we understand that Captian Forbes was once here for a short time—would write such a passage as the above. The sapient Captian, while penning it, we doubt not, as well he might, blushed scarlet. Even the system of receiving pawns, as practiced—according to Captain Forbes'—by Englishmen on the Gold Coast, is forbidden by law in Liberia, and as far as we know, and have any reason to believe, is strictly observed. But "the buying and selling of God's image" in Liberia!! The whole thing is too ridiculous to be treated seriously; and deserves no further notice from us, than a flat contradiction,—which we here unhesitatingly record.

Life in North Carolina.—Rev. Wm S Balch of this City has just been down in North Carolina preaching, and has written home to the 'Christian Messenger' some notes of his travels. The following is his account of his first days' wheeling through the heart of the State, after leaving the Railroad at Goldsborough:

"After breakfast I started in an open buggy for Kinston; I saw by the map it lay in the line to this place. Nobody at Goldsboro', nor the Conductor or Superintendent of the Railroad, who was along, could tell the distance, nor the way to get here. So I had to start at a hazard, with a "boy," which means here a slave, and a small miserable looking house. Goldsboro has little Court House, and a dozen or two dwellings and slave-huts, scattered among the pine trees in the wildest imaginable confusion. A little way out I saw a small, dingy building, the "boy" said it was a school house. We passed on, and such a road, and such a country, and such houses, and such people, and such a day! Oh! heavens! I did not expect to see all this in the "sunny and chivalrous South." These scattered plantations, with a few wrethhed log huts, dropped down in the edge of the woods, all open, and dirty, and comfortless cabins! Ireland! why Irish mud-hovels are palaces of comfort compared with many of them, for they are dry and warm. Their thick walls and thatched roofs protect the starved inmates from the chill night and drenching rains.—These do neither. But these are negroes! No, not all of them; for I saw some whites in as wretched plight as I ever saw in Ireland or Italy—one family a few miles out from Goldsboro,' which for destitution surpassed any thing I ever beheld or dreamed of in my life. The "boy" stopped to water his horse. For an excuse I stepped to the door to borrow a cup for some drink. Two flaxen haired boys, about the door, one, it might be five, the other three, with what were shirts once, hanging on their shoulders, and stringing in rags down to their hips, constituted all their clothing, and the day was chill and wet. Inside was an infant, 8 or 9 months old, dressed as the others, & lying on the nasty floor. On the bench of a loom, standing near the fire was sitting the tall figure, or rather shadow, of a woman. She left her loom and went to the dresser and took down the only tea-cup, and handed to me. I regarded her pale cadaverous visage, as she lifted her sunken eyes to me, for an instant, with a shudder of horror, as when one sees unexpectedly a human skeleton stand up before him; and I shrank from her with similar feelings. I could not speak. I took the cup from her attenuated fingers, and went to the well—a hole dug in the ground, six or eight feet deep, with no stick or stone to curb it, except above the ground. As I returned it, I observed a young woman sitting in the corner of the fire-place, close down to the fire as if shaking with the ague. Such a picture of destitution and misery I did not see in Kerry, Clare or Galway. The nearest approach to it I saw in Tivoli near Rome.

I have not time to describe other scenes, but went on through-holes of shallow mud, from one to two rods long, ford small streams, meeting once in a long distance, some pale, sickly ragged, emaciated looking man, and now and then a negro, some on the backs of small, poor horses, which are harnessed to old carts hotched up of round pine sticks, on which are single barrels of pitch. In some cases I met similar carts with a single ox harnessed in—not cows as are seen in Germany. In a few cases I saw a man on horseback; but met but two carriages, and the stage, with one passenger in it, in all day, and a journey of 34 miles."

POETRY.

THE LAST GREAT DRAMATIST.*

BY ALFRED TENNYSON.

Farewell, Macready, since to-night we part!
Full-handed thunders often have confest
Thy power, well used to move the public breast,
We thank thee with one voice, and from the heart,
Farewell, Macready, since this night we part;
Go, take thine honours home; rank with the best,
Garrick, and statelier Kemble and the rest
Who made a nation purer through their Art.
Thine is it, that our Drama did not die,
Nor flicker down to brainless Pantomime,
And those gilt gauds men-children swarm to see.
Farewell, Macready; moral, grave, sublime
Our Shakespeare's bland and universal eye
Dwells pleased through twice a hundred years, on thee.

*Read at the Banquet to Macready, in the London Hall of Commerce.

The Sun

VARIETY.—Change of habitation, change of dormitory, change of air, change of diet, change from one occupation to another—from a life of dulness to one of cheerfulness—from that of a single loneliness. Neither the eye nor the heart can perpetually feast on the same object. Youth and beauty must progress to maturity and wrinkles in companionship with the object that adore them. The ear tires with noise, and the stomach flags with dainties. The town seeks novelty, and change is the leading economy of the universe. Nothing in nature is still. Apply the thought to an invalid or misanthrope: the influence is magical, and its permanence is remunerative to those who make the venture. Simplify all this, and reduce it to daily expediency. The art of enjoyment is to make every moment a happy one—to gratify in turn every lawful sense. Let the invalid vary his diet; still observing for himself. Let recreation now and then be exchanged for ploddery. Breathe now and then the country air, instead of the loaded and oppressive street atmosphere. Let the lungs respire, by way of as frequent change as possible, the bright light and sweet air, instead of coalsmoke and gassy exhalation. School and its usefulness is rendered more bearable by the half-holiday and the visit to friends. Out and about, all ye who have the courage to leave the "shop!" It is a salutary filip, occasionally to commit a recoverable excess.

INDUSTRY.—A lazy husband, or lazy wife, though rich as Cœsus, is a bad bargain in any rank of society, but unspeakably so in the families of our effort. You cannot help the mechanic or laborer who will not help himself. Indolence, like drunkenness, cannot be elevated. The proverb of Solomon has been verified in all ages—"The drunkard and glutton shall come to poverty, and drowsiness will cover a man with rags;" and not only men but women too; for here, as in other things, you will be sure to have the same sauce for the goose and the gander. Hundreds of families are now in the most abject wretchedness solely through their sloth and idleness. We would have all young men inquire what time their sweethearts rise in the morning, and how they spend their days; and the young woman to be just as inquisitive concerning their swains. It may not be very poetical to be thus prying, but it may save a world of trouble by-and-bye. Paul's rule was, that "if people would not work, they should not eat;" and it will not be a bad addition to prohibit them from marrying, not by any Parliamentary Act but by every person refusing to be yoked with such useless and heartless monsters.

SWITZERLAND AND THE UNITED STATES.—The National Intelligencer, of the 31st ult. says—A private letter from Berne to a gentleman of this city, under date of December 16, contains the following interesting information: —To day the treaty (with the United States) will receive the unanimous sanction of the popular branch of the National Assembly; on Wednesday that of the Senate. Both bodies act upon it in open session. * * The message written by the President of the Republic, communicating the treaty to the National Assembly, is the most complimentary document to the United States of any that ever emanated from the executive department of a foreign government. One of the most distinguished members proposed that it was not enough that the vote should be unanimous, but the roll should be called, in order that each member might have an opportunity to record his name in favor of a measure which was destined to exercise a great moral and political influence, not only in Switzerland, but in Continental Europe. This was done, and not a voice was recorded in the negative. Instead of taking article by article, as is usually the case, the treaty was adopted en bloc. The committee which report the treaty have recommended the establishment of a permanent mission at Washington; and in the course of next summer, if the Senate approve the treaty, a charge d'affaires will be appointed. The same letter contains, also, the following item of information—A block of marble will be soon on its way to the United States, obtained by the Swiss government from the Alps, to take its place in the Washington monument. It is of the description so much admired by the old Romans. Beautiful thought! to behold the mountains of Switzerland contributing to perpetuate the honest fame of the immortal father and founder of our country, as the Swiss statesmen are contributing to give durability to the institutions which resulted from his noble efforts to benefit mankind.—The Sun.

A Hundred Year Ago—The Rev. Thos. Smith, of Falmouth, Me., in his quaint Journal and Diary of the Weather, kept by him a century ago has left on record data which prove the weather of 1750—51 to be the mildest of which there is any chronicle, in New England. We append a few extracts:

January 6th, No snow on the ground. 7th, Snow storm. 12th Thaw. 15th, The frost is entirely out of the ground. 21st, Weather like May. 24th, This winter will go down memorable to posterity.

February. This month has been more like spring than winter—moderate generally, and several days as warm as May. 18th Pleasant weather still. This winter ends—a wonder through the whole.

March 5th Snow storm. 13th, Fine spring weather the rest of the month, except the last four days.

ANECDOTE OF A SAILOR.—Some years ago, in a ship of war, there was a sailor whose vices had brought upon him all the grades of punishment which his commander could possibly inflict. The power of the cat could not subdue his rebellious spirit, and no means were at hand for court martial. The captain resolved to disgrace the man, and ordered him to be dressed in a petticoat and cap, and walk the gun deck before all the ship's company in the character of an old woman. He had not taken three rounds of the deck, amidst the jibes and jeers and tobacco juice of his shipmates before he came penitently to the commander and implored him to punish him like a man and give him the cat—he was a man and could bear it, but such a punishment, to be laughed at and spit upon by his companions he could not endure, and rather than suffer he would jump overboard and drown himself. No one believed he had the courage to execute such a threat, or to commit suicide in any way.

The captain replied, he had so often tried all other punishments without effect, that he was glad to find that he had at last hit upon one which seemed to be answering his purpose and likely to bring the culprit to a sense of his duty, then ordered him to continue his rounds before all the crew, according to his sentence. Upon this information the man's heart seemed to sink within him—mortified to death—with a pale and livid countenance and sunken eye, he hastened upon his walk of woe to the bows of the ship, then under full sail, and in an agony of despair, to the astonishment of all present, leaped headlong into the foaming sea—was run down by the surge of the ship, "in the deep bosom of the ocean buried," and, alas! was never heard of more.—Norfolk Beacon.

A FIGHT WITH A LEOPARD.

"One of our candidates for fellowship," writes a missionary from Africa, "has been attacked and sorely wounded by a Leopard. When I visited him, I found him suffering severely from three serious wounds: one on the left shoulder, another on the side, and a third on the calf of the leg, the flesh of which was torn from the bone. The poor man, however, was in a very happy frame of mind; and, instead of complaining, as many would have done, he raised his eyes thankfully to heaven and said; 'Ah! my dear sir, truly, God was present there, and I praise his name. Not my own strenght, but His alone delivered me. Had He not been with me, I should now have been dead!'

"He had been to his fields, to bring home a basket of buck-wheat, and on the way back came upon the leopard as he was lying in his path. Scarcely had he time to think what he should do, when the hungry beast sprang upon him. As he quickly threw the corn over the leopard, he escaped this first attack. The furious animal was not, however, driven away, but threw himself, in not less than four times, upon the poor fellow, tearing his woollen cap from his head, and his garments to rage. At length the man seized the leopard by the throat, and they both fell to the ground together. Then seeing a stone near him, he was happy enough to reach it, and with it he struck his enemy on the skull, such a blow as made the leopard howl loudly, then let go his hold upon the man, and the next minute made his escape as fast as possible. On the following day, it was shot by a huntsman, and its skin is now in my possession. It is five feet long, and three feet wide, which, for a leopard in this neighborhood, is a great size."—The Friend.

Love's Last Request

"Farewell, farewell." I cried: "When I return thou'lt be my bride—till then be faithful, sweet, adieu, in silence oft I'll think of you."

The glistening tears strained her bright eyes—her thickening breath is choked with sighs—her tongue denies her bosom's sway —"Farewell!"—I tore myself away.

"One moment stay," she stammered out; as quick as thought I wheeled about.

"My angel speak? can aught be done to comfort thee when I am gone? I'll send the specimens of art from every European mart—I'll sketch for thee each Alpine scene, to let thee see where I have been. A stone from Simplon's dreadful height, shall gratify thy curious sight. I'll climb the fiery Etna's side to bring home treasures for my bride; and oh, my life, each ship shall bear a double letter to my fair."

"Ah George," the weeping angel said, and on my shoulder fell her head—"For constancy my tears are hostage—but when you write, please pay the postage."

At a Printers' Festival, held in Nashville the "type stick" was toasted, and described as "the charmed casket by which the printer holds the destinies of empires and states and communities, as in the hollow of his hand.

CALUMNY AND INTRIGUE.—A correspondent says—"In the south of England there resides a family of very high rank. The lady is a baroness in her own right, and a marchioness by marriage. She was left a widow when young, and she married secondly an amiable and accomplished gentleman, a nephew of an Irish duke, and who, on his marriage, adopted the name of the wife's ancestry. The noble lady and her husband took up their residence where the former (who had been left an orphan when an infant) and resided in her youth. Here they have lived in a style suitable to their rank, and have been highly distinguished for their charity and hospitality.—Passionately fond of music, they gave a series of musical soirees to the neighboring nobility and gentry, at which musical amateurs, even of ducal rank, were performers. Although the family are liberal, almost ultra-liberal, in politics, this was not of course thought of while dispensing hospitality, and the whole of the Tory families of suitable rank participated in that hospitality. From the influence which the family naturally acquired in the neighboring town, by means of their kindness and wealth, the husband was solicited by the inhabitants, a few months ago, to become their representative in Parliament. This he declined, but recommended an intimate friend professing similar politics as himself, who was after a desperate contest, elected. In this contest both the noble lady and her husband took an active and conspicuous part. Now, the representation of the town had always been in the hands of two tory families of the neigeborhood, and they were enraged beyond description to find it taken from them. They studied what insults and slights they could safely offer to the family that had supplanted them, so as to annoy and drive them from the neighborhood.

It appears that an attache of one of the most distinguished foreign embassies in London, and who is intimately related to a princely family, had been introduced to the lady by her husband's uncle as an eminent musical amateur, and one who was competent and would be willing to assist the ladys in getting up her musical parties. He was of course treated with the utmost kindness by the family, and became a constant guest. About two months since he, presuming on the noble lady's frank and unsuspecting disposition, offered her a gross and unmistakable insult. Astonished at the outrage, she summoned her husband, who was in a distant part of the house, to her protection, and he immediately knocked the scoundrel down, and kicked him ignominiously from the mansion. The lady's political enemies have fabricated shameful insinuations from this circumstance, but with such cunning as shows that their cowardice equals their malignity, and they have just now had the audacity to exclude the lady's name from amongst the list of patronesses to a public ball. The great spite had, as it is termed, was to come off last night. In the meantime the inhabitants of the neighboring town have taken the matter up, and one evening last week, when the noble lady (noble by birth and by many gifts and virtues) entered the Polytechnic Institution in the town, an institution of which she is a munificent patroness, the audience rose en masse, greeted her with the most enthusiastic cheering, and spoke unmistakably what they thought of her enemies.—London Daily News.

The Indiana State Convention—Negro-Phobia.

Negro Exclusion was the special order yesterday. The first section of the article reported by the Select Committee provided that no negro or mulatto should come into or reside in this State after the adoption of this Constitution. Mr. Dunn of Jefferson moved to add, that each member of this Convention should be required, whenever they see a negro in this State, to catch and carry him out. Lost. Section engrossed, 94 to 36.

Second Section.—Contracts made with negroes and mulattoes coming into the State hereafter to be void, and all persons employing or encouraging such negroes or mulattoes to remain in the State to be fined not less than $10 or more than $500. Mr. Shoup moved to lay the section on the table. Lost—Ayes, 48; Noes 85. Mr. Gibson moved to strike out all after void, and insert that any person or corporation who shall allow such negroes to occupy their real estate, shall forfeit it to the County for Common Schools. Mr. Dunn of Jefferson moved to add to the amendment a proviso that a dead negro might still have the privilege of being buried without causing the forfeiture of the graveyard. Ruled out of order. Mr. Gibson's amendment was rejected—Ayes, 35; Noes, 95. Mr. Holman moved to strike out the last half of the section after the word void. Lost—Ayes, 57; Noes, 74. Section engrossed, 77 to 56.

Third Section. An annual appropriation shall be set apart by law for the gradual colonization of negroes now in the State.

Mr. Newman moved to make the amount not less than $10,000.

Mr. Pettit moved to amend, not less than $2,000. Lost.

Mr. Newman's also failed—Ayes, 28; Nays, 90.

A substitute section, offered by Mr. Stevenson, providing that the colonization fund should consist of the fines collected under this article, was adopted in lieu of the original section, and engrossed.

Fourth Section. After 1860 no negro or mulatto to acquire real estate or any interest therein otherwise than by descent.

After several motions, the section was laid on the table—77 to 54.

Fifth Section.—The Legislature shall pass laws to carry out the above provisions if adopted by the people. Mr. Watts moved to strike out "if adopted by the people. Motion to lay the motion on the table lost—Ayes 52, Noes 78. Those words were then struck out—Ayes 75, Noes not counted, and the section engrossed.

Sixth and last Section.—This article to be submitted to separate vote of the people—"Exclusion and colonization of negroes and mulattoes—Aye or No." Mr. Kent moved to strike out "and colonization," as the annual colonization appropriation had been struck out. Lost. Mr. Pitcher moved to lay the section on the table. Lost—Ayes 58, Noes 73. Mr. Hawkins moved to amend that the question should be decided by ballot, and a majority of all the votes cast should be necessary to carry the article. Lost—Ayes 44, Noes 87. Section engrossed—78 to 57.

GOOD TEMPER.—Let young people remember that their good temper will gain them more esteem and happiness than the genius and talents of all the bad men that ever existed.

PAIN has its own noble joy, when it kindles a strong consciousness of that existence which was before stagnant and torpid.

Report of Rev. R. R. Gurley on the Condition and Resources of Liberia

The late Report of Rev. R. R. GURLEY to the U. S. Government on the Condition, Resources and Prospects of Liberia, gives an interesting picture of the state of affairs in that flourishing young Republic. We condense the leading points of the Report.

Mr. Gurley sailed from Baltimore on the 1st of August, 1849, and arrived on the African Coast on the 18th September; remaining one month on the Coast of Liberia. His impressions of the African climate are more favorable than the act counts hitherto published during the latter portion of what is called the rainy season, and we continued on the coast during most of the transition period from that to the dry season, the weather was generally clear and pleasant, and we were seldom deterred for an entire day from visiting the shore, or from moderate physical exertion.

No one can look upon the athletic, finely proportioned and developed forms of the native Africans, or upon a congregation of the inhabitants of Monrovia, or of the other towns and villages of the Liberian Republic, and retain the idea that health cannot be enjoyed on the African Coast. The general aspect of the climate to colored immigrants are becoming less and less formidable, and soon will, to a good degree, be averted. by the cultivation of the soil, an appropriate regemen, and increased medical experience and skill. Mr. Gurley had seen large families in Liberia, who, after a residence there of some years, had suffered no invasion from death, and who found their security in watchfulness against excesses in diet and exertion, in a moderation approaching to abstinence, in the use of medicene, and in the possession of ample supplies of the necessaries & comfort of life. The friends of our colored people, and of the Republic of Liberia, cannot be too emphatically reminded that to send emigrants with inadequate supplies, to feel all the depression of want, while exposed to the untried influence of the African climate, is an error which must often prove fatal to human life, and sadly injurious to their great enterprise. Far better is it to enable a few immigrants to establish themselves in health and comfort in Liberia, than to cast large bodies of them on that shore with no sufficient means of subsistence, during the time when such means can be secured by no exertions of theirs—thus augmenting burdens upon the charity of that but recent community which its citizens must find it difficult, if not impossible, to sustain.

Having visited Africa in my youth, (continues Mr. G.) and witnessed, in company with the distinguished and lamented Ashmun, the first budding of civilized and Christian life on Cape Montserado, it may be readily imagined that I could not, after a quarter of a century, look again upon that verdant promontory,—that I could no again tread the streets of Monrovia—that I could no meet those who, so many years ago, extended to me their hospitalities—could not behold that humble community, who, when I first stood there, were making some narrow openings in the dense forest, and sheltering themselves beneath some thirty or forty thatched roofs; few, feeble, and exposed to barbarous foes, now risen, through the favoring hand of the Almighty, by their fortitude and energy, to the elevation of an Independent Republic, acknowledged as such by two of the most powerful nations—without a deep sense of the Divine goodness to the people of Liberia, and to the writer, in that he was permitted to see on that shore the renovating power of a Government of constitutional liberty, pervaded by the Christian spirit, and encompassed by the highest motives to beneficence.

On our arrival several vessels were moored in the harbor of Monrovia, (among them the American man-of-war schooner Decatur, Captain Byrne, and the Lark, a small, beautiful armed vessel, presented to the authorities of Liberia by the English Government) and, as we dropped our anchor, the steamer of her Britannic Majesty, which had brought out the commercial treaty ratified between Great Britain and the Rebablic, was taking her departure. The reception of this treaty was announced by the thunder of cannon from the hights of Monrovia and the summit of the Cape, and signalized by mutual congratulations among the citizens, and by signs and expressions of universal joy.

TOPOGRAPHICAL LIMITS.

The Republic holds political jurisdiction over the country from Manna, a point bordering on the notorious Galenas, on the northwest, to Grand Sesters the east, a distance, on the coast, of 350 miles, with an average extent interior of 40 miles—the boundary line inclosing a space of about 14,000 square miles. The authority of the Maryland Colony extends from Grand Sesters to the River Pedro, a distance, by water, of 120 miles, and by land of 140 or 150 miles. Important acquisitions of Territory have been made within the last few months by the Republic, and also by the Maryland Colony. For the purchase of Galinas, a wealthy English friend has promised President Roberts £1,000; and an equal amount is offered by one of our citizens, a gentleman of Ohio, for the same object. The most important points on the coast of Liberia, southeast from Galinas, are Cape Mount, rising 1,060 feet above the sea. thence near 50 miles, Cape Montserado, on the summit of which, 240 feet above the ocean, stands a light-house, and 150 feet lower down, and one mile back, the town of Monrovia; southeast thence 35 miles, Junk River, and near its mouth a settlement bearing the illustrious name of Marshall; onward 35 miles, Grand Bassa; thence five miles, Tubcanines; further on seven miles, Young Sesters; thence four miles, Tradetown; after these, in succession, Little Cailon, Grand Cailoh, (easily recognised by Tobacco Mount, a conical hill 880 feet high,) Cestos, Sangwin, Bafou, Tessou, Little Bootou, Grand Bootou, Sinou, and Bloobarra Point opposite, (distant about 80 miles from Grand Bassa,) Kroubar, Little Kroo, Settra Kroo, Mana Krou, Rig Wills Bay and Town, (these five towns including almost properly termed Krou or Kroo people,) Little Nifou, Middle Nifou, Great Nifou, Pickaniny Sesters, and Grand Sesters, the present extreme southern limit of the Republic.

POPULATION.

The emigrant population on the Republic is estimated at 6000, and the native population at 110,000 to 200,000. Of the Maryland colony, the emigrant inhabitants are about 900, and the natives estimate at 100,000, seperated into numerous small tribes, varying in language, independent of each other matters of domestic concern, yet slightly united, within certain limits, on questions of general and common interest. The native people of this region of Africa bear a striking similarity in manners, character, and superstitions.

The Fey or Vey tribe, a people more enterprising, proud and warlike than most of their neighbors, inhabit the country from Galinas to Cape Mount, and to the distance of thirty miles inland; have been much addicted to the slave trade, and are probably, in number, from twelve to fifteen thousand. The Days occupy the country on the coast from Cape Mount to Cape Monsterado: are more mild, indolent and inoffensive than the Veys, and perhaps by one-half less numerous. Between the language of these tribes there is some affinity; both are rude and imperfect.

The Bassas are south of Cape Montserado, are more numerous than both of the preceding tribes, and with their allies in the county of Grand Bassa, are estimated at fifty thousand.

The native African population of Sinou resemble those of Bassa—are, perhaps, more reserved, if not to some extent blended with the Fishmen and Kroomen (who are numerous on that region of the coast) and more connected in traffic with the interior tribes. Like other natives who occupy positions along the sea shore, they have some knowledge of the English language.

Still further south we arrive at the country of the Kroomen or Kroomen—a people the most distinct, intelligent, and remarkable to be found on the coast of Western Africa. The Kroo mark (a black line, much darker than the skin from the top of the forehead to the end of the nose) has been adopted by those not originally of their community; and their name is usually given by strangers to the people of three different tribes who exhibit this mark—the Fishmen, the Settra Kroo people, and the people of Nifou.

The Fishmen derive their name from their universal occupation in fishing, when not employed by foreigners. They are the largest and strongest men upon the coast; most adroit in the management of canoes and boats: and marked by a peculiar enlargement of the ankle joint, produced by their mode of sitting in their canoes; are less vain, politic, agreeable, and, perhaps, less trusty than the Kroomen, (indeed charges of treachery and cruelty are with reason urged against them;) and while they inhabit towns separated by considerable intervals along the beach from Grand Bassa to Cape Palmas they probably embrace a population of 20,000.

The Kroo people proper—that is, those who inhabit Settra Kroo and four other towns in its vicinity—spring from a union of several tribes, who came some 250 years ago from about 300 miles in the interior, under one and the same government. They early formed a compact with the Portuguese slave traders, whom they were accustomed to assist, by which the adoption on their part of the peculiar Kroo mark was to be deemed a sign of exemption from slavery; and their name, Kroomen, is supposed to be but a corruption of the word crewmen, so very naturally and appropriately applied to them for their services to vessels on the coast. Polygamy and slavery prevail among them though they never enslave each other, nor sell slaves but to persons of their own tribe.

The Maryland Colony, at Cape Palmas, exerts, perhaps a less positive and controlling authority over its large native population than is exerted by the Government of the Republic; yet the influence of the intelligent and respectable officers is highly benefacial and must increase; while the missionary establishment within its limits excites our admiration, and deserves the most liberal support.

In regard to the third subject of inquiry specified in Mr. Gurley's instructions—"the form of the government, and the characters of the leading men in the executive, legislative, and judicial departments"—the Report alludes to the Constitution of the Republic of Liberia, fully pervaded by the spirit of liberty, and in all vital particulars, conformed to themodel of our own American free government. No provision is contained in this Constitution for the existence of seperate State Governments, nor do its framers appear to have contemplated nor desired their existence; but in the provision for the election of the President and Representatives every two years; in the subordination of the military to the civil power; in the declaration of the right of trial by jury, of universal toleration in matters of religion, and of the freedom of the press; and in the prohibition of the slave trade and slavery,—have the people shown the purpose and ability to rear for the protection of their liberties, a wisely limited and justly costructed republican government.

REVENUE.

For the two years previous to the independence of the Republic, the annual revenue of the Government, derived mainly from the six per cent ad valorem duty on imports, amounted to from eight to ten thousand dollars. With a view to augment the public revenue, the Legislature, after the adoption of the present Constitution, authorized and instructed the Secretary of the Treasury to import leaf tobacco, powder, salt, muskets and other firearms, with earthern and crockery ware, (articles in great demand for the African trade,) and to dispose of these articles at a certain specified advance on the first cost. But it is said this monopoly by the Government has not met the public expectation, and that it will be greatly modified if not wholly abandoned. On all goods imported into the Republic is imposed a duty of six per cent, with certain exceptions specified, wherein the duty is still higher. The President, without stating the exact amount of the present revenue, expressed the opinion that it would hereafter meet the expenses of the Government though it might, for some years, fall far short of what might be desirably expended for many objects of public utility.

MILITARY AND NAVAL FORCE.

In regard to "the Military and Naval force of the Republic," to the honor of the people of Liberia should it be recorded, first from their earliest settlement upon the African coast they have by courage and discipline defended themselves against the machinations of slave traders and the combined forces of many barbarous tribes around them to no inconsiderable distance. With the exception of those who are exempt in virtue of religious or civil offices, all the males in the Republic, from the age of 18 to 50, are subject to military duty, may be called at any time by the Executive into actual service, and in time of peace are enrolled in stated days and regularly trained in companies, in the several settlements, for examination, exercise and discipline. This force, well armed and disciplined, may be increased from 1,000 to 1,500 men, while a much larger native force might doubtless be brought into more or less effectual service, in case of an invasion. Of Naval force, the Republic has nothing, with the exception of one small, but beautiful vessel, armed with four guns, a present from the British Government.

GOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS.

The independence of the Republic has been acknowledged by both England and France; and between the former and the Republic a treaty of peace, friendship and commerce was ratified on the 1st of August, 1849; and hardly a week passes during which armed ships from these or other civilized nations are not seen visiting the ports and exchanging civilities with the hospitable inhabitants of Liberia. By treaties with many African tribes, the Republic has not merely enlarged its territory, but secured their consent to the abolition of the slave trade, and in the exercise of its political and judicial authority over them. The suppression within the limits of the Republic of one cruel custom has preserved probably thousands from a most cruel death, and shown a signal triumph of civilized law over superstition.

AGRICULTURE.

Substantial farm houses, surrounded by well-cleared and cultivated plantations of from 10 to 30 and 50 or 70 acres, exist, on both sides, for miles of the St. Paul's (with occasional interruptions) for the distance of 20 miles. Several hundred acres are cleared in the vicinity of a dense and lofty forest, at Bassa Cove, Edina, and at Bexley, (some 5 to 8 miles up the beautiful river St. Johns; and at Greenville, Rossville and Ralville, on the Sinoe, are similar decided evidences of agricultural industry and improvement. It may be confidently predicted that whenever adequate capital, skill and machinery shall be introduced, the culture of rice and cotton, the sugarcane and coffee, will prove as successful and profitable as in any region of the world.

Mr. Dimmple, in 1779, found three different kinds of cotton at Goree, and states that it grows spontaneously everywhere, and that the samples sent home were considered by English merchants superior to that from the West Indies. According to the testimony of Colonel Denham, (as quoted by Mr. Buxton,) cotton of three kinds—white, brown and pink—grows wild about Sierra Leone.

The tea plant is reported by M. Queen, on the authority of an Arabian traveler, and others more recent, to grow spontaneously and abundantly in the interior of Africar.

MARYLAND COLONY.

Of the Maryland Colony, at Cape Palmas, with a civilized population of about 900, though the soil may be inferior to that of some of the settlements of the Republic, we may report increasing attention to Agriculture, and fair prospects of success. The following statistics on this subject will show what had been done two years ago:

Number of acres cultivated.	155
Number of acres in potatoes and cassades.	91
Number of coffee trees.	1,497
Number of cotton trees.	2,133
Number of orange trees.	331
Number of plantain trees.	6,349
Number of cocoa-nut trees.	63
Number of cocoa and mango trees.	160
Number of other fruit trees.	1,191

TRADE.

The entire suppression of the slave trade within, and in both directions far beyond, the limits of the Republic; the order, peace and security existing under a just and well-administered Government; the new encouragement and rewards extended to industry, in connection with the vast extent of the cam-wood forests, and the great number and productiveness of the palm trees—give reason to anticipate a rapid increase in the amount of some of the most valuable articles of African commerce. Of the present amount of imports and exports, different opinions are expressed by intelligent citizens of the Republic. The Committee at Sinoe, estimate the imports annually at about $400,000 and the exports at $700,000. The Committee of Monrovia represent that of palm oil are annually exported from the Republic 500,000 gallons.

MISSIONS.

The Methodist Episcopal Church has fourteen day schools and eighteen Sunday schools, affording instruction to 690 pupils.

The Southern Baptist Board of Missions have gathered into their schools in the Republic 230 children, 92 of whom are children of native Africans; and their missionaries preach to 10,000 of the native population.

The Northern Baptist Board have missionary schools at Bexley, in Bassa County, and at Little Bassa; at the former 24 native pupils and at the latter 16—both schools being conducted by educated native teachers. A Baptist church is organized in connection with the mission at Bexley.

Several missionary stations are occupied by the Board of the Presbyterian Church. (Old School) and schools and churches maintained by them at Monrovia, Edina, and on the banks of the St. Paul's River. A plan is already adopted for the establ-lishment and endowment of a high school at Monrovia, to bear the honored name of Alexander, to be sustained by donations of members of this communion.

Of Mr. James's school at Monrovia, which derives support from the benevolent ladies of New-York City, I concur in the ovinion of Mr. Harris, that "it would be an honor and an ornament to any New-England village."

The Mission of the Protestant Episcopal Church at Cape Palmas (the seat of the Maryland Colony) has three native male schools, containing about 70 pupils, and two female boarding-schools, containing about 40 scholars. In the Sunday and night schools are about 220 to 240 pupils, of both sexes. In addition to these schools for natives, are two day and two Sunday schools for the children of the colonists.

Of native and colonial children, the number under the care and patronage of this Mission exceed 300. Of native communicants there are about 45, and in connection with the colonial church 25—making, in all, 70 members.

AFRICAN COLONIZATION, &c.

In concluding his Report, Mr. Gurley thus alludes to the subject of Colonization:

It is the success of the plan of African Colonization, as seen in the Independent Republic of Liberia, that most conclusively commends it to national consideration. On that far distant shore, for ages darkened by superstition and outraged by crime, a community of free colored persons from the United States aided by American benevolence have adopted a Constitution of free Government, and taken their high position among the Independent States of the world. England and France have acknowledged their right of self-government, and their just claim to the respect and comity of nations. What higher motives can be imagined than those which have given existence to this Republic! What work more honorable or sublime than that to which it is dedicated and destined? Though at present few in numbers and very limited in means, a vast field for action and influence opens before it; and in its Constitution and laws, in the spirit of its people, the advantages of its position, and the motives and necessities of those who are hastening to build up their homes and their fortunes under the shadow of its wings, we see the elements of mighty power, of an unbounded growth and prosperity.

The rapid increase of free persons of color in many of the States of this Union; the importance, for their benefit more than our own, of their organization into a community by themselves, in the land of their ancestors; the immense advantages such a community must secure to itself and extend to others, by developing the resources and turning into legitimate channels the commerce of Africa, by the civilization it must impart, and the moral and political truths it must exemplify and enforce among her ignorant, debased and chaotic population—all commend the Republic of Liberia to the regards of the General Government of this Union.

From the presence of our squadron on the African coast, benefits, doubtless, accrue both to Liberia and to our own commerce; but I may be permitted, in the conclusion of this report, to avow the opinion that a recognition by the Government of the United States of the Independence of the Republic of Liberia, and an appropriation of Fifty Thousand dollars a year for ten years, to enable that Republic to carry out the principles of its Constitution, for the happiness of those who, from this country, are seeking a home upon its soil; for the suppression of the slave trade, and the civilization of Africa, would be in harmony with the character and sentiments of the nation, and give stability, progress and triumph to Liberty and Christianity on the African shore.

KISSES.—The ladies of Troy (says the Albany Knickerbocker,) have introduced a new feature at their fairs, from which they realize a much handsomer sum than from lotteries, viz. that of selling their confectionary to gentlemen, young and old. All the best looking girls wear placards, "Kisses one shilling each;" some charging a "quarter of a dollar," and others six cents, according to the beauty of those in the market. Gentlemen are expected to go in according to the weight of their purses, and one of the newspapers of that village says that one rosylipped, bright-eyed girl realized sixty two dollars in a single night; and another patty nine dollars and a half. One gentlemen purchased eleven dollars worth of sweetness.

GEORGIA ONCE A FREE STATE.—A Mr. Bryan, of South Carolina, in a pamphet styled "The Rightful Remedy," mentions the curious fact, probably new to most of our readers, that Georgia was for twenty years not only a free but a white colony. About the year 1732 the trustees for establishing the colony prohibited slavery, under which policy it languished until 1752, when they resigned their charter to the king. In thirty years after the introduction of slave labor, there were 30,000 slaves in the province.

AN AMERICAN YACHT.—Mr. Wm. H. Brown, of New York City, is constructing a yacht for the World's Fair, which is to be furnished with two masts, and to be of a superior model. A company of gentlemen have agreed to pay $30,000 if the vessel shall prove successful in the proposed regatta at the London exhibition.

Grape cuttings should never be planted in an upright position, as they are not one-tenth part so likely to grow so, as when laid horizontally.

For the Liberia Herald.

From our Grand Bassa Correspondent.

Mr Herald—My attention has been directed, for some time, to the progress of civilization, and the very important and gratifying changes that have taken place in the manners, customs, and religion of the aboriginal inhabitants of the Grand Bassa Country, since my first acquaintance with them in 1835: and it occured to me, that a short statement of the progress these people have made in civilization, as observed by me, might be of some interest to your readers. I shall not attempt, in the course of my remarks, to give a precise and accurate account of the manners, customs, and religion of the Bassas—but I design merely to notice briefly those things in which there have been manifest improvement. While I readily admit that the Bassas are not yet civilized; all who know them will admit that they are in a transition state, and rapidly approching to civilization—though it may still require years to consumate the good work now going on, especially unless, a more general interest be enlisted in their christian welfare. I shall speak first, Mr. Harald of their:—

Religion.—When I first knew them in 1835 the "devil worship" was universally venerated: now the "devil bushes," in almost every part of the country, are demolished, and in many cases there remains not even a vestage of them, to remind the inhabitant of the superstition and folly of his fathers. The stranger can now pass fearlessly through those once sacred forests, and females enter and trample them now with impunity. Then it was "holy ground," upon which no stranger or female could stand and live. Now at or near some of these places, once dedicated to Diabolus—temples, dedicated to the "living and true God" have been erected: In these, Bassa men, by the side of their brethren from across the mighty deep, bow before the shrine of the great Jahova, confessing their sins and asking forgiveness in the name of Him who gave himself a ransom for them.

Gre-gre—Less than a score of years ago, these people indulged implicit faith in the efficacy of the "Gre-gre" to preserve and protect them from all the evils of life—and to prosper them in all their undertakings—consequently the Gre-gre house was the glory of every Village. No native ventured to engage in any pursuit or sallied forth to battle, without consulting these oracles through the priest or "doctor," and receiving from him the earnest of the Divine will in a "rams horn" which he attached to his person and pressed onward in full assurance of success; now their faith is not only shaken, but they are ashamed to bear about them these badges of ignorance and superstition. They are therefore laid asside, seen only occasionally, and Gregre hosues are comparitively rare and the "Doctors "have fallen into disrepute.

Sassy-wood.—Their Judiciary was established upon their mythology and as they relied upon their oracles they were induced to regard sassy wood as an impartial ordeal of any crime, and that it would let the innocent go free, but destroy the guilty with unerring Judgement. Any one who refused there to attest his innocence, was considered a heretic, a profligate wretch who was unworthy of life.

But this ordeal too is now almost nugatory as very few men will submit to it.

If a charge be brought against one, he demands a regular trial before the tribunals of, and according to the laws of the Republic.

Employments.—The employments of the Bassas have also undergone a material change since the period of my acquaintance with them.—War was their chief pursuit, which was carried on for the express purpose of procuring victims for the slave trade, which was their main source of affluence and self-aggrandisement. These wars spread devastation all over the country, and threatened to exterminate the people who were thus divided against themselves Now that the slave trade has been abolished, by the influence of colonization and the strong arm of the law; wars have ceased and they have directed their attention wholly to agriculture and the manufacture of Palm Oil.

Education.—They regarded it as an imperitive paternal duty to send their sons to the Devil Bush, where they were taught the duties that appertained to them as members of community, and the rites and cerimonies of their religeon: now the greatest privilege they can enjoy is to "learn 'Merica man fash," they say "country man be fool, he no sabby sense"

Burials.—In this respect also there is a marked difference; in former times they laid the dead body away in a small house set a part for that purpose, in which a slow fire was kept up until desication was perfected.

During this process all manner of charges were brought against the deceased and his estate must be settled before his interment. Sometimes old Kings were kept in this way from three to ten years.

At the appointed time there would be a holy convocation from all the regeion round about, bearing with them presents, sometimes of considerable value.—The fatlings were killed and a solemn feast ordained the grave dug, and over it a small house erected—then commenced the funeral rites with singing, dancing, feastings and wailings, some gashed their breast, and if the tears forbade to flow, charged their eyes with pepper. The body was then let down into the grave, and loaded with presents from the mourners, consisting of crockery, hard ware, dry goods, &c., which are entombed with it for the use of the deceased. And I have heard, I can not vouch for the truth of the assertion, that long ago slaves were sacrificed to attend their masters in the world of spirits.—Be this as it may, they believe strongly in the immortality of the soul, and in future punishments and rewards, they also entertain the doctrine of transmigration, and often name the first born of the town after the deceased, believing that his spirit has returned in the person of the infant. But now if a great man dies they procure for him a coffin (before they used a mat) shroud him, and lay him away as soon as possible, in all respects according to civilized customs.

The causes that have led to these happy reformations in this tribe, may be attributed to the combined influence of Colonization and Missionary efforts.—

The minds of the natives, for miles and miles around the civilized settlements, have been imbued with the principles of our holy Christianity, by the preaching of Missionaries among them, and the influence of christian colonists: among the Missionaries, Crocker, Barton, Clarke, Mylne and Day, stand conspicuous. By means of the native boarding shools kept by these gentlemen, and others in the settlements and country, under the auspices of different benevolent American institutions.

There are but few if any within 20 or 30 miles of us, who have not heard of the creation of the world, the fall of man, and the plan of redemption, who have not heard of the goodness, omniscience, omnipresence, justice and love of God—colonization has strengthened the arms of the missionary, by affording him protection. The colonists have co-operated with him by raising up, in their families, native youths in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, and training them up in civilized habits. Indeed by the intimate intercours, of the surrounding tribes with the colonists, hey too have been led to admire the supremacy of civilized institutions and are begining to imitate them.

Many, we are led to believe, "have heard the voice of the Son of God and live," as they bring forth fruits meet for repentance.

Now a Harriss, a Vonbrumm, and a Crocker, all children of the forest, are proclaiming to their country-men the unsearchable riches of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

Should we not be encourged Mr. Herald, in this noble enterprise of evangelising and christainising Africa, after so much has been achieved in so short a time? Look upon the fields, they are now white to harvest, and the laborrers are few,—pray therfore the Lord of the vineyard that he send more laborers into the field.

Let us see to it, both missionary and colonist, that we improve our talents, least we be found unprofitable servants and the vineyard be given to others who are more worthy.

Much has been done, but the work is not yet accomplished—The Bassas are not yet fully civilized, they are not all christians yet, the strong holds of their superstition and prejudices have been broken but they require more knowledge of the Bible, and greater acquaintance with the arts and sciences before they can be profited much thereby.—

In my opinion, one of their King's had arrived at a just conclusion of the matter, when he said that "we no be Bassa-man, we no be 'Merica man,—alsame we do first time we no do dis time, no more, me no sabby 'Merica fash' proper"—

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, JUNE 4th, 1851.

Colonization—A proposition is before the Legislature of the State of Kentucky to appropriate $5000 a year for five years, to be employed, under the direction of the Kentucky Colonization Society, in removing the free people of color from that State to Africa.

THE New Jersey Colonization Society have resolved to ask the Executive of that State to recommend in his next Message, to the Legislature, an appropriation to aid in the transportation of free people of color to Liberia.

THE Illinois Methodist Conference, at its recent session, passed a resolution regarding the colonization scheme as one of the most prominent enterprises of the present day.—So it is.

THE Presbyterian Synod of Virginia, at it last meeting, held at Winchester, earnestly recommended its members to co-operate with the State in giving efficiency to the Act of the Legislature of Virginia, appropriating $30,000 for five years to colonize the free people of color of the State, in Liberia. The Congregations of the Synod were recommended to take up collections in aid of colonization.—The Synod also approved of the proposal to establish a line of steamships to Africa.

AT the annual meeting of the American Colonization Society, the following resolution was presented by the Hon: Mr. Stanton, M. C. and unanimously adopted.

"Resolved,—That the harmony of the States of this Union would be promoted by the voluntary emigration of the free blacks; and that it would be sound policy in the Government of the United States to adopt efficient measures, within the range of its acknowledged powers, for the encouragement of African Colonization."

The following resolutions were offered by the Hon: R. R. Reed, M. C. and were also adopted by the meeting:—

"Resolved—That the Republic of Liberia, having assumed a place among the nations of the earth, and attained a power to give permanance and strength to her position, is entitled to be treated by older Nations as a Sovereign and Independent State.

That the Christian Republic on the Western Coast of Africa was founded by the forecast and philanthropy of citizens of every section of these United States; and her people have just claims upon the United States as a Nation, to sympathy in their hopes, and encouragement of their laudable efforts in the cause of universal civilization.

That the American Colonization Society, respectfully submits to the Government of the United States, the expediency and sound policy of acknowledging, by some public act, the Independence and national existence of the Repulic of Liberia; and of establishing relations of amity and commerce with that Nation."

The Am: Col: Society propose to start a vessel, with emigrants, from Norfolk, Virginia, in all this month, or early in July.

The New York Col: Society, propose fitting out a vessel with about one hundred emigrants, to sail from New York in September next.

United States.—The "World's Exhibition in America in 1852" is no longer a matter to be talked about, but one which is to be accomplished. Governor's Island, in the State of New York, has been chosen as the place of holding it. It will no doubt be a grand affair; ond we really hope that Liberia will be represented there.

THE joint resolution of Congress, Authorising the President to confer the rank of Lieut: General, by brevet, passed the Senate with great unanimity. The rank is intended to be confered on Gen: Scott, —but if we may be permitted, at this distance, to express an opinion, we predict that a higher honor awaits the hero of Mexico. Gen. Scott, will doubtless receive the whig nomination for President of the U. S.

A bill has been introduced into the Deleware Legislature, which provides that free negroes convicted of offences and fined, shall, in default of payment of fine and cost, be "sold either in or out of the State."

The Legislature of Iowa has passed a law prohibitiug the immigration of negroes, and requiring them to leave the State upon three days notice of the law, under certain penalties.

The citizens of Powhatan Va. have held a meeting to consider the subject of removing the free colored population from the State. A Committee, appointed for the purpose, reported a resolution that their delegates in the present Virginia Convention, be requested to support any measure proposing to give to the Legislature of the State power to remove all the free negroes resident within it.

A recent decission of Chancellor Mason, of Alabama, has established the right of slaves to the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus upon the petition of any white person. The object and extent of the writ is to release them from any illegal confinement in which they may be held.

This decision is based mainly upon the construction that the term "person" in the bill of rights, and the constitution, embraces slaves.

Celebration.—The anniversary of the "G. U. O. of the Daughters of Temperance, Fidelity Division, No. 1," was celebrated in this town, on the 29th ultimo, according to previous notice—but long before the hour had arrived, the hall was pretty well filled by a respectable audience—the Order assembled in the Senate Chamber at 3 o'clock P. M. The exercises throughout were impressive and highly interesting; the vocal and instrumental performances were generally excellent; and the closing "concerto" was sung with admirable skill. Animating temperance addresses were delivered by gentlemen who had been invited to perform that part of the services. Rev. Mr. Russell acquitted himself with great credit—his address was well worth listening to. We hope the Rev. gentleman will consent to furnish us a copy of his address for publication.

A brilliant festival, in the evening, at the residence of Colonel Yates, closed the exercises of the day. The sumptuousness, and liberality of the entertainment; and the splendid and attractive stile in which it was set forth, could not fail to command the unmingled approbation of all present, and cannot but leave pleasant memories in the minds of those who were permitt participate in it.

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr. Herald:—The politics of the U. S. are peculiar to the ends at which the causes of their formation aim. The first great object is to retain among the people, the available right and power to hold in their own hands the controlling influence to shape all the affairs of State, that every one may be a walking monument of Republican liberty. The second is to exercise this right and this power, to the letter of the constitution and laws. In the U. S. that people elect their President for 4 years, and, then, by public opinion, doom him to the shade of private life, or to replace him in the Presidential Chair. But if the latter fate await him, then, at the expiration of the second term of 4 years. The unanimous voice of the people echoes, retire to the circles of private life, enjoy your most distinguished honors, enjoy, disinterestedly, your better knowledge of national policy and affairs, and your 200 thousand dollars in the embrace of friends who will, in one chain, connect the incidents of birth and death (and for their interests and pleasures) doom your name to immortality. The same popular voice echoes, that the sacerd Bible, and history teach that man is but man and the crature of circumstance.

Now that popular voice says (if these teachings are true (to some established by experience) that now without further ceremony, you have become better acquainted with our affairs than any could be with them, and if you should remain longer in office, the necessary balance of power is not, nor could not be intelligently in our hands. Therefore, without attributing mal-administration, (though such might be the case,) we request says popular opinion, your retirement from the distinguished investment of office, with which we have clothed you. The constitution does not there, as here, forbid the re & re and continued re-investment of the office. But this public opinion, intent upon the preservation of Republican principles, condemns your remaining longer in office as anti-republican. The country of the U. S. is large, and this of Liberia is so small, that whatever good reason makes, that country limit the presidency in one man's hands, only 8 years, should make Liberia limit it for 4 years. To understand and to administer the affairs of that country's government under so many vicissitudes and clashing interests of partisans and partisan views, require at least, 4 years. There he has no time to atten selfish objects. But the common good of the whole country and people. The only legitimate aim.

Which sught understanding and administration have their consigned some good Presidents prematurely to the rich repast of their earthly labors, death, before the expiration of the first four years of office. The work of pleasing, in building up Republican institutions by the exercise of a capacious mind, in a public manner, commends itself to every generous bosom. But when it becomes a science in which the President becomes a greater adept than his cabinet, so as to annul, in a measure, the the independence of this circumstance of office. Which the peoples' constitution places around him for wise purposes. The people are instinctively impressed that it is better for him to go out with his undiminished honors, and his 100 or 200 thousand dollars, and give place to a less experienced man in this science. Such a reason among others as surpassing dexterity in the management of public affairs, had obtained in advance to Henry Clay's canvass for the Presidency. So that after canvassing, with all his tact, the country three times He failed three times to aspire to the Presidency.

The people declared he would be an unsafe man to put at the head of their national affairs. The idea is not that great skill is not wanted with them, as with us. It is, most to be desired.

But not that degree of it that admits of no restraint, and might become baneful to Republican liberty. Because Republicans have not a sufficient guaranty when it is all with him that he will use it to the good of the whole people and country, unless his human nature is more perfect than either history or experience confirms. Now, whatever is true in the U. S. the same must make the same true in Liberia.

Beta a Republican.

Monrovia, May, 1851.

Our friend and correspondent, who writes the above, has said his say—and what he had a mind to say, we believe, some four or five weeks ago. We presume he has now delivered himself quite to his own satisfaction and edification. He has certainly given us a labored treatise on the grave subjects of "Republican principles," —"Republican liberty,"—"Republican institutions,"— "Republican constitutions and laws,"—"Republican Presidents," and "Republican public opinion in general." Well done "Beta a Republican." By the way, some people tell us there is nothing in a name; we, however, think differently—names are significant things: and on questioning our "Printer's devil," who understands these matters, and talks Latin like a book, as to the meaning of our correspondent's Christian name —he tell us "Beta" is the Latin name of the second letter of the Greek alphabet, and when assumed by an individual, signifies an adept in "Latin and Greek," —hence "Latin and Greek Republican." So you see that our correspondent is above mediocrity. But notwithstanding all this, according to our notion—though we profess to know but little of the matters of which he treats.—Beta a Republican has gone off half cocked, and discourses, evidently, more flippantly than wisely on the subjects of his texts. Our readers, possibly, may be able to divine what Beta is aiming at. If so, we confess, they are possessed of greater powers of penetration than we can boast. Some one says "speech was given to man to enable him the better to conceal his thoughts;"—another says, "the provision seems needless in the case of those who have no thoughts." Beta, doubtless, has thoughts; but, according to his analysis of the principles of government, and his notions of "Republicanism," they are desperately confused.

The burthen of his thoughts, however, seems to be, that it is Anti Republican" to re-elect any one man to a third Presidential term of office.

And how, pray, does he prove that such re-election would be a monstrous innovation upon Republicanism? —Why, that the people, in Republican governments "hold in their own hands the controlling influence to shape all the affairs of State." Which is true to the letter. That in the United States, "that people elect their President for four years, and then, by public opinion, doom him to the shade of private life, or re-place him in the Presidential Chair." This is also true. Nor is it less true, Mr. Beta, that public opinion may, in its judgment, replace him the third time in the Presidential Chair, without the violation of any republican principle.

What, we would like to know, has republicanism, to do with re-electing any man to office, as often, and as long as the people require, and are satisfied with his services. Public opinion is the judge of his public acts, and is directed accordingly. The glory of Republicanism Mr. Beta, is that "the controlling influence" is in the hands of the people, and if any public officer, high or low, disregard their interests, or in any respect be guilty of mal-administration,—then it is that "the people are instinctively impressed that it is better for him to go out." Republicanism is made up of certain fundamental principles; and public opinion demands that these principles be carried out— And in the United States, how and to what extent, vary according to the notions of the parties. There first one, and then the other comes into power; and neither would hold it to be anti-republican, to re-elect the same man as often as they could to the Presidential Chair. The principle, we presume, is the same in all parts of the U. S. Then how is it that Governor Briggs, of Massachusetts,—the birth place of American liberty, the cradle of American republicanism— has been returned Governor of the State, we believe, seven consecutive terms? To continue Governor, except by free and untrammeled public opinion, expressed at the ballot box, would indeed be anti-republican; but such is not the case,—therefore not anti-republican.

And, in the language of Mr. Hamilton, we ask "why desire to prohibit the people from continuing their confidence where they think it may be safely placed, and where by constancy on their part, they may obviate the fatal inconvenience of fluctuating councils and a variable policy?"

No Mr. Beta, your premises are wholly untenable —the people, of right, will controll these matters, and remain republicans still.

You have been pleased—though in rather an equivocal manner, accompanied with insinuations intended to apply to another, all of which, however, appear to us quite gratuitous—to instance Mr. Clay as a rejected candidate for the Presidency, by the American people. But in doing so, for seasons easily explained; and, be assured, for others than those stated by you, they acted upon true republican principles; and upon the same principles, they elected Mr. Polk. He, however, failed to meet the wishes of the mass of the people, and was therefore, allowed to retire to the "shade of private life." But on the other hand, had he managed their public affairs to their satisfaction—they had the right to re-elect, and re-elect, as often as they pleased—and probably would re-elect a half dozen times, did not other aspirants of the same party interpose their claims to public favor. Here Mr. "Beta a Republican," we too have paid our say.

HERALD.

For the Liberia Herald

Mr Herald:—

Murmurings are rife against you. Your readers are displeased, and I must say, they have reason to be so. What is the matter with you? Heretofore you proved yourself the faithful sentinel. Your friends depended on your sagacity, and held themselves ready whenever you sounded the alarm, to rush to your assistance, and that of their country's. In time of peace and triumph, as in time of danger, they expect to hear from you—and great was their astonishment to find that you did not give the least notice of the public demonstration made in our town on the 20th ultimo. I have allways been ready to stand by you, when you needed help—in this instance—this palpable neglect, I can find no excuse for you. Must your friends look at you with jealousy, as they do at a few others: and boldly proclaim you a traitor? I am sure you will not bear this character—the boys in the street will laugh you to scorn.

The just and honorable cause which we commenced to support need no traitors in its ranks. It will have no half-hearted supporters.—Our cause is one which has reason and good sense for its suppor. Our country will allways maintain its good character, and as long as good sense is at its head: and it must allways be our duty to oppose ambitious aspirants, whose only gratification consists in much talking of nonesense and foulfaring. Now Mr. Herald, unless you give a true and faithful history in your next number, of the great demonstration made by the administration party, you may be assured, no kind of apology will prevent you receiving a severe castigation.

"ALPHA,"

Monrovia, June 4th, 1851.

Reply—We notice with much regret, that our old correspondent "Alpha," thinks proper to arraign us at the bar of public opinion. Of one thing we wish him to be assured, that in no instance and on no occasion—have we swerved from our duty, and the principle we have allways maintained. While we entertained no feelings of ill-will against the opposing candidate—we readily confess that we quietly gave our best influence to the support of the party favorable to the re-election of the present incumbent. And in so doing, we were actuated by motives—in our opinion, and the people of Liberia, at the ballot box, have sustained us in this opinion—of the highest importance to the welfare of our infant State. Our interest, in common with the interest of every other citizen, is identified with the weal or woe of our common country. If Liberia prosper,—so shall we,—if retarded in her progress, in the same ratio must our political interests suffer. We were therefore, propelled by every wholesome consideration—nor shall we quarrel with any one who honestly differed from us—to favor the election of the candidate, in whose ability, judgment, and discretion, as exhibited in the past, we have implicit confidence. We trust we shall allways be found giving preference to, and advocating the election of, that man, to public office, who is best qualified to sustain and advance the interest of the goverument —And in no case favor the election of any man whose general deportment will detract from the dignity of the government, and whose qualications are wholly inadequate to the responsibilities of the office to which he aspires.

In not noticing the demonstrations of the people of this county, in our last issue, was not because we did not go heart and hand with them in their rejoicings, but we could not possibly make it convenient to prepare an article in time for our paper. A friend of ours promised to furnish us an account of the doings of the day—that was not handed in, in time. We will have the pleasure, however, of presenting it to our readers in our next issue. And we pray you Mr. "Alpha" have a little more patience, and not so hastily stigmatize us as "traitors." Our opinions are too well understood, and we believe that public opinion will do us the justice to admit, that we are not afraid to avow them. The opposing party did not fail to resort to all kinds of means, that their ingenuity could invent, to destroy the little influence it was supposed we could exert. But notwithstanding all this right has prevailed.

What is Man?—Of the human frame, bones included, only about one-fourth is solid matter, chiefly carbon and nitrogen, the rest is water. If a man weighing 10 stone were squeezed flat under a hydraulic press, 7 1-2 stone of water would run out, and 2 1-2 stone of dry residue would remain. A man is therefore, chemically speaking, 45 lbs. of carbon and nitrogen diffused through five pailfulls of water.—Quarterly.

POETRY.

THOUGHTS OF FREEDOM .... For The Tribune.

BY G. M. GILPETT.

Up from the misty verge of Time,
A golden ray is beaming.
Whose glorious light, with truth sublime,
Across the earth is streaming.
Though dimly through the mists of wrong,
It struggles yet, it will brighten,
And gladsome day break o'er the throng,
God wills it to enlighten:
Then, Brothers, cheer,
The dawn is here,
The dawn our day to brighten!

Old fables that have bound the mind,
And chained the soul to error,
Shall never crush again mankind.
Beneath their weight of terror!
The TRUTH now comes to bless the world,
The chains of men to sever:
And from his throne shall Power be hurled,
To pass away forever!
Then, Brothers, rise,
And grasp the prize,
That waits your firm endeavor.

FREEDOM TO ALL! God speed that day,
Nor of its morning linger;
For on the Future's lifting veil,
'Tis written by His finger.
The dreaming seer beholds it there,
With heart all wildly beating,
And million breasts send up their prayer,
His aspirations meeting:
Then, Brothers, wake,
The dawn shall break:
Be up to give it greeting!

Oh! bright will be this world of ours,
When chains no longer fetter,
When men shall rank with equal powers:
And RIGHT, not RIGHT'S the better;
When Wealth shall have no lordly claim.
To lift its proud possessor,
When Poverty shall bring no shame
To humble its confessor--
When Brothers, all
The great and small,
And earth holds no oppressor!

AFRICAN SLAVE-TRADE.

Official Documents from the American Minister to Brazil.

The documents communicated by the President to the Senate on the 12th of December, in relation to the Traffic in Slaves in Brazil, under the American Flag, have been made public. We give a brief statement of the origin of troubles and the result of the investigation instituted at Rio Janeiro. The information was transmitted to the United States Government by the American Minister at Rio, Mr. Tod; from whose statements it appears that the infamous traffic is still carried on to a great extent.

Not less than 45,000 negroes have been imported into Brazil within the last year. More or less of every cargo are murdered on the voyage, and the survivors are too often used as mere beasts of burden. By far the greater portion of it is carried on in vessels built in the United States, and under the flag of our country.

The American Consul at Rio, in the months of May and July, 1847, took sundry depositions, clearly establishing the fact that the American brig Senator proceeded to the coast of Africa, in the month of December, 1849, and brought to the coast of Brazil a large cargo of negroes. The depositions represent a scene of cruelty and horror indescribable.

In January, 1848, the American bark, Laurens was seized and sent to the United States. On the 27th of May, in the same year, the United States vessel Alleghany arrived at Rio, to be used in making seizures, where there was evidence of an intention to carry on the slave trade, under our flag.

On the 30th of September following, Mr. Tod recommended the Government to recommend the abolition of all trade, in American vessels, between Brazil and the African coast. On the 24th of July, in the same year Mr. Tod issued a circular, addressed to the American Consuls in Brazil, with a view to obtain the statistics of the slave trade, as connected with American vessels. On the 11th of January, 1849, after measures had been adopted to stop the illegal traffic, Mr. Tod still complains that the American flag was still used by the illegal traders in human flesh.

On the 8th of January, 1850, Mr. Tod wrote to the Secretary of State that fifty thousand Africans are annually imported into Brazil, and sold as slaves for life One half of this number are introduced through the facilities directly and indirectly afforded by the American flag.

If the Brazilian statutes upon the subject were, faithfully enforced, says Mr. Tod, the slave trade could not continue. Unfortunately, however, those clothed with their administration and execution, with some honorable exceptions, connive at the traffic, and silently acquiesce in the violation of the laws they are sworn to uphold. Whilst the head of the Government, and many of the most enlightened statesmen of the Empire are believed to consider the slave trade as inimical to the true interests of their country, a greater number profess to be honestly of the opinion that the welfare of Brazil demands the continuance of the trade; and, after defending the traffic on the ground of necessity, many proceed to contend that the condition of the African in meliorated when he becomes a Brazilian slave. However repugnant to the principles of sound political economy, and of enlightened humanity, these doctrines may be, they are very generally entertained by the people of Brazil. When to these impressions is added the tremendous power of the Prince, wielded by those who reap the immediate profits of the traffic it may be inferred that the few who labor for its suppression have very embarrassing obstacles to contend with.

In this unequal struggle between humanity and patriotism on the one hand, and cupidity and imaginary self-interest on the other, the influence of the United States flag is scarcely felt, except in support of the slave dealer—the seizures made by American men-of-war weighing as nothing in the scale with the facilities which our colors afford in the transportation to Africa of slave goods, slave crews, and slave vessels.

Many of our vessels have been seized and sent to the United States, for trial, on a charge of participating in the slave traffic; but how seldom, except when slaves have been absolutely found on board, has a condemnation taken place. Forfeitures scarcely furnish exceptions to the general rule. Having its inception in a distant land, the crime remains unpunished, because a conviction is in a great measure dependent upon as chain of circumstantial evidence, and an intimate familiarity with the mode of conducting the trade, which are alone attainable upon the spot where the offense originated.

Apart from the odium which the participation of our flag and our citizens in the trade brings upon our country, it not unfrequently happens that privates in the United States become sufferers. The case of the bark Herald is an instance in point. Masters and mates of vessls are sometimes seduced into a betrayal of the interests of their employers, and become pirates, in the hope of suddenly accumulating fortunes.—Might not a repetition of outrages similar to those which mark the case of the Herald, seriously endanger the peace of the countries?

A letter addressed by Mr. Gorham Parks, late U. S. Consul at Rio, to Mr. Tod, gives the following important facts:

The number of American vessels which, since the 1st of July, 1844, until the 1st of October, 1849, sailed for the coast of Africa from Rio de Janeiro, is ninety three. Of these vessels, all except five have been engaged in bringing over slaves, and many of them have been captured with the slaves on board. The value of the cargoes it is impossible to ascertain, as the amount of property on which duties are paid at the custom house by no means indicates the true amount carried over. They were all of them load with goods with which to purchase slaves, and with provisions and water for their support on their passage over.

The number of American vessels which have entered from the coast, during the same period, has been fifty-one. The value of imports from Africa, excepting slaves, nothing. There is no trade between either the west or east coast of Africa and Brazil excepting what is connected directly or indirectly with the slave trade.

The English cruisers form the principal impediment to the prosecution of this traffic, and, as our Government does not permit vessels carrying our flag to be searched, our vessels are preferred to most, if not all others, by the slave traders, as offering prefect protection for the traffic from their dreaded enemy.—Tribune.

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE

To the Editors of the North American U. S. Gazette;

LONDON, Dec. 20, 1850.

MR RICHARD COBDEN, the Apostle of Peace, received a challenge on Sunday last from admiral Sir Thomas Hastings, inviting him to fight a duel.

It appears that at the Peace Congress held at Birmingham last month, Mr, Bright, in the course of his speech, ridiculed Sir Thomas, and stated that "the only authority upon which a British Admiral anticipated war between England, and France was the Bishop of Madagascar." Sir Thomas wrote to Mr. Bright and demanded his authority for making such a statement. Mr, Bright replied that Mr. Cobden was his authority. Sir Thomas then wrote to Mr Cobden, calling upon him to state whether, after reperusing his evidence before a Committee of the House of Commons, he could with truth assert that Sir Thomas's sole reason for believing that the hostile feeling of France to England up to 1844, was founded "on an idle story told by the Bishop of Japan." Sir Thomas threatened Mr. Cobden, at the same time, that if he refused to give a satisfactory explanation, he should challenge him to fight a duel! Mr. Cobden received the said challenge on Sunday morning, but he attended divine service, morning, afternoon and evening, as usual, quite undisturbed by Sir Thomas' combustible missives, and not till Wednesday, the 18th did the man of Peace condescend to send a reply to the British Admiral. He then writes—"I understand you to propose that we should lay down our pens and have a personal interview, not to talk over the matter in dispute, but to take our stand at twelve paces apart, with pistols in hand, and endeavor to blow out each other's brains."

Mr. Cobden goes on to say that he is quite satisfied that half an ounce of lead is sufficient of extinguish in a moment all powers to reason, all sense of justice, and every religious sentiment;" and he is at a loss to know how such a process would satisfy him that he had acted unjustly towards Sir Thomas, or convince Sir Thomas of the contrary. Mr. Cobden then states the facts of the case, and re-asserts that Sir Thomas, in giving his evidence before the committee of the House of Commons was requested by Mr. Cobden himself to state upon what authority he assumed that the French nation were eager to go to war with England. Sir Thomas, when pressed closely, quoted, as a proof of the belligerent disposition of the French, "certain warlike sentiments which somebody had heard on board a steamboat fall from the lips of the French Bishop of Japan," (not "Madagascar" as Mr. Bright stated.) Mr. Cobden then advises Sir Thomas that if, unable to restrain the ebullitions of an irascible temper, he must challenge a member of Parliament, merely because another member made a mistake in a single word in a long speech, he had better retire from the public service into his own domestic circle!—American Paper

AFRICAN COLONIZATION.

Speech of Mr Clay

In the United States Senate, on Wednesday, Jan. 15. Mr. Clay rose and said:

Mr PRESIDENT—I have several petitions which I desire to present. Two of them are on the same topic, signed by a large number of citizens of the State of Indiana. The petitioners state that they are anxious to remove from our land the greatest cause of disorder, and to secure the future welfare, harmony and permanency of the Union—having in view an object upon which they believe the great body of all parties and of every section of the country can unite—and respectfully pray that Congress would pass a bill providing means to remove from our country all that portion of the African race who are both willing and ready to emigrate to Africa: also, that suitable provision be made for their real wants for one year after their arrival in Africa; and, as a greater inducement for them to emigrate, that a bounty in land be given them on their arrival upon which they may, with industry and economy, support themselves, and make such other provision as may be most desirable.

I have another, Sir, bearing some analogy to the former, and one which I take particular pleasure in presenting, both on account of the distinguished and respectable source from whence it emanates and on account of the prayer of the petitioners. It is a petition from Rhode Island and is signed by a large number of Senators, and most of the members of the House of Representatives, and by a great number of ex-Governors, ex-Senators, and ex-members of the House of Representatives, as well as by many of the literati of that State, heads of colleges, and by many private persons. This petition, Sir earnestly invites the attention of Congress to take measures for the more effectual suppression of the African salve trade. In their petition, in frightful, but I think not exaggerated colors, they depict the horrors of that trade. They state that the measures which have been adopted by the three great powers—Great Britain, France, and the United States combined—to suppress that trade, by means of keeping a stationary squadron on the coast of Africa have totally failed of accomplishing that object. They say that the only effectual remedy—and, Sir, I am happy to be able to confirm that statement from the records of the American Colonization Society—thus far the only effectual remedy for the suppression of the slave trade has been found to be the establishment of colonies upon the western coast of Africa; that these colonies now occupy about one-third of the western coast of Africa; and so far as they occupy that coast, and wherever they have been planted, there has been an entire and universal suppression of the African slave trade, so far as that portion of country is concerned. They, therefore, sir, pray that a line of steamers may be established, or a line or sailing packets, for the augmenting of the inhabitants of the colnies, with a view to the furtherance of the object they desire to see accomplished.

Mr. President, will the Senate pardon me for availing myself of this occasion to call a few observations upon the general subject? Sir, I did intend, was I before the Senate a few days ago—I think it is No 6—containing the correspondence between our public functionaries at Rio de Janeiro and the Department of State. It well deserves the attentive perusal of every member of this body, and I have given it such. It appears from that document, Sir, that notwithstanding all that has been done by the three great powers to which I before referred, the slave trade is now carried to perhaps a greater extent in the Empire of Brazil than it has ever been before. During the years 1846 1847, 1848, and 1849, within the single province of Rio de Janeiro 178,000 slaves were imported. The number imported into the island of Cuba I do not know, as I have no data before me to show; but I believe that the number is not greatly diminished. It is equally extended in other portions of Brazil, beside the province of Rio de Janeiro.

The document also discloses other facts, which no American can read without profound regret. It shows that this trade in slaves is still carried on to all parts of Brazil from the coast of Africa, chiefly by American vessels. In the course of four or five years past ninety American vessels have declared from the ports of Brazil for the coast of Africa, and most of them returned—several of them were captured—but the most of them however, returned laden with cargoes of slaves. The mode in which they accomplished that object is worthy of some notice. The American vessel is brought in one of the Brazilian ports, but she is to be delivered in an African port. She sails under American colors, is laden with provisions and other appliances adapted to the prosecution of this African slave trade. She passes over the ocean without molestation, because we have very properly, perhaps, refused to the British the right of search—not even admitting it to be exercised by any foreign power whatever in regard to vessels sailing under the American flag, although laden with articles beyond all questions adapted only to the slave trade—and the vessel arrives in safety in an African port. Well, a few days after her arrival, the captain goes on shore, meets with the agent who is to receive the vessel, delivers her papers up to him, and then returns and proclaims to the crew that the vessel has been sold, and, that her crew is to be changed, her flag—the American flag—pulled down, and another one hoisted in its place, in order to carry a cargo of slaves back to Brazil; and these poor American seamen are often left to perish on the inhospitable coast of Africa for want of means to return to their own country, and often compelled to engage in the navigation of the slave vessel, as the only means to get back to their own country.

Mr. President, it has been suggested by some of those who have had great experience in the operation of this effort at a suppression of the slave trade, that certain regulations of commerce should be made; and that, among other reasons, will, induce me, when I conclude the few remarks that I have to make, to make a proposition to refer the whole subject to the Committee on Commerce.—They propose that the grants of sea letters of vessels clearing from the ports of Brazil to the African coast shall be withheld. They declare that there is no trade whatever there, other than that connected with the slave trade, and there could be no motive otherwise to prompt American vessels to go to the African coast. They therefore recommend—our Consuls and other gentlemen recommend—that there should be a refusal henceforward to grant any sea letters or other documents enabling a ship to sail under the American flag from those ports to the coast of Africa—There are other measures also suggested in order to carry into effect the purposes of freeing our commerce and protecting our navigation from any participation in this odious traffic. But I will not take up the time of the Senate by noticing them.

Mr. President, I believe it is the judgment of the British public; as I believe, too, it is judgment of the American public, that the keeping up of squadrons upon the coast of Africa, with a view to the suppression of the slave trade, is a failure; or, at all events, that it is attended with an enormous amount of expense, a vast and inhuman sacrifice of health and life, not justified and not compensated by any value which these squadrons have rendered to the object which the parties have in view in the suppression of the African slave trade. So strong do I think the conviction upon the British mind in relation to this subject to be, that I understand that it was with the utmost difficulty that the British Premier, Lord Palmerston prevailed upon the British Parliament to continue the keeping up of these squadrons a year or two longer. We now keep up, under the eighth article of the treaty of Washington, one squadron, amounting to eighty guns at least, upon the coast of Africa; and we also keep up, in reference to the same object, a large and expensive squadron upon the coast of Brazil. I suppose—though I have not referred to the proper sources for information—but I am quite sure I am safe in saying that we expend upon the two coasts of Brazil and Africa not less than half a million of dollars, independent of that sacrifice of life which takes place in consequence of the employment of our vessels there. I will not say, as has been said in this petition, that there has been a total failure. I believe there have been occasional captures, but there has been used a great degree of stimulus given to the [illegible] I do not say much whether there would be [illegible] African life if there were any [illegible] the slave trade by means of these squadrons, the result of which is merely to employ and send out more ships—to induce the owners to run more chances and take more risks, in order to transport slaves to Brazil or to Cuba from the coast of Africa.

I believe there is no effectual remedy for the suppression of the slave trade but the occupation of the coast of Africa itself, and to stop the trade at the very threshold where it begins. By the 8th article of the treaty of Washington to which I have before referred we were bound to continue these squadrons only for a period of five years. The five years have long since elapsed—they expired in '47—and yet we continue the squadron down to this time. Now, without reference to any of the objects which I have thought proper to present to the Senate, with a regard to the suppression of the slave trade, with a reference to the advancement of the great interests of colonization, I think, as a mere measure of financial economy, it is worth considering whether we shall expose the lives of our gallant seamen upon the inhospitable coast—expose them to the danger of that inhospitable climate, at such a vast expense to our shipping, and with so little benefit from the operation.

But I own that the subject of colonization, important as I think it is, in view of the great object of the suppression of the slave trade, commends itself to my mind by other and additional considerations. I declare to you, Sir—I may perhaps be extravagant in my views—but I think, of all the projects of the age, there is none which is to be compared to that great project of transporting the free people of color, with their own consent, from the United States to the coast of Africa. What is to be done with them? I ask again, what is to be done with them? They are here under our very noses; and in this District in the course of the last ten years they have doubled. In a number of the States laws are being passed—rigorous laws—of exclusion of them from their Territory. Some States, indeed, are introducing into their fundamental laws, into their Constitutions, provisions against the reception of any free people of color within their borders. What is to become of them? I ask again. In the name of humanity and justice, what is to become of them? I see no other remedy than that of sending them back to the land where their ancestors were taken; and I can conceive of no interest of any portion of the people of the United States that will not be benefited by such a transfer of the free people of color from the United States to Africa. The whites at the North will be benefited—the whites at the South will be benefited—the Slaves at the South will be benefited—the poor creatures themselves will be benefited; for instead of remaining in a country where they never can be elevated to the high social and political condition of the whites—where they must forever remain a degraded, corrupt, and dissolute class—they can be carried to the country of their ancestors, and rise into an importance there which they never will attain here. Every conceivable interest will be promoted—commerce will be promoted, civilization will be promoted, religion will be promoted by the transfer of the free people of color, with their own consent, from the United States to Africa. And what portion of the population of the country will be injured by the transportation of free persons? None whatever.

Sir, I will not detain the Senate longer upon this subject. I would be extremely glad if the honorable Senators would turn their attention to the executive document to which I have referred, and give some consideration to the suggestions I have made. Ah! if we could only give up—if we could only renounce—these unhappy subjects of agitation which have disturbed our country so long and so greatly—if the people of the North would only allow the people of the South to manage their own domestic affairs in their own way, unaffected and unimpeded by them—if they would only reflect that if slavery is fraught with evils, the evils are not felt by the people at the North, but they are confined to the South where the slaves are—if they would only cease to agitate each other and our country, and endanger our Union itself, by continuing these unhappy subjects of strife and controversy, and all would came together upon this great common object, in which the free States are just as much interested as the slave States, uniting all our energies in sending the free people of color from the shores of America to that place where they can enjoy real freedom, and pursue their own happiness—what a glorious result would it be for our country!

Sir, I beg pardon for this occupation of the time of the Senate. I move to dispense with the reading of the petitions, and that they be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

They were accordingly so referred

From the New York Daily "Tribune."

AFRICAN COMMERCE.

The Colonization Journal for January, contains several carefully prepared tables giving an interesting view of the commerce which England and the United States carry on with Africa. This commerce is already large, and, more than any other, is capable of being indefinitely increased. During fifteen years ending with 1841, the imports of England from the West Coast of Africa, amounted to nearly fourteen millions and a half of dollars, or nearly one million yearly. The principal articles were gum senegal and ivory, of each of which above a quarter of a million of dollars were imported yearly. Next to these in importance were beeswax palm oil, teak and other woods, hides, rice, spices and coffee. During the same period the exports of British goods to the same region [illegible] a little more than twenty-three and a half millions of dollars, or a little a million and a half yearly. The heaviest item of these was manufactured cottons, of which the average value of $664 084 was taken yearly throughout the whole period. Next to this arms and ammunition were in demand, the exportations in this being to the amount of $446,000 yearly. Among the other items, were [illegible] articles of iron and steel yearly, $70,555; [illegible] slaves, $53 419; hardware and cutlery $48 315; haberdashery articles, $42 214, [illegible] per manufactures $41,451; salt, $26,203; soap and candles $12,751; &c. &c. And for sixteen years the British exports of foreign articles amounted to nearly half a million of dollars yearly, the larger portion of which consisted of India cottons, though near one fifth of the same was tobacco, produced in Maryland and Virginia. And since the year 1841 the trade between England and Africa has become considerably larger. From 1839 to 1844 inclusive, M'Culloch estimates the exports to the Western Coast at $2 300 000 a year and to the whole of Africa at $7 000 000, a year, and his figures are probably under, rather than over the truth.

The trade of the United States looks small compared with the above. In the six years ending with 1849 we had of African produce the value of three millions three hundred thousand dollars, or more than half a million yearly. The largest item in the list is hides and skins, of which we have taken yearly $182 556; next to this is [illegible] $36 778, ivory $18,083; coffee $16 203; [illegible] $18,470; rice $8 589; camwood $3 214; dates $3 436, &c. &c. During the same time we have exported to Africa yearly $643 136 of our own products and $69 833 of foreign merchandize. The chief [illegible] tobacco $151,195, cotton fabrics $148;998 [illegible] $107,953, gunpowder $52 997 flour $43,419, &c. &c.

The fact that both Great Britain and the United States export a great deal more in value to Africa than they receive thence is striking. The British imports from Africa during the seven years above mentioned were $14 421 569; the exports to Africa $23 636 086,—the former amounting to less than two thirds the value of the latter. So with the United States; in the six years referred to, the exports to Africa were $4 923,824, while the imports from there were [illegible] $3,317 572, a difference of more a million. In the case of England this difference may easily be accounted for by the fact that the bullion brought from Africa in that country is not included in the returns, and by the heavy expenditures made by the government for naval establishments kept up in Africa. These expenditures are made in the form of bills of Exchange which go back in payment for cargoes of goods. But in the case of the United States there is not such a reason for the discrepancy, which it must be remembered does not include the profits made by our dealers on the ventures they send out. Our ships no doubt, spend money on the coast, but not enough to cover the difference in speculation, and we are driven to suppose that is it covered by bills drawn in payment for slaves sent to Cuba or Brazil.

The facts above set forth indicate very plainly the extent to which our commerce with Africa is capable of being developed. The principal article of British trade with that Continent is manufactured Cotton, whose raw material is of American production, and in whose fabrication in the mode in which it is there demanded, we are able to compete with the world. There is no good reason why that business should not be enlarged ten-fold, nor why we should do the greater part of it. Let us once have the means of regular and rapid communication with the Western Coast and we shall see our markets enriched with new and valuable commodities, while a steady and ever extending demand is opened for the products of our labor. It is impossible to estimate the benefits which the United States may derive from this source if we only have enterprise enough to seize upon the opportunity. The country which first connects itself with Africa by a sufficient line of steamships will inevitably gain possession of this great and inviting trade. If we do not do it at once, England will be ahead of us.

Nor should we forget the many considerations adding to this enterprise other than those of a commercial nature. We are persuaded that nothing which we could now do would tend so powerfully to the suppression of the Slave Trade and the civilization of Africa. There are universal ends whose importance in the career of the human race cannot be over-estimated. This undertaking would stand to make a serious and efficient effort toward their realization.

The Central Africa Exploring expedition.

Intelligence has been received in England, from the Saharan African expedition up to the 29th of August. The expedition had literally fought its way up to Solonfeet in Aheer, near to the territory of the Kaloonee Prince Ben Saur, to whom it is recommended. Mr. Richardson had been obliged to ransom his life and those of his fellow travellers twice. The whole population of the Northern districts of Aheer had been raised against the expedition, together with the bandits and robbers who infest the region of the Sahara. The travellers are now in comparative security. It was a tremendous undertaking for them to force their way among tribes who had never seen the face of a Christian, and who look upon Christians as the declared enemies of God. The great Soudan route, from Ghat to Aheer, is now explored

A stuttering Vermonter was asked the way to Vaturbury. With great politeness he strove to say that it was right ahead, but in vain. The more he tried the more he couldn't. At last, red in the face, and furious with unavailable exertion, he burst forth with —"Gug-gug-go-'long! you'll gig-g-git there afore I can tell ye!"

ISAIAH AND NAPOLEON

In reading the accounts of the funeral of Napoleon we were no little interested by the correspondence of one part of the pageant with a passage in the prophecy of Isaiah, in relation to the king to Babylon. The general applicability of that most magnificent denunciation to the history of the Mighty Modern, has been frequently noticed; and even Lord Byron, of whom it has been said by, perhaps, his most gifted eulogist, that he —"Stooped to take up the loftiest thought,"— was happy to borrow from it nobler ideas than his own highest flights could otherwise command;—but who ever imagined that a visible realization would yet so strangely occur, of the most remarkable scene in the prophetic description? Of many of the persons named in the subjoined paragraph, it would have been impossible, unless their bodies had been originally embalmed with Egyptian skill, and recently discovered and identified, to have made more accurately conform to the representation of the sentence from their tombs to welcome the Conqueror. True, the designs were different. The thought aroused the departed for the utterance of taunt and scorn; and the Parisians paraded the statues for purposes of pomp and honor; but the thought of the dead receiving the dead—the reduction of the nations of strength to the ghastly condition of the first and weakest—is the main element of sentiment exerted by the show. The following is the extract to which we refer:—

"A little before one, the head of the procession was seen coming slowly forward, and the sight became gradually more and more beautiful. Here it is necessary to give a short description of the ground facing from the quay to the principal entrance of the Invalides. It consists in a long straight avenue, at the bottom of which, with its back to the water, stood the colossal statue of the principal monarch that France has produced, and that immortality has already claimed as her own

"It certainly was a noble idea to make Napoleon pass through this long line of heroes and of kings, who seemed, as it were, to welcome the Mighty Dead—the equal of the highest in rank, the superior of the most celebrated in renown, to the illustrious asylum chosen for his mortal remains."

In connection with this, read the following from the prophet Isaiah, 14th chapter, from the 9th to the 17th verses, inclusive:—

"Hell (the grave) from beneath is moved for thee to meet thee at thy coming: it stirreth up the dead for thee, even all the chief ones of the earth; it hath raised up from their thrones all the kings of the nations. All they shall speak, and say unto thee, Art thou also become weak as we? art thou become like unto us? Thy pomp is brought down to the grave, and the noise of thy viols; the worm is spread under thee, and the worms cover thee. How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning? how art thou cut down to the ground, which didst weaken the nations! For thou hast said in thine heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God; I will sit also upon the mount of the congregation in the sides of the north; I will ascend above the heights of the clouds; I will be like the Most High. Yet thou shalt be brought down to hell, to the sides of the pit. They that see thee shall narrowly look upon thee, and consider thee, saying, Is this the man that made the earth to tremble, that did shake kingdoms; That made the world as a wilderness, and destroyed the cities thereof; that opened not the house of his prisoners?"

THE GUTTA PERCHA TRADE.

Previous to 1814, the very name of gutta percha was unknown to European commerce. In that year 2 cwts of it were shipped experimentally from Singapore. The exportation of gutta percha from there in 1815 to 100 piculs; (the picul is 133 1-3 lbs.); in 1816, to 5,361; in 1817, to 9,293; in the first seven months of 1848, to 6,769 piculs. In the first four and a half years of the trade, 21,586 piculs of gutta percha valued at 274,190 dollars, were shipped at Singapore; the whole of which was sent to England, with the exception of 15 piculs to Mauritius, 170 to the continent of Europe, and 922 to the United States.

But the rapid growth of the new trade conveys only a faint idea of the commotion it created among the native inhabitants of the Indian Archipelago. The jungles of the Johore where the scene of the earliest gatherings, and they were soon ransacked in every direction by parties of Malays and Chinese, while the indigenous population gave themselves up to it with a unanimity and zeal only to be equalled by that which made railway jobbers of every man, woman, and child in England about the same time. The Tumangong, with the usual policy of oriental governors, declared the precious gum government monopoly. He reserved to himself a large part of the profits, and sold the Malays a right to stimulate them to pursue it apace, and to gain from 100 to 400 per cent. for themselves on what the procured from the aborigines. The Tamangong, not satisfied with buying at his own price all that was collected by private enterprise, sent out numerous parties of from 10 to 100 persons, and employed whole tribes of hereditary serfs in the quest of gutta percha.

This disorganized body of gum-hunters spread itself like a flood of locusts over the whole of Johore, peninsular and insular. They crossed the frontier into Lingo, but there the sultan was not long in discovering the new value that had been conferred upon his jungles. He confiscated the greater part of what had been collected by the interlopers, and, in emulation of the Tamangong, decreed gutta percha a royalty.

The knowledge of the article, stirring the avidity of gatherers, gradually spread from Singapore, northward as far as Penang, southward along the east coast of Sumatra to Java, eastward to Borneo, where it was found at Brune, Sarawak, and Pontianak on the west coast, at Koti and Passir on the east. The imports of gutta percha into Singapore, from the 1st of January to the 12th of June, 1848, according to their geographical destination, were:—From the Malay Peninsula, 593 piculs; from the Johore Archipelago, 1,269; from Sumatra, 1,005; from Batavia, 19; from Borneo, 55. The price at Singapore was originally 8 dollars per picul; it rose to 24, and fell about the middle of 1848 to 13.

The commotion among the human race in the Archipelago was great, but the vegetable kingdom suffered much more. In the course of two and a half years, 270,000 trees were destroyed.—Mechanics' Magazine, London.

ANECDOTE OF FLETCHER.

A young minister of the Wesleyan church in England, receiving his first appointment to the circuit, which included the town of Mold, was invited by the influential family of Rev. John Fletcher, to stay a week or two in visiting Mold. Inquire for Mr. Fletcher's residence, and on riding up to the house, he called for his horse to be taken by a servant, as he supposed, in ordinary clothes, met the summons.

"Is this Mr. Fletcher's residence?"

"It is, Sir."

"My name is ——, the junior preacher for the circuit."

"Yes, sir, the family have been expecting you. Dismount, and walk in."

"No, my man; I make it an invariable rule to see my horse attended to first; take him to the stable, get your curry-comb and brush, and brush and curry him down."

The old man, in compliance with his directions, performed all the various duties of a hostler.

"Now, give him his provender, and I'll go into the house."

"Walk in, sir; take a seat."

Looking around, and seeing no one but the old hostler, he inquired—

"Where is Mr. Fletcher?"

"I am Mr. Fletcher."

His surprise and mortification can better be imagined than described; but the excellent Mr. Fletcher told him not to distress himself, but let it be a lesson for the future not to infer, because a man wears manly clothing at home, he must be an hostler.

The Lowa Lead Mines near Dubuque are yielding finely, but there is not one steam engine employed in them.

For the Liberia Herald.

Monrovia June 1851.

Mr. Herald. Allow me if you please to have the use of a short space in your paper for the remarks which I am now scribling, refering to the grand and imposing celebration by the agriculturists of our county on the 20th ult: you may remember that the friends favorable to the re-election of Joseph J. Roberts to the Presidency—residing on the St. Paul's, notified their friends in this town, of their intention, on the receipt of the election returns from Sinoe—for it was known that Sinoe could not possibly give Judge Benedict a sufficient majority to equal Robert's majority in this and Bassa County—to come down and congratulate President Roberts. Sure enough on the morning of the 20th ulto: about 8 of the clock, a most interesting sight presented itself to the Monrovians—a scene more imposing I never saw. Some forty canoes gaily decorated with flags and pennants, and containing an hundred and twenty five or thirty persons, rounded the point in sight of the town, and displayed themselves for nearly half an hour, in sight of hundreds of men women and children, who had been called by the beating of drums blowing of horns, and other musical instruments by those in the canoes, to the brink of the hill to witness the exciting demonstration.

Another half hour elapsed before the fleet of canoes neared the wharves—in this time a procession was formed and marched to the wharf where it was intimated the friends would land, a large concourse followed the procession and kept time with the exhilerating band of music which led the way. All now was commotion—the greatest anxiety prevailed up town. Ladies were obtaining prominent places in windows, doors and piazzas, on streets where it was supposed the procession would pass. As the fleet of canoes neared the wharf—the welkin was made to ring with the continued hurrah for Roberts from land and river. In the excitement a canoe containing four young men capsized; they fearing nothing, were astride on the bottom of their frail vessel waiving their hats and adding to the hundreds of voices "hurrah for Roberts" All safely landed—the procession was formed under the direction of Sion Harriss & John Jamison Esqrs: of Caldwell. each man bearing an emblem a sprig or some other vegatable substance denoting his occupation. From the wharf the procession marched up town and paraded Broad street: among the Monrovians who joined the procession was to be seen, Gen. Lewis, Colonels Yates, and Mc Gill, and Capt. G Moore. At every corner the welkin was made to ring "hurrah for Roberts and his administration"—the whole town was alive, and the procession which numbered some hundreds neared the government House & formed a square. The President was escorted out by a committee—and listend to an address by H. W. Erskine Esqr:—it was truly patriotic—and I hope the address with the reply of President Roberts will appear in the columns of the Herald. As the President is being escorted back to the house, hundreds of voices proclaimed him the people's favorite. After leaving the President's House, the procession again paraded the streets; and at about 11 of the clock formed at the opposite the State House, and dismissed at 1 of the clock when they would meet in the cool of the afternoon that had been prepared for them by their friends. In the meanwhile squads of the friends visited through the town—the doors of all favorable to the administration party were open to receive them: and refreshments were indulged with more than ordinary liberality.

By 12 o'clock scores of ladies from the settlements up the river and of Monrovia, waited on Mrs. Roberts, and remained with her till late in the evening—a sumptuous repast was laid out for them by Mrs. R. When the procession again formed, it was marched to the government House, a committee was sent in to invite the President to attend their lunch he consented and was escorted to the table. The President enjoyed himself to the satisfaction of all. While partaking of the repast, arrangements were making to pull the President round town in a Gig—when the President heard this, he earnestly remonstrated against it—again and again, he begged the committee appointed by the hundreds to let him retire quietly home. "To day said they, belong to us. You are in our charge and out you will we wish". He was taken up and placed in the Gig. Mr. Erskine, the Orator of the day, took a seat by him—and then commenced the hurrahs of hundreds. Drums, fifes horns and other musical instruments, and hundreds of highly delighted friends followed the Gig. The President was carried in this way through the town. About 4 of the clock they carried him home, when he invited the entire procession to walk in and take a glass of wine. After night fall hundreds of ladies and gentlemen assembled at the President's and remained till nearly midnight to witness the fire works set off under the direction of my friend Colonel Yates. Many were the patriotic songs sung by the ladies. All left well pleased. I forgot to mention, that in the early part of the day, a score of rounds from a brass nine pounder were fired. And to close my journal let me record a fact, that not a fight took place.

I am dear Mr Herald.

MONROVIA

For the Liberia Herald.

MY COMPLAINT.

Mr. Herald—I am requested to ask you, if it is really true, that you have sworn on top of the Holy Evangelist, and 'clicked 'dem book' that you never intend to give us admittance into your columns'

We thought we were a part of this little, yet precious Republic. The school of liberty, and our hope of equality and freedom. We feel so still, and are proud that we have a heart to feel,—and feel more keenly than you, Mr. Herald, in your partial distributions of attention: think.

In the late electioneering campaign, when the inhabitants on Stockton Creek, went almost "enmasse" for a change, following the "New Boys;" and it is said, the codfish and mackerel fish too, "and all these things," had taken, & put our country's heart into the bottom of Stockton Creek, and piled upon it thirty one great stones, and had damned up the Stockton Creek, so that its waters could not pass. This great dam, was seen just off New Georgia!

Who plunged into the waters, and with patriotic fire, that could not be quenched, even by the waters of the dam itself. Who hurled these stones to the four winds?—lifted Liberia's noblest son from the flood—set the waters of the Old Stockton to flowing happily on it's way again? It was St. Paul's River Sons? who shouted louder and longer, and triumphed more justly, when Grand Bassa, built the golden chariot—Sinoe sent forth her fiery horses, and Junk gave a driver and our senator a seat? Who is ready to do so as often as Old Rocky Bay state, has made at the ballot box, Gov. Brigs their sovereign servant. St. Paul's River boys.

I want talk about my cotton, and sugar cane, and ginger,—my many new coffee nurseries my growing rice, my country,—her constitution, her laws,—the humbug of the county, its hopes & fears:—and we have a right to do so; and do so through the Herald. Four times we tried, and tried in vain. The last time I called upon you: I called several of my wisest and most sturdy sons, to throw in our mites together. But you scornfully and unceremoniously drove us off. Neither patriotism no party, nor war, nor peace, will avail for us with you. When our Senator passed by during the session of our last Legislature, and pulled a bill out of his hat, which he said his Monrovia brother would "touch off and fix." Making you the spokesman of the people, and if you chose, as you were full of the administration too, I felt proud to know our men and yours,—our men were among the best friends of your existence. But, poor me, like Mordica in in the King's gate; all this avail us nothing. I do wish to be an angel in the way of Balaam, if I can.—And if the Herald must be the long eared speaker to this bad prophet, I will be glad, and if you are just, you will. I do not quarrel with you as a press, as paper, as ink and type. As such, you are ours, and just and true enough; we only do not like some of your fish and flesh dealings. But do you think I like your treatment to me? —when true as gospel I no change, and went faithfully the whole ticket: having counted our forces, and wanted to "talk our part too;' especially while you and that beardy boy of yours, that courageous "Alpha" had been clubbing and beating the opposition head and heals—and were being banged with the broomstics and pipe-stems of retaliation, especially after showing our say to so a great friend, who even showed it to very head of the opposition; and though hard, was still fairer and softer towards him, and his, than the fighting of my proud victory feeling, hard-headed, hard-hearted and hardly brother "Alpha" who even yet swells with triumph, and would chase the very ghosts of the slain, beyond the regions of retaliation, when you add insult to refusal to duty, and call us "every body," saying "every body" cannot be heard through "every bodies' sheet?"

Sir you are out of your head, if you think we do not know you. I know you well. You are two things at once, and ought to be so:—that is a great horn blower, and a some thing like a Scottish bag pipe. I know you must be filled with wind to sound, and send forth music: and when the great, the true, the small, if I must call him democratic wig patrician is not home. That boys, and weaked lunged foul goosed men must try their narrow strains. We could tell the difference were we awake at midnight. You sounding forth this day, June the 4th, is like the trump of resurrection, and your bag pipe like harpers, harping upon their harps. But he that filled you when you drove me off, was like a year old child with a papaw whistle, or a donkey with a cornstork fiddle.

I did not believe you either, when you grew all at once so verp religious -so full of charity as to call the gentlemen you had just been waring with "distinguished," and fell to kissing of them. You either acted cowardly—or you feared not to use the tyrant's wand; so common toward us, and deny us the liberty of speech. Whether we were long or short, rough or smooth, any thing original would have been better than those old world beaten, nine varina rate, scale mouldy and rusty things, that do come very often, no body could write longer, colder or duller; and the world would know who was who, so as not to blame you any more than you are blamed - To deny us the liberty you take. know my language is course and rough, and it is ours, it suits us, and not you and you are wholly mistaken, if you think we up this way, do not in our own way, wish to say our say;" we do not like this being accounted as voiceless, as heathens, as outcasts, as transports —no, we do not, we are none of those, we are Liberians, friends to the present administration, and fearless friends,—friends to the Herald that has no right to muzzle us so long as we have a law to protect the liberty, and punish the licentiousness of the Press.

Yours &c.

ST. PAUL'S RIVER.

Reply— We feel hurted. We are sadly out of humour and when we say as much, our friend and correspondent "St. Paul's River" will understand us as having not only expressed our feeling. St. Paul's River accuses us of partiality in our administration of the pa per—that we had uncere moniously refused him his say —but we have been too religious—too full of charity—read farming to kissing our enemies, and that we acted cowardly, or feared not to use the tyrant's wand so common towards us, and deny us the liberty of speech.' While we thank Mr. "St. Paul's River"—(this is a long an odd name we wish it could be changed) for the credit he gives us: We beseech you pitifully to be merciful unto us. We are proud to own you as our friend and the friends of the administration. We do not remember one instance when we forgot or neglect our cause.

It is true Mr St. Paul's River we did for reasons which we thought consistent, decline publishing your last say. We said to you that we thought it was not proper or manly to continue to belabor an enemy after he had been fairly "demolished," and we had hoped that you and our friends generally would have appreciated our motive. But it seems we done wrong—we will try to learn our startling with you, and our hardy friends up in your regions. Talk to them, and tell them we intended them no disrespect, that we are as strong minded as ever; and if an occasion offers we will be found at our post. We freely award to the hardy sons of the St. Paul's, all that is their due. They proved themselves strong friends for "no change," they done right. It is their duty as it is ours, to maintain a good government. Every day convinces us, of man's inconsistency "St. Paul's River," now that the election is over, and no opposing party above ground to battle with, he must need quarrel with us, like his friend "Alpha." And why are we thus so severely lectured and censured? Because for sooth we preach peace and good will to man." All we ask is, to give us an enemy to fight, we speak of those who are always ready to complain, idle their time in talking politicks, and abusing the people's chosen officers, when if matters were in their hands confusion only would reign.

In conclusion we pray our correspondent, in future, not to condemn us, before being sure that we have laid ourselves open for rebuke.

JAMES K. STRAW.

Monrovia Feby:—1851

We are happy in being able to state that there is now a pretty fair prospect of settling the difficulties, and terminating the war, for some time existing, between Prince Boyer, of Trade-Town, and Jim Flaw, of Trade-Town Point. A few weeks since, Hon: S. A. Benson; was Commissioned, by this Government, to proceed to Trade-Town, for the purpose of arranging their disputes, and reconciling the above parties.

The following is from Mr. Benson's report, addressed to the President,

"Sir:—On the 19th inst: (April), in company with Captain Straw, who was good enough to give me a passage on board his Cutter "Georgiana," I proceeded to Trade-Town; and on the 21st, I had an interview with King Boyer, and explained to him the object of my Mission. He proposed to call his Chiefs, during the after noon and evening, and lay the subject before them and early the next day give me the result of their deliberations Accordingly the following morning, as early as Court etiquet would allow, I called on King Boyer, He stated that there were several onstacles in the way of a reconciliation between him and Jim Flaw; and that he had strong objections to the cessation of hostilities —the principal one was that, he could not be satisfied so long as Black Will Flaw's ally, remained in the country. I told him that this, and other matters in ispute would be amicably adjusted, no doubt, to the satisfaction of all concerned, but that you had directed me to say to him distinctly that hostilities between him and Jim Flaw must cease from the time of my arrival at his place, and announcement of your determination to put an end to the war, therefore it was no use to talk further about continuing the war; the first aggression he now committed, would call down upon him the displeasure of the Government and would be punished severely. I informed him that I was then authorized to act as umpire between him and Jim Flaw; but if he were not prepared to enter upon an arrangement of the difficulties, I assured him you would appoint suitable persons to investigate, and settle the matters in dispute at any time when he and Flaw were ready to meet them. To this, he finally consented; and requested that he and Flaw might meet on board some vessel—the Government schooner Lark, if you had no objection —in the course of five or six weeks, when the whole cause of difference between them might be arranged

On the 26th I visited Jim Flaw, and communicated to him all that I had said to Boyer. I found Flaw both civil and intelligent;—by far Boyer's superior in these respects. He expressed much gratification, that you had interposed to settle the war: Though Boyer had not, and could not "beat" him in war, yet he was not disposed for war—and would readily yield to your orders, to have the difficulties settled by arbitrators. and pledged himself and all that he is worth, not to be guilty of any act of aggression against Boyer—but should be prepared to defend himself against any attack by Boyer—and sent word immediately to all his interior towns, to instruct his people not to interrupt any of Boyer's people, except in defence of their persons or property.

He told me, however, that I need put but little dependence in what Boyer had promised—that he was too much like Grando—the scoundrel of Fishtown—whose word could not be confided in; that as soon as I was gone, he expected Boyer would be at his old tricks, and depend upon lying himself clear. But if Boyer committed any aggression upon him or his people, he would either come himself, or send a canoe immediately to me with the intelligence.

With respect to Mr. Straw, he said he had determined to detain his oil, and to put his Krogmen in chains if they attempted to land at his place, to take it off—but in obedience to your orders, and due respect to the laws of the Republic, he would not interrupt Capt. Straw or his people." It appears that, some months ago, Captain Straw had employed on board his vessel a man belonging to Jim Flaw's town, and while lying off Trade-Town, the man was seized by some of Boyer's people and carried on shore. For this Jim Flaw wished to hold Captain Straw responsible.—Ed.

"I returned to Trade-Town, and had another interview with Boyer, before leaving for home. I told him Flaw's willingness to meet him, and have their difficulties arranged, and requested him to notify me when he would be ready to meet the Commissioners. He now told me plainly that hostilities between him and Jim Flaw would cease, but he would promise no man that he would not figh Black Will, let the consequences be what they might.

I told him that he might depend upon it, if he struck a blow against either Jim Flaw or Black Will, you would aid with troops to drive him out of the country and restore peace.—This was a quietus. Jim Flaw had told me that nothing but fear of being visited by a military force would restrain him—So it proved. He will send me word what time he will meet the Commissioners—and I hope you will allow the Lark to take them to Trade-Town."

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, JUNE 18th, 1851.

Sinoe County.—We are gratified to learn that no new case of small pox has occurred among the immigrants, landed at Greenville, from the brig "Alida." Nearly the whole of them have had an attack of African fever; and, except four children that have died, are now convalescent. Their lands have been promptly assigned to them by the Society's Agent; and already they have entered upon their farms, and have made considerable improvements. One of the company, we learn, has constructed a pretty large size boat, propelled, ingeniously, by paddle wheels, to ply on the river between the various settlements. We sincerely hope that he enterprising proprietor will be suitably patronized—as the facility will doubtless, be the means of preventing many casualties, hitherto so common, by the upsetting of canoes, on the Sinoe river.

—The immigrants by the barque Baltimore, were landed in good health, and in fine spirits. They are represented as being generally intelligent, and possessed, more or less, of considerable property, and upon the whole, considered a great acquisition to the county. One gentleman has a steam saw mill of twenty horse power. This looks like going a head. We could wish, however, he had selected a mill of less power and dimensions. The same difficulty, pretty much exists here that caused Mr. Jefferson to abandon his project of a saw mill "on a mountain high" near Monticello. We do not mean to say, however, that even this formidable difficulty may not be overcome.

Mr. Murray, it appears, has received instructions from Mr. McLain, to take measures for forming a new settlement at Blue Barre, to be occupied by emigrants from Louisiana, under the auspices of the Louisiana State Colonization Society.

—A week or two since, two men belonging to Greenville, returning from an excursion in the Sino County, where they had been in quest of cassado sticks, missed their way, and after rambling in the forest for some time, came upon a little village in the Grand Bontuw territory, where they remained for the night. Early the following morning, they obtained a guide and started for home. They had not proceeded far before the guide, who was armed to the teeth, turned upon them, robbed them of their clothes &c, &c., beat and cruelly wounded one of them, a Mr Nisbet; the other escaped by taking to his heels. The fellow is known; and we trust will be apprehended and severely punished.

—A week or two ago, the sloop Skimmer, owned by Mr. S. Narrington, Greenville, was driven on shore by stress of weather, at King Will's Town Nanna Kroo. The sloop, it appears, was but little injured, and sanguine hopes were entertained of getting her off. At first the natives, apparently, were disposed to assist the crew in saving the property: their cupidity, however, prevailed—they pronounced it a God send, and seized the vessel and cargo. They must be taught better.

Gum Elastic.—We would call the attention of our merchants, and other citizens to the importance of encouraging the gathering of this article as an item of Liberian Commerce. We notice that the consumption of Gum Elastic has increased enormously in the United States, within the last few years, and the price has risen from 15 and 20 cents to 45 and 50 cents per pound. Now it is known that in some parts of Liberia the India Rubber tree is found in great numbers.

Rev Mr. Finney, some years ago, on his excursion into the interior from Settra Kroo, says that he "found them numerous, and was told that they were to be found in great abundance in that part of the country." We believe such to be the case. Then why not invite the attention of the natives to this new branch of commerce for Liberia? We are satisfied that it would prove a profitable baisness to any enterprising man who will engage in it.

The gum may be gathred in any way, and sold in any form, if it be only pure from other substances. One way is to make an incision in the tree, insert a spout, and let the juice flow into a small vessel. A man goes round from one tree to another with a larger vessel once a day, or oftener, and collects the juice from as many trees as he may have taped; which he places into a larger vessel, and as it dries, works it into what form he pleases. A ball or cake is as good a form as that of a shoe; it may afterwards be dissolved and put into any other form for use. Another method of procuring gum elastic is to dig around the roots of the trees and find the gum that has exuded; which is called "virgin gum," but sells, we believe, at the same price as other gum. We think that some of our citizens might do well to start this business; and we do hope that some of them will soon give it a trial.

Grand Bassa County.—We learn that the health of the volunteers at the new settlement, Grand Bassa Point, continues good—and that they are busily engaged in clearing and planting their farms; and making preparations for the accommodation of new comers. In addition to the important commercial facilities the Cove affords:—The location is said to be an extremely healthy one. A week or two since, late at night, a fire broke out in a house occupied by Mr. John Page, and for some hours, spread with fearful rapidity—indeed so alarming was the progress of the flames that fears were entertained, by almost all the settlers, that the whole village would be destroyed. It was, however, arrested by great exertion; and five houses only were totally consumed.

—An exploring party, headed by Judge Benson, has just returned from an excursion to the mountain region, in search of a suitable location for a settlement to be formed under the auspices of the New Jersey Colonization Society. The country is represented as being fertile, well wooded and watered, and the inhabitants exceedingly friendly, and, in their general appearance and intelligence, quite superior to the natives near the coast. Judge Benson has selected, we are told, a commanding, and in every respect, beautiful site for the proposed town, some 30 or 40 miles in the rear of Bexley.

—The Grand Bassa Chiefs express great satisfaction at the expulsion of Grando, from Fishtown. The fellow is now wandering about the country, friendless and homeless: his own people discard him. Such is the reward of his misdoings.

—Will Buckler, of Grand Corrow, is again assuming a hostile attitude towards the people of Timbo. He must be taught to respect his obligations to this government—or to share the fate of Mr. Grando.

We heard it remarked the other day—"It is no disgrace to be poor,—No, but it is exceedingly inconvenient." was the prompt reply. And we regret to learn that the Building Committe of the M. E. Church, in this place, are now experiencing a little of this inconvenience; the walls of their new Church edifice were leveled off some weeks ago; and we hoped ere this to have seen the roof on. We are informed, however, that the Committee, for the want of funds, have been compelled, for the present to discontinue the work. We are sorrow, for a suitable place of worship is very much needed by the congregation; and we sincerely hope that the committee may soon be relieved from this pecuniary embarrassment, and that the work may be speedily resumed and completed. The committee are expecting, perhaps hoping, to receive some assistance from their methodist brethren in the United States. We trust they may not be disappointed. Such assistance would be most opportune. And who, of the Lord's Stewards, in America, will refuse a dollar—to aid in building up the cause of Christianity in benighted Africa!—We would say to the Committee be not discouraged—The work is the Lord's.

June 16th.—Arrived U. S. Brig Perry Captain A. H. Foote, 9 days from St. Helena—all well. The Perry brings the gratifying intelligence that the Slave Trade is on its last legs on the South Coast. This result, in a great measure, has been produced by the visits of the Perry to that coast, and the indefatigable zeal of Capt. Foote, in co-operating with Her Majesty's Squadron; and preventing the prostitution of the American flag to cover the nefarious traffic. Deprive the slavers of the use of the "Stars and Stripes, and their trade is at an end. The Perry sails to day for Porto Praya.

POETRY.

LET ME SMILE WHILE I CAN.

Let me smile while I can—there are moments of sadness
Which steal o'er the heart like a cloud o'er the sky;
And dimmed for a while is the sunshine of gladness,
And tears follow fast as the rain from on high.

Let me smile while I can—in life's rosiest bowers,
The flowers are always entwined with the thorns;
And how often it is the same evening sky lowers,
Which dawned on the brightest and loviest of morns.

Let me smile while I can—why should we deplore them,
The dead who are gone to their long silent home;
We know not how soon the eyes that weep o'er them,
May shed the same bitter drops over our tomb.

Let me smile while I can—there are moments of sorrow,
Too numerous by far for our moments of joy—
And none from the past or the present may borrow,
One hour unmixed with grief's bitter alloy

THE MAN OF BUSINESS.

"Husband," said Mrs. Hunter, as she was seated at the breakfast table with the father of her children. "I wish you could find time to give a little attention to William. He has nothing to do, and, in consequence, passes his time with boys, from whom he will not likely to learn anything good."

"My dear," replied Mr. Hunter, "my time is at present so constantly occupied, that I cannot see to him. As soon as I can find time to make some inquiries about a school, I will do so. He shall have the best advantages for education which the country affords."

"I am afraid he will be ruined before you will get time to find a school. He has got to be so large now, that he needs the restraint of a father's hand."

"If you can satisfy yourself as to what school it is best to send him to, I will rely upon your judgment, and he shall go as soon as you can get him ready."

"I know nothing 'bout schools, you must select a school for him. But, in the meantime, could you not do something with him at the store? He must have something to do, or he cannot be kept out of mischief."

"You may send him down to the store after he has got his breakfast, and I will see what I can do with him." Mr. Hunter then went to his store, where several men were waiting for him. The store received but a very small share of his attention. He had a large factory to manage, besides being a director in a railroad, and chairman of the committee for securing the election of the candidate of his party.

William had been up very late the night before, and did not make his appearance at the breakfast table, until nearly an hour after his father had gone to his place of business.

"Your father wishes you to come to the store, as soon as you have taken your breakfast," said Mrs. Hunter.

"Do you know what he wants of me?" said William; with a blush occasioned by the fear that some of his irregularities had come to his father's knowledge.

"He wishes you to assist in the store."

"Very well, I will go down."

Now it happened that William had made an engagement to meet some of his companions, at ten o'clock. It would not suit his purpose to be engaged at the store. He did not fail to go there, however; for he had not yet learned to practise direct disobedience to his parents' commands. He had little fear that his father would notice him, or assign to him any employment, unless the matter was brought to his recollections by some question on the part of his son. That question he was careful not to ask. He remained at the store, in the presence of his father, till nearly ten o'clock, when he left, to join his companions at the appointed place.

Mr. Hunter did not come home to dinner. When he came in, at a late hour to his supper, William was not with him. "Where is William?" said Mrs. H.

"I do not know," said Mr. H.

"Has he not been with you at the store?"

"I remember seeing him there some time in the course of the day."

"I sent him down as you requested, in hopes you would give him something to do, to keep him busy."

"Ah, yes, I remember now; but he did not say anything to me about it."

"I told him you wanted his assistance in the store. I presume he waited till he got tired, and then went away. I wish he would come home. He is forming a habit of staying out later and later."

"He must be sent to school. I have no time to attend to him. There is no use in my undertaking it. Just get him ready as soon as you can, and I will send him at once to some good school, where he will be taken care of. Where is the paper?"

The newspaper from the city was handed him, and after having looked over certain portions which have no interest for general readers, he was ready for his supper. After supper he was to meet the committee who had the welfare of their party in charge.

Mr. Hunter was too busy to give any attention to his son! How came he to be so busy! Was there a necessity laid upon him to extend his business so widely as to leave him no time to attend to the education of his son—no time to take care of his own soul? Was it more important that he should be rich, than that his son should escape ruin?

How many fathers are there in this land of enterprise and energy, who must be classed with Mr. Hunter!

Mr. Hunter determined to give his son the best advantages for education which the country afforded. He was, doubtless, willing to be at any expense that should be necessary to secure that object. By that means he thought to atone for his own neglect!

There are duties that cannot be transferred to others. It is to the parent that God, by his providence and word says, "take this child and train it for me." No other person can do the work required of the parents. The best educators can only assist the parent.

Among the ruined of our land how many are the victims of parental neglect—of neglect occasioned by the pressure of business and worldly care!

THE GOOD WIFE.

She commandeth her husband in any lawful matter, by constantly obeying him. It was always observed that what the English gained of the French in battle by valor, the French regained of the English by cunning in treaties. So if the husband should chance by his power, in his passion, to prejudice his wife's right, she wisely knoweth, by compounding and complying, to rectify it again.

She never crosseth her husband in the spring-tide of his anger, but stays till it be ebbing water. And then mildly she argues the matter, not so much to condemn him as to acquit herself.

She keeps home if she have not her husband's company or leave for her patent to go abroad. For the house is the woman's centre.

Her clothes are rather comely than costly, and she makes plain cloth to be velvet by her handsome wearing it. She is none of our dames, who love to appear in variety of suits every day new, as if a good gown, like a stratagem in war, were to be used but once.

Her husband's secrets she will not divulge. Especially she is careful to conceal his infirmities. If he be none of the wisest, she so orders it that he appears on the public stage but seldom, and then he hath conned his part so well that he comes off with great applause.

In her husband's sickness she feels more grief than she shows. Partly that she may encourage him, and partly because she is not at leisure to seem so sorrowful, that she may be the more serviceable.

The heaviest work of her servants she maketh light by orderly and seasonable enjoining it. Wherefore her service is accounted a preferment, and her teaching better than her wages.—Thomas Fuller (Holy State.)

JOHN KNOX'S DAUGHTER.

The spirit that animated Scotland's great reformer descended to his children, one of whom, Elizabeth, married a minister by the name of Welch. He was banished from the country, for his opposition to the attempt of the king to introduce prelacy, and took up his residence in France. After many years of laborious service in the gospel, he was seized with consumption. Wishing to breathe his last in Scotland, application was made to the king to permit him to return. The king refused. At length Mrs. Welch, through the influence of some of her mother's relations at court, was enabled to obtain access to the presence of the king, and to urge, in person, her petition that her husband might be allowed to come home to die. "Who was your father, woman?" said the king.

"Mr. Knox," was the reply.

"Knox and Welch! The devil never made such a match as that."

"It is right likely Sir, for we never asked his advice."

"How many children has your father left?

"Three Sir."

"Are they lads or lasses?

"They are all lasses."

"I am thankful for that for had they been three lads, I had never held my three kingdoms in peace."

"May it please you to give my husband his native air again?"

"If you will persuade your husband to submit to the Bishops, I will permit him to return to Scotland."

Lifting her apron, and holding it towards the king, she replied, "Please your majesty, I would rather have his head in this apron."

RULING PASSION STRONG IN DEATH.—The following anecdote of the funeral of a British Alderman is told by Southey:—As soon as he knew his case was desperate, he called together all the persons to whom he was indebted in his mercantile concerns. "Gentlemen," said he, "I am going to die, and my death will be an inconvenience to you, because it will be some time before you, can get your accounts settled with my executors; now, if you will allow me a handsome discount I will settle them myself at once." They agreed to the proposal, and the old Alderman turned his death into nine hundred pounds profit.

LAND WARRANTS—A SINGULAR CASE.—An old soldier living at Harper's Ferry Va., being entitled to 160 acres of land under the new Bounty Act obtained from the Pension Office the necessary authority for locating his land. He selected it on a tract of unoccupied Government land at Harper's Ferry, being more convenient in his estimation than travelling over the wilds of Oregon, Minnesota or California. The old soldier has consulted able legal gentlemen who have given it as their opinion that he can hold the land; as the Bounty Act allows the location upon any unoccupied Government land. The property thus selected is said to be worth at least $150.000.

A FEMALE MISER.

THE RULING PASSION STRONG IN DEATH.

An old beggar woman, by the name of Elizabeth Morelock, lately died in the city of Cincinnati, as every body supposed in a state of extreme destitution. On the night of her death, a lighted candle was placed upon a stand beside her bed, her idiot daughter, a frightful hunchback, being the only attendant—though a part of the time the physician was present. The old woman opend her eyes, and perceiving the burning candle, ordered it to be blown out, saying she could not afford it. When she was taken sick, she ordered the chest, which was, after death, found to contain nearly four thousand dollars in gold, to be placed near her bed, and she kept it within reach of her arms during the whole of her sickness. When the death-struggle came on, and she was told she must die, she flung herself upon the chest, and clawed at it, in frenzy of avarice, until she tore the very nails from her fingers; and while thus embracing her treasure, her spirit took its flight.

An old stove in the room was found, after her death, to contain a considerable amount of silver and copper coin, carefully stowed away. The money and effects have been placed in the hands of an executor appointed by the court. In 1840, when small change was scarce, this woman made a handsome speculation by selling the small coins accumulated by the beggary of herself and her idiot daughter. The latter was generally flogged upon her return at night, when she did not make a good day's work, and always whipped before she was sent out in the morning. The cries of the poor creature while under the lash of her mother, have frequently excited the indignation of the neighborhood. The poor idiot herself was afterwards attacked by the cholera, and is now probably numbered with the dead.—N. Y. Observer

PUNCTUALITY—ANECDOTE.

The importance of punctuality will not be denied, especially by those who have suffered through lack of it in themselves and in others. Due regard is seldom paid to the formation of this habit in the training of the young. Those men who have accomplished great things, have usually been scrupulously methodical in their general habits, and strictly punctual in keeping all their engagements. No man was more methodical and punctual than Washington. No man was more so than John Quincy Adams. The masterly genius of Chalmers did not lead him to the neglect of method and of punctuality. He not only practised those virtues himself, but was rigid in exacting them from others, occasionally somewhat to their annoyance. The following amusing incident was the result of this habit.

The peculiarity which reigned over all the domestic regulations was sometimes not a little inconvenient to Mr. Chalmers' guests. His aunt, while living in the house, appearing one morning too late at breakfast, and well knowing what awaited her if she exposed herself defenceless to the storm, thus managed to divert it. "Oh! Mr. Chalmers," she exclaimed, as she entered the room, "I had such a strange dream last night; I dreamt that you were dead." "Indeed," said Mr. Chalmers, quite arrested by an announcement which bore so directly upon his own future history. "And dreamt," she continued, "that the funeral day was named, and the funeral hour was fixed, and the funeral cards were written; and the day came, and the folks came, and the hour came, but what do you think happened?—why, the clock had scarce done chapping (striking) twelve, which had been the hour named in the cards when a loud knocking was heard within the coffin, and a voice, very peremptory, and ill-pleased like, came out of it, saying, 'Twelve's chappit, and ye're no liftin'." Mr. Chalmers was himself too great a humorist not to relish a joke so quickly and cleverly contrived, and in the hearty laugh which followed, the ingenious culprit felt that she had accomplished more than an escape.

On Wednesday last, two women were standing on the Railway bridge of the Rouse's Point and Ogdensburgh Railroad, when a passenger train ran over and killed both.

WASHINGTON IRVING AS A WRITER.

(Concluded.)

So far as mere style is concerned, though comparatively a minor consideration, Mr Irving undeniably occupies the very highest place. It has even been a dispute among critics, whether he is not the best model of a writer now living. Some have placed him high above every writer in the English language. But it is difficult to compare him, in this respect, with most of his competitors. His diction is peculiar to himself, but only, perhaps, because other persons do not generally write quite so well. There is certainly nothing eccentric or affected in his compositions. He writes naturally, easily, smoothly along, as if it were no effort at all for him to compose. He is not so pompous as Gibbon, and writes less as if it were a trade. Burke is more pithy and sententious, but infinitely less beautiful and flowing. Burke sometimes fatigues his reader by gaudy and superfluous imagery. The sentences of Robert Hall are equally smooth and well turned; they are even more elevated and grand; but also more difficult, or rather less easy, to read. Mr. Hall's sentences are in general very lengthly, and slightly elaborate and complex, but never tangled or obscure. Mr. Irving writes with an easy, though not a readier, pen; and in his longest periods, you flow insensibly and without labor along the current of his thoughts, till he gives you liberty to pause.

Perhaps the best analogy lies between him and Mr. Addison as to style. They resemble each other more than any two writers in our language. Indeed, the question of superiority is, by many, reduced, in the final issue, to these two. It would be difficult for any person to decide which author, taken in all respects, he would prefer. So far as fancy, imagination, good taste, and graphic power are concerned, it would require a nice balance to determine which has the greater merit. There is one quality of a good writer, however, in which Mr. Irving, I think, clearly surpasses his great rival—a profound and critical knowledge of the etymology and definition of words. Mr Addison has been accused, though I think unjustly, of writing as if he were doubtful precisely what word to employ. This is never so much as suspected in Mr. Irving. He always has the very word, generally the only word, capable of giving full expression to his thoughts, and yet glides along apparently without effort. There is another defect which critics have discovered in Mr. Addison's best works. He is said to have frequently added highsounding but feeble expletives to his sentences, after the sense had been made complete, merely to give his period a round full close. If this be true, Mr. Irving is decidedly his superior; for I will venture to affirm that no such sentence can be found in the whole compass of his productions. Perhaps this may seem a bold expression of opinion; but I will offer no other amendment to it, than that I have, at different times, sought whole hours for an instance without success.

Thus far I have compared Mr. Irving as a writer only with those of the English shool. It would be hazardous to attempt to find a man, on this side of the Atlantic, whose best friends would not readily acknowledge his inferior in the use of a beautiful and graphipen. Dr. Channing surpassed him in the power of multiplying himself, if I may say so, in his readers; but it was evidently not so natural and easy for that distinguished author to compose. Daniel Webster has no superior in the purity, strength, and transparency of his style; his thoughts are sometimes perfect thunderbolts, and scathe and blast every thing opposed to them, by the mere majesty of their power; but as a writer, the great defender of the Constitution must yield the palm to him, whose amiable humility has perhaps never cast a wish, or carried a reverie, to the height occupied by the statesman. What elevation Mr. Prescott would have reached, had Providence spared the continued use of his sight, no one can tell; but the Conquest of Mexico, notwithstanding it was composed by a man, who could not see well enough to correct his own proof, is after all, the only American work worthy of contending with the Life of Christopher Columbus for the prize.

One of the chief sources of Mr. Irving's superiority is his perfect self-possession while he is writing. Unpracticed writers, and even men who have written much without having improved by their experience, frequently, perhaps I should say generally, manifest an uneasiness of spirit, as if they were not satisfied unless they are doing wonders all the while. They come to their task in a perfect frenzy. They continue to work themselves up to a most unnatural and disgusting excitement, and then pounce upon their paper, as if they would snatch it, like an eagle, to the clouds. They leap through their sentences, like the five thunder, from crag to crag. They gleam, and hiss, and roar, as if an Alpine tempest were about to break over your head. If they happen to think of any Greek or Latin author, while they are suffering under this chaos of passion, they will crowd a dozen classical allusions into a single paragraph, and quote twenty verses of Pagan poetry to a page. Fearful lest they have not done much in what they have already written, in order to redeem themselves in what remains, they dash, and foam, and thunder, more extravagantly as they proceed. Like ungifted speakers, from the beginning to the end of their performance, they never get fair possession of themselves; and, when all is over, they have only added another specimen to that already too numerous class of productions, whose single quality is their sound.

How differently from all this does Mr. Irving undertake his work! Without any effort, he writes his leading sentence. From this he proceeds naturally and smoothly along, as if it were the easiest thing in the world to write. As his subject grows in his own mind, he gives fuller and bolder expression to his thoughts. He seems to be in no hurry to strike his readers with any thing wonderful or new. He allows his theme to go on and make the development of itself. If it happen to touch on classic ground, it finds the writer perfectly at home. Without stoping to deluge you with quotations, he gives you one—but that one is a gem. If, in the progress of his work, an emotion is excited by any thing which his subject makes it necessary to say, he gives it a single stroke of his gifted pen, and it thrills to your very soul. He never quotes for the sake of quoting, nor to show off the extent and variety of his reading. Nor does he attempt to cover you up with roses; if a few flowers chance to be growing near his path, he weaves you a modest chaplet—but that blooms on your heart for ever. Nor is he incessantly making pictures, and pressing every ancient and modern dialect into service, in order to decorate them with all the gorgeousness of language. Dealing considerably in description, a variety of scenes must necessarily be crowded upon him on almost every page of his composition. But of these he is far from being prodical. Instead of drawing out every one that occurs to him, he makes a choice selection. When one is chosen, wrought out, and finished, it throws its lustre all around him. His reader marks it with his pencil, or transfers it to his own imagination, to which it adds a splendor ever after.

But, on the other hand, Mr Irving is not a timid, painful, fastidious writer. He wears no straitjacket on his intellectual faculties. With all his severity of taste, he is always free and easy. You see in him none of that finical nervousness, which trammels a writer's genius, and forbids his saying just what he thinks, and precisely as he thinks it. This is the natural consequence of his modesty. An ambitious writer, all the while goaded by the impulse of his ruling passion, is apt to be too careful—perhaps I should have said anxious—on the mere manner of his writing. As each sentence is written down, he looks back upon it to criticise its structure, when he ought to be pushing onward under the full and unchecked inspiration of his subject. Ambition, at least in a writer, is always weak and timid. The man loses his thoughts while he is looking after his periods. He ought to be himself lost, or nearly so, in the matter of which he is treating. His taste should be the only restraint upon him; and that should be reduced to such a habit, as to leave him quite unconscious of its influence. If, working in this natural way, errors creep into his composition, they may be left for a future and critical recension.

There is a sort of sentimentalism, also, to which Mr. Irving is never subject. This consists, I suppose, in a writer's putting no more feeling than his ideas demand. To feel less than the truths advanced would justly argues obduracy of mind; to feel more, whether in writing or in speaking, fanaticism, the ceremonials of which are generally rant and bombast. When thought and feeling are exactly commensurate, when the one precisely tallies with the other, then you have words spoken fitly; and they are indeed "like apples of gold in pictures of silver." You rise from the perusal of a work thus written, neither hardened by contemplating great truths without emotion, nor softened to effeminacy by a continual conflict of boisterous and unmeaning passion. Sound thoughts have been passing down upon your soul, and they have left their own impression. You are a sounder, wiser, better, truer man yourself, by the influence of what you have been reading.

If the present age has produced the exact counterpart of our author, it is in the example of Mr. Dickens. In all this gentleman's productions, there is a constant tendency to overdrawing. His thoughts and feelings seem to be in a state of perpetual insurrection. Like a rider on the high road, he uses the lash too much; and his animal is in a continual perspiration. If his course happen to lie on a clean path, all goes merrily and smoothly onward; but whenever he falls into a rough passage, then the dirt flies all around you. You are knocked, and thumped, and jerked, in this direction and in that, without the slightest mercy; and when the race is over, you need all the water which he complained the want of in our taverns, not only to cleanse your person, but to cool your fever.

Such writers, to change the figure, seem to be somewhat suspicious of the bill of fare provided by them; and they are only snaking up their readers a little to favor their digestion. But it would be unjust to deny, that Mr. Dickens has written many pages which will for ever form a part of the standard literature of our language; and, what is very much for any man's reputation as a writer, he has received the approbation—at least the qualified approbation—of Dr. Channing. But his style is generally too headlong to be commended.

In all respects Mr. Irving seems to stand first in this country as a writer. He has the singular merit of pleasing all classes equally. Those not prepared to admire the skill manifested in the selection of his language, and in the molding and turning of his periods, read him for the amusement gathered from the story. The fine flow of his sentences, his frequent and beautiful illustration, the rich simplicity of his pictures, and the delightful splendor and genuineness of his emotions, charm other persons less captivated by his subjects. It seems to me that he surpasses all writers in one quality. His style evinces more real science, with less apparent labor, than that of any modern or ancient author.

Having given much merited praise, I will state almost my only objection to Mr. Irving. In nearly all that he has done, he has shown merely what he could do, had his subjects been better chosen. His Sketch Book and his Columbus are almost the only exceptions to this remark. In nearly all his other works, beautiful, charming, captivating as they are, a serious man feels all the while that he might have selected topics more worthey of his genius. It is true, there is next is nothing in all his writings to find fault with; his style is ever like its fountain, pure and splendid; he nowhere descends to vulgarity, even for a moment; and his morality is such as would become a minister at the alter. But, then, when we read such a man, the soul longs to see him soaring higher. We want to see him ranging in majesty through those fields, where such a mind might meet with angels. We become more anxious to witness the power of such a style as his on those sublime topics, which, in all ages, have formed the themes of those gifted minds, who have ever stood nearest to the bright purlieus of heaven. O, could the heart of Mr. Irving be touched by that live coal, which sanctified and hallowed the lips of the evangelical Isaiah, in what sweet and captivating splendor would Christianity appear on his classic and immortal pages!

But Mr. Irving is now advanced in years. The gray of age is sprinkled in the brown of his glory. He must soon descend from his lofty summit, and be buried in the dust with his fathers. Such a mind as his, so characterized by sense, so ripe in reflection, so just in its perceptions on all other topics, has, undoubtedly, long since settled life's great question. When he goes, he will go with the blessing of his country upon him. Though his body may perish, and he low in the sepulchre raised by his friends, his fame will survive; his sweet spirit, we trust, will ascend to its Author; and the sorrow of a nation, or rather of an age, mingle its laments with the wail of the winds that sweep over his grave.

FRIEDERICH DER GROSSE.

Concluded.

On rising from table Fredrick allowed himself another half hour with his flute; after which the cabinet-secretaries brought in the letters which he had directed or dicrated, and which now came before him again transcribed and ready for his signature. It was not unusual for the king, when signing, to enforce the object of the letter by adding to it a few clear sharp words. Many of these postscripts are still preserved. Thus, when he replied to an application for money, there are sometimes found appended in the royal handwriting such phrases as, 'I cannot give a single grosehen," or, 'I am now as poor as Job.' Thus, when the celebrated singer, Madame Mara, sent him a long memorial against some intended arrangements at the opera, the king's postscript is, 'Elle est gayee pour chanter et non pas ecrire.' Thus, again when a veteran general had asked permision to retire, the official answer bids him reconsider his request, and there follows, manu propria, the significant remark, "The hens that will not lay I will not feed!"

"When this correspondence was completed, the king sometimes took a walk—out of doors if the weather was fine, or through his saloons if it rained. So oon as he conversed with his friend Colonel Grumbkow, whom he had by patent given the name Quintus Icilius, or some other staff officer; sometimes he received the artists who had executed his commissions, or who brought him their works to view. But whenever his leisure served, the hours between four and six, or what remained of them, were devoted to his literary labors. It was during this interval that he composed nearly all the volumes in prose and verse which are now to be reprinted. Numerous, indeed, they are.

"From six till seven o'clock the king had usually a small concert, in which only musicians or a few amateurs of the highest rank were admitted, and in which he himself played the flute. By long practice he had acquired excellent skill with that instrument. In his very last years, however the decay of his front teeth deprived him of this daily recreation. This losing the power to execute, he lost also the wish to hear, music; and from that time forward he seldom appeared at any concert.

"During Fredericks's earlier years his suppers had become justly renowned from the wit of the guests whom he there gathered round him, and from his own. But when after 1763, the king discontinued his suppers, the void thus left in his evenings was supplied by still frequently receiving a circle of distinguished men, as some of his generals, the Marquis d'Argens, Lord Marischal, and Lucchesini. His usual plan was to begin by reading aloud to them a passage from some book, which served as a kind of text for the lively conversation which ensued. During the rest of the evening, or for the whole of it when no visitors came, the king was read to by one or more lecteurs, selecting either original French works or translations into French of the Greek and Latin classics. At about nine o'clock he went to bed."

THE CAPITAL OF UTAH

The city of the Great Salt Lake is beautifully laid out, within a short distance of the mountain, forming the eastern end of the valley. It contains eleven or twelve thousand inhabitants, who are mostly engaged in agriculture, though a portion of their time is devoted to mechanical pursuits when understood. The streets of the city intersect each other at right angles, and each block is half a mile square, with an alley from east to west, and north and south. Each block is called a ward, and has a bishop to preside over its government, whose duties are to act as marriage, tax collectors, and preachers, as well as street commissioners. The city and all the farming land are irrigated by streams of beautiful water which flow from the adjacent mountains. These streams have been, with great labor and perseverance, led in every direction. Through the city they flow on each side of the shade trees, and into waterspouts let upon the inhabitants' gardens at regular periods, so likewise upon the extensive fields of grain lying in the south of the city.

There is a field thirty miles long, by six and ten wide, a portion of which is cultivated by any one who desires. This field was moving with wheat, barley, and oats, nearly ready for the sickle, when we were at the lake, and a finer field of wheat never grew in any country; the berry was large, full, and plump, and of superior whiteness. We were convinced that no country in the world could produce better crops than this valley, or a larger amount to the acre. The system of irrigation prevents any thing like rust or smut striking the crop, to blast the expectation of the farmer. The productive energy of the soil will always secure him a abundant crop. Within the valley, and including three or four settlements of the people of the vicinity, there cannot be far from 30,000 inhabitants. Forty miles south they have a village, and another 150 miles further south, among the Utah Indians, in a pine, where fine forest of all kinds of timber abound, while little or none for mechanical purposes excepting pine, grow in the vicinity of the valley.

The character of this people has changed but little since their exodus from the States. The leaders are all somewhat more refined and easy," and the great body as persevering, industrious and obedient to the higher powers as ever.

Silver is very plenty among them—principally gold, much of which came from the California mines. The religious character of the whole body has degenerated into mere amusement, & is not even the semblance of true piety is kept up. In the vicinity of the city is a warm spring, which has been brought into the city, and public baths erected. The water is highly medicated. Each citizen has a building lot appropriated to his use, but is not the absolute owner, as he cannot dispose of it to a Gentile without the consent of the church. Each member is allowed to take up and cultivate as much land as he pleases, but he can only secure such improvements as he may make upon the land. One tenth of the produce of the land, or the accumulation of each individual, as well as one-tenth of his time, belongs to the church, and is rigorously exacted.

The houses are mostly one story, though some of them are neat little cottages. They have nearly completed a spacious court house, fifty feet high, and forty feet square. The first story built of free stone, and the second of sun burnt bricks. Houses built of those bricks are very warm in the winter, and cool in the summer, and are well adapted to the climate. There are about to erect a temple and other public buildings. Brigham Young's house is a large two story stone building, some fifty feet by twenty-five feet; yet it is not large enough to contain one-half of his numerous wives.

The prosperity of this people is truly astonishing. Their lots and seeds, and most of the necessaries of life are from abroad. We saw about three thousand of the finest cattle we ever looked upon, in the valley, that we ever saw upon. In the morning, you may see lads driving hundreds of cows from the canals of the city, to be herded within two or three miles, and driven back at night.

Flint Enamel Ware.

Some ten or fifteen years ago, Mr. Fenton, a manufacturer of Fire bricks, &c, at Bennington, Vt, commenced a course of experiments on the liquefaction by heat and intermingling in various proportions of the flint squartz, &c., used in his business or existing in the mountains around him, with an eye to the production of wares adapted to household uses. In these experiments he persevered, until at last he was enabled to produce a ware combining strength, purity, and beauty.—composed entirely of flint, feld-spar and quartz, ground together, bolted like flour then formed into a clay or paste, and moided into any shape which taste or use may suggest, then covered with a delicate enamel and baked to a consistency exceeding that of marble. The enamel is formed entirely of flint, without a particle of the metallic bases which renders much of the ware now in use always dangerous and often virulently poisonous.

The Flint Enamel Ware, though especially prized by us for its capacity to supersede the enameled wares now used for milk pans, stew-pans, coffee-urns, &c is intended to subserve a far wider circle for uses. Among the articles into which it has already been fashioned, are water jars, stove-urns, mantle and other parlor ornaments, lamps and candlesticks, table-slabs, door plates, door-knobs, block-letters, daguerreotype frames, inkstands, pitchers, wash-bowls, bathing-tubs, spittoons, &c, &c.

The usual color of this ware is a rich, dark brown, shaded and flecked or mottled with white and blue, though it is made of pure white when desired. It is harder than marble, and a delicate pitcher may be thrown on the floor with violence without starting the handle. The point of a nail driven smartly against its side with a hammer makes no scratch or dent of any kind. The enamel stands heat perfectly, and all this ware may be, as most of it is made absolutely fire-proof so as to be buried in a pit of burning anthracite and come out of the ashes as good as new. Yet it is nearly as cheap as the "stone ware" now in use. We cannot doubt that it will rapidly find its way into very general use throughout the country. The ware is patented, and agencies for its exclusive sale by counties and towns are being formed throughout the Union

Singular Anecdote of Ethan Allen

Rivington, the tory printer; during the American revolution, was very bitter in his attacks on the rebels and Mr. Washington, as he facetiously called the great General. Nevertheless he thought proper to remain in New York after the departure of the British troops, and it created great surprise when it was openly declared, without any contradiction on his part, that he had been throughout the war a spy for General Washington, and had imparted much valuable information to him, which he could not have obtained excepting by violent abuse of the Americans and their cause. He was generally supposed to be a man entirely destitute of principle, though of courtly manners and address. He had after the war, almost the monopoly of selling the best British publications. Col. Ethan Allen, a powerful man, a brave patriot, a hard swearer, and a harder drinker, was so enraged at Rivington that he swore he would kill him, and Rivington was a little alarmed at the threat. Allen always carried a long sabre, and, after the peace; down he went to Rivington's office, at the corner of Pearl and Wall streets where John Hone used to keep his auction store. "Is your master at home?" said Allen to the clerk. "I'll go and see, sir," was the answer. So the clerk ran up to Rivington's private parlor, exclaiming in great consternation —"O! sir, he's really and truly come, and is waiting for you down stairs!"

"Show him up" said the editor, while he opened the leaf of a table and placed some wine and glasses upon it. Up went Allen, his long sabre dragging up each step. Rivington met him at the door with one of his politest bows and one of his most expressive smiles. "Delighted to see you, my dear sir! Pray take a seat; and allow me to pour you out a glass of wine." Allen tossed off the wine, looking dagger at Rivington. "Sir I come——"

"Not a word, my dear sir, on business until we have finished our bottle. Try another glass." Down went another glass. "Fond of Madeira, sir? Here, Jack, bring a bottle of south side—seven years old, a great favorite of our glorious Washington's. Allen's eyes twinkled, and he tossed down glass after glass of that really fine wine, until he forgot that he came to Rivington. He got quit boozy, and they parted excellent friends. Rivington lived in Cherry street, and the house is still standing, and occupied by tenants. Most of the merchants and others of good society lived in that street.—Sunday Times

SUPERSTITIONS OF GREAT MEN.—Most great men have been superstitious. The courier bringing a letter from England, in which the death of old physician, Potidori, was stated, Lord Byron remarked —"I was convinced something unpleasant hung over me last night; I expected to hear that somebody I knew was dead; so it turns out. Scott believes in a second sigh; Rousseau tried whether he would be damned or, not by aiming at a tree with a stone; Gotha trusted to the chance of a knife's striking the water whether he was to succeed in some undertaking; Swift placed the success of his life on the drawing of a trout, he had hooked out of the water." Byron on another occasion observed—"Several extraordinary things have happened on my birthday; so they did to Napoleon; and a more wonderful thing occurred to Marie Antoinette. At my wedding something whispered to me that I was singing my death warrent. At the last moment I would have retreated if I could have done so. I am a great believer in presentiments. Socrates' demon was no fiction, Monk Louis had his monitor, and Bonaparte many warnings." Byron had also a belief in unlucky days. He once refused to be introduced to a lady because it was on Friday. On the same ill-starred day he would never pay visits.—

AWARD TO BOY.—The learned blacksmith says: Boys did you ever think that this world, with all its wealth and woe, with all its mines and mountains, oceans, seas and rivers, with all its shipping, its steamboats, railroads, and magnetic telegraphs, with all its millions of groaning men, and all the science and progress of ages—will soon be given over to the boys of the present age—boys like you? Believe it, and look abroad upon your inheritance, and get ready to enter upon its possessions. The Presidents, Kings Governors, Statesmen, Philosophers, Ministers, Teachers, Men of the future all are boys now."

Aristotle speaks of a species of little animals which exist on the river Hypanies, whose age is but a day. Those which die at eight in the morning are in youth, and those which fall away at noon are in their prime; and at night fall they drop away of decrepit old age. What a beatiful miniature of our own existence,—how easy to comprehend —how readily the mind span the brevity!

SHOCKING DEATH.—Joseph Beal, the keeper of a stallion belonging to Joshua Lamston, was killed by the animal, at Pangatown, last Saturday. It is supposed that he entered the stable imprudently, somewhat intoxicated, and that the horse—a very vicious one—broke his neck by a severe bite. When discovered, he was throwing the body up and tearing the flesh with his teeth. The unruly creature endeavored to get at those who, with great difficulty, succeeded in pulling the body away.—Winchester Republican.

True Social Dignity.

To be ashamed of their origan in just now in American society the weakness of the little minds that compose it. The man who rides in his carriage shrinks from the acknowledgment that the money which enabled him to buy that carriage was earned by his father, dollar, by dollar, with toil and patience, in a yard, behind the counter of a shoemaker's or tailor's shop, or by honest industry in some other useful occupation below [so called] the grade of the merchant or professional man, as if the man did not honor the work, and not the work the man. To such let Daniel Webster speak. Hear him:

"I did not happen to me to be born in a log cabin, but my elder brothers and sisters were born in a log cabin, raised among the snow drifts of New Hampshire, at a period so early that when the smoke first rose from its rude chimney, and curled over the frozen hill, there was no similar evidence of a white man's habitation between it and the settlements on the rivers of Canada. Its remains still exist. I make it an annual visit; I carry my children to it to teach them the hardships endured by the generations gone before them. I love to dwell on the tender recollections, the kindred ties, the early affections, and the narrations and incidents; which mingle with all I know of this primitive family abode. I weep to think that none of those who inhabited it are now among the living, and if ever I fail in affectionate veneration for him who raised it against savage violence and distruction, cherished all domestic virtues beneath its roof, and, through the fire and blood of seven years revolutionary war, shrunk from no toil, no sacrifice, to serve his country, and raise his children to a condition better than his own, may my name and the name of my posterity be blotted forever from the memory of mankind."

"And we will add, that he who is ashamed of the poor father and mother, whose honest labor supported him in a childhood, and whose daily toil was taxed to give him the education by which he has been enabled to rise to a condition above the one they occupied, is unworthy to be the associate of wise and good men. All such will despise him; and no matter how loftily he may carry his head, he is nothing in the estimation of America's true noblemen.—Home Gazette

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr. Herald,

Would it be uninteresting to our foreign readers to hear from time to time, of the character of the business done in our courts? If I mistake not, you will find in the English and American journals, regular reports of the proceedings of their courts: and why should we not give to our readers the judicial proceedings of the courts in Liberia? There can, certainly, be no objection to the plan; indeed, the adopting of this course may be of service to many, especially to our commercial interests.

At the last Court of Quarterly sessions, Judge Yates presiding, I attended throughout the session, without having any business there, but I was at leisure, and therefore whiled away m time in listening to the proceedings of the court, which, to me, were amusing, instructive and deeply interesting. After the calling and swearing of the grand jury, and their departure for their room, several cases of small debts were called up and disposed of, and then came charges against several persons residing at Marshall, on the Junk River, for violations of the license law. It appeared that several of these persons had been trading without first obtaining licenses, for which each of them would have had to pay twelve dollars—the fact was clearly proved against them, and they were fined fifty dollars each. These parties employed no council—they defended their own cause and it was truly amusing to witness the circumnous manner they entered upon their defence. How indignant they seemed to be at the bare supposition of "their having evaded or trampled upon the laws of their country—"they would not, they said," under any consideration be guilty of such wickedness—and prayed the Court not for a moment, to entertain the idea, that they had offended the majesty of the laws." Among the persons thus accused, found guilty and fined we noticed James C. Payne and Jonas Carey. Evidently these parties had agreed to work for each other;—they certainly did act as friendly as circumstances would allow, they gave evidence for each other; and would appear as ignorant of the crime of the other as possible—it was, by close examination that the facts were brought out. There was no trouble in Mr. Carey's case—they were all eager to give evidence against him, indeed, it was through them, that he was accused. They had supposed that it was through him, that they had been arraigned before court—such, however, seems not to be the case.

It may not be amiss to say that the residents at Marshall, there may be few exceptions, are like the citizens in the interior of the United States, measurably holding themselves responsible to no one—there will they hold to be law. This state of things are rapidly changing, and the unscrupulous law breakers, to their cost, will find out that they are amenable to some authority.

Several claims were made by heirs at law, for lands said to have been drawn and improved some twelve to twenty years ago by their parents—the petitioners demanded of the court proper deeds. As far as could then be acertained they were attended to.

A petition was made by N. M. Hicks to be allowed to take the benefit of the act of insolvency—the petition was granted, and commissioners appointed to take charge of his effects. The insolvent confessed that he was unable to pay his debts in 1844. This was a bitter pill to several. In what light would a man be viewed in other countries, that continued to contract debts to large amounts, for eight years after he knew he was unable to pay what he then owed? Certainly he could not be looked at as an honest man.—and it is time that the people of Liberia should look well, and take rigid steps with all who are guilty of such swindling transactions. The debts of the insolvent amount to some ten or twelve thousand dollars I am told, and his assets to less than a thousand dollars.

I am truly, Mr. Herald.

SIMON PURE,

September, 1851.

His Sun Went Down at Noon.

Was drowned on the 13th, of Sept. at Grand Basa, J. M. Ellis, son of Rev. H. W. and Celia Ellis, residents of the town of Monrovia. J. M. Ellis was a member of the Presbyterian Church in Monrovia, —about two years prior to his disolution, by the preaching of the word, he yielded to the irresistable power of the love of God, and the Father of Light condescended to visit him with his saving grace and loving kindness, and made him a son of God, and a citizen of the house-hold of faith. Like other young men at the age of twenty, he was in outward apearance somewhat irregular in his christian life, and seemed sometimes to have only the shadow, and not the substance of that repentance which needeth not to be repented of—but we charitably hope he was accepted of the beloved at his last hour.

—J. M. E. was an active and industrious youth; he was much beloved by his school mates, and highly respected by those who knew him, but his 'dust has returned to the dust as it was, and his spirit to God who gave it.' In the dreary vale at Bassa, under some spreading tree that bows to the southern winds, as they come bounding over the angry surges, that lashe the sandy beach and shake the iron bound strand, his body is interred.—There lies the grief of a fond mother and the blasted expectation of an indulgent father.—The Youth grew up like a well watered plant; he shot deep, rose high, and bid fair for man-hood But just as the cedar began to tower, and promised ere long to be the pride of the wood, and prince among the neighbouring trees—behold! the axe is laid unto the roots the fatal blow is struck; and all it branching honours tumbled to the dust. And did he fall alone? no, the hopes of his father that begat him, and the pleasing prospects of her that bare him, fell and were crushed with him." "Dumb was his mother while the sad story of her son's death was relating; numb with grief and leaning upon the partner of her woes"—

We regret to say that this only son, J. M. Ellis is no more—his lot was to contend with the bounding waves, but the strife was unequal—his active limbs were soon paralized and his sonorious and musical voice lost amidst the roaring billows

Ah! in what perils is this life enjoyed!
What slights neglects, what travail faults destroy
The hardest frame, of indolence, of toil
We die; of want, of superfluity!
The air surrounding heaven the vital air,
Is big with death.

For the Liberia Herald

Mr. Herald;—As several persons of late when desiring to have their trumpet blown, and the echo to go far and near, seeks the indulgence of your long trumpet, and strong lungs,—I want to know if I cannot get you to blow a little for me too?—one blast or so will do, as I have just returned home. Looking over a few old books. I have what some people ironically style a library, I came across a pamphlet, called the African Repositor printed sometime in the year 1829. The age of the periodical arrested my attention for a while, and in perusing its columnes I came across a resolution offered before one of the meetings of the Am. Col Soc by Hon Mr Mercer, a subjoins to one by another gentleman, to have a monument erected in Liberia, in memory of the late Excellent Gov. J. Ashmun.

Will you blow loud enough for me Mr. Herald, so as to waken our good friends in America to the truth of one thing, and not suffer a good man's deeds to be buried with him, just for want of the fulfillment of a promise. I think Mr. Herald that if we will exert your blowing powers, Liberia before long will be honored with an Ashmun monument if it will have to be given by those benevolent ladies of enlightened America, of whom we hear so much. Sir a subjoined editorial article with a request that this may be copied in the American papers, I think will do no harm.

Yours &c
Traveller.

Monrovia Sep't 26 th 1851

Our Correspondent "Traveller," requests us to add something to what he has said. We however conceive it unnecessary to do so. The friends of the late Ashmun and Liberia, will no doubt, ere long, carry out the provisions referred to in the resolution. Mr. Ashmun was a devoted friend to Liberia and to the cause of colonization; and his memory should be held in high estimation by the friends of colonization, and of purity. Liberians will venerate his name.

HERALD.

REWARD! REWARD!

One cent reward will be given to ascertain the unprincipled rogue who on the 5th or 6th September, broke into the House formerly occupied as printing office for "Africa's Luminary" but now occupied as a school room for the Methodist Episcopal Mission,—and stole from therein one inkstand & pens one sheet of paper containing the roll of the school, two unfinished manuscripts, several sheets of writing papers and some other small articles with several books the above reward will be paid for the apprehension of the morally abandoned, unprincipled, unscrupulous, and defamatory ingrate who perpetrated the aforesaid robbery, and a copy of the ten commandments will be given to each of his accessories before and after the fact who may acknowledge the same. Whoever may have either of the above articles in possession should profit thereby.

"I Won't"—At the "Woman's Convention," Mr. Foster, the husband of Abby Kelly Foster, after a long speech on woman's rights, concluded by charging that the pulpit and St. Paul were responsible for the enslavement of the sex. When the priest says to the woman, "Love, honor and obey," what can she do?

Abby Kelly Foster—Do! Do as the wife of the Rev Joseph Bancroft of Worcester, did. Say, "I won't." (Laughter.) When they came to the word obey, she said "I won't." She was a good woman, and a much better man than her son George. She said "I won't." and she compelled them to leave that part out.

Mr. Foster, (husband to Abby Kelly) Yes; and there was a lady of seventy years old at dinner to-day, who said when she came to the word "obey," she dropped her husband's hand. (Laughter)

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, OCTOBER 1st 1851.

Look-out Auctioneers.—We notice in an American paper that the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has decided that the employment of a puffer at a public auction vitiates the sale, and the buyer is defrauded tho' he did not pay more than the article was worth in the opinion of witnesses—that a man is cheated whenever he is incited by artful means to bid more than he otherwise would. We suppose the case will work well on the other hand; that when an auctioneer fails to exert himself to prevent combinations at auctions; the owner or owners of the property thus sold are also defrauded.

It is reported by good authority that King Bromley and Kia Bucha, a Day Chief, are barricading their towns—the former lives on the St. Paul's river within a stone's throw of the Virginia settlement, and the latter within three miles of it back from the river. They give as a reason for thus fortifying their towns, their apprehensiveness of an attack from Gatoombah. All who are acquainted with affairs in this country known well, that no apprehensions of the kind need be entertained. Gatoombah is too well convinced of the power of the government to attempt to molest any one living immediately in the vicinity of our towns and villages. In fact, it is said, there is no chieftain, who lives in greater fear of the government than Gatoombah—his town was once destroyed by us, and he severely chastised. Indeed, we believe him to be the most quiet chief in our jurisdiction.

It seems that Kia Bucha, who is represented by all to be proud and insolent, lately built a very large thatched house, the roof of which is in the form of a sugar loaf: when such roofs are made, the custom is, to place at the top of the roof a pot of native manufacture; Kia instead, instead of following the custom, substituted a brass kettle of the value of five dollars. Gatoombah and Bah-quadondah, hearing of this, sent messengers to inquire of Kia Bucha, what he meant and intended by departing from the usage of the country, that his great grand father never did such a thing, that they never heard of any one, before him presuming to depart from so ancient a usage; and desired to know if he wished it understood that he had grown more wealthy and powerful than every body else, finally the messenger demanded, that the kettle be taken down. Kia Bucha replied, he was a free man, and cared for no one: and would die before he took it down. Kia Bucha, and King Bromley are friends, and all these are informed how together. Bromley is dependent upon Kia for advice and help in any way. Immediately after the departure of the messengers, Kia, made known to Bromley the object of their visit, and the reply he made to it, at once they agreed, to fortify their towns and prepare to defend them.

In our last, we noticed the assembling in our town, of the chiefs of the Little Cape Mount territory; and that they came at the summons of the President, to give an account, for the attack that had been made on the town of Dwarloo Bey by Boombo, in violation of their treaty stipulations with the government. We also informed our readers that the chiefs had been permitted to return home, to meet here again in November next, when it is proposed to have present the chiefs of Grand Cape Mount and Sugaree. The object of this convocation will be, we presume, to put a final end to the petty annoyances which some of the lesser chiefs are subjected to, from their more powerful neighbors; and to adopt measures to encourage and increase commerce. No doubt need be entertained that any of the chiefs will fail to obey the summons—as they are convinced of the power and resources of this government, and they will not readily incur its displeasure. Indeed, if the summons extended to the Galenas chiefs, it would not have been amiss.

Our readers need no now be informed, that in the several treaties or agreements made with the chieftains in our jurisdiction, that the government stands pledged to preserve peace among them: and if it becomes necessary, it must send an armed force to assist those chieftains who act only on the defensive. The government and people of Liberia are opposed to wars; and it is their duty, as it is their desire to make many allowances and sacrifices before commencing hostilities. It will be well for every Liberian to consider all the relations, which can by any possibility exist, between them and the native African; and be not too ready to try to influence the authorities to coercive measures. We say right or true, and by arguments try to convince them, and when pacific measures fail to produce the desired effect, then let strong means be resorted to. The authority of the government must be feared and felt, or there will be continual wars among the turbulent parties.

The Laws—We are gratified in being able to inform our fellow citizens that H. Teage, Esquire, who has been engaged in compiling the statue laws of this Republic, has nearly completed his labors, and the volume will be ready for the press in a few days. That a work so desirable may be published and given to the public in the shortest possible time; additional force has been added to the printing department of this office and we hope in a few weeks to have the satisfaction of announcing to our readers that the volume is ready for delivery.

Coffee Planting.—A gentleman living on the St. Paul's expects to complete this month, his coffee planing for the year. He has planted out from his nursery eight thousand plants, and there remains to be transplanted about two thousand more. This is certainly doing well. Indeed the banks of the noble St. Paul's clearly indicate that there is a good spirit of industry abroad in our land.

Rice.—Our supply of rice is abundant. Two months ago it was selling at $2 25 a $2 50 per bushel, and ready sale at that. Now, it can readily be procured at $1,50 per bushel. The crops in our neighborhood turned out well. Until April next we may safely calculate in having a fair supply at the latter price—unless, indeed, the demand at the leeward settlements increases, which is not improbable. An offer has been made to the largest trader on this article in Monrovia, for five hundred bushels, to be paid in cash at $1 00 per bushel. It was not accepted.

Lumber—It is with pleasure, we record the safe arrival of a saw mill in the county since. It is a great desideratum. Before the commencement of the rainy season several buildings were commenced, but for want of lumber, they were not finished, and it depends upon the supply of the coming dry season, if they will be completed before the commencement of another rainy season. This is not owing to the absence of large timber in our forest, for they abound with the best of timber for buildings, but the number of timber getters diminishes every year. They find they are less liable to exposure at work on their farms than in the swamps; and that they live more easy and are better contented when they are improving their own property. We wait with much anxiety to hear that the saw mill at Sinoe, is performing its duty. Monrovia will prove to be a profitable customer to the owner of that saw-mill.

MAN A STUDENT.

I say that every man is to be a student. This does not mean that he is to shut himself within four walls, and bend body and mind over books. Men thought before books were written; and some of the greatest thinkers never entered what we call a study. Nature, Scripture, society, present personal subjects for thought; and the man who collects, compares, employs his faculties on any of these subjects, for the purpose of getting the truth, is so far a student, a thinker, a philosopher, and is rising to the dignity of a man. It is time that we should see limit to professed scholars the title of thinkers, philosophers. Whoever seeks truth with an earnest mind, no matter when or how, belongs to the school of intellectual men.

In a loose sense of the word, all men may be said to think; that is, a succession of ideas, notions, passes through their minds from morning to night; but in as far as this succession is passive, undirected, or governed only by accident and outward impulse, it has little more claim to dignity than the experience of the brute, who receives with like passiveness, impressions from abroad through his waking hours. Such thought if thought it may be called, has for its aim, is as useless as the vision of an eye which reasons nothing, which flies without pause over earth and sky, and of consequence receives no distinct image. Thought in its true sense, is an energy of intellect. In thought the mind not only receives impressions or suggestions from within, but reacts upon them, collects its attention, concentrates its forces upon them, breaks them up and analyzes them like a living laboratory, and then combines them anew, traces their connections and thus impresses itself on all the objects which engage it.

The universe in which we live, was thus meant by God to stir up such feelings as those now described.—Dr. Channing.

A WORD FITLY SPOKEN

Dr Jewett, in the course of his travels with his own horse, one day entered a country tavern, and sat down by the bar-room fire to warm his fingers. His keenly roving eye soon discovered prominent over rows of bottles with highly-colored contents, in large letters; the inscription, No credit given here." Turning to the landlord, (to whom he was personally unknown) he said, "Ah! I see that you bring your people square up to the mark here!"

"Yes," replied the landlord, "it's no use to trust my customers now a days. We must get it as we go along, or never get it

Jewet warmed his fingers a while and then turning to the other, said: "I think I could add a line or two to your inscription that would make it very nice."

"What would you add?" enquired the landlord.

"Give me a pen and a piece of paper, and I will show you."

"Walk into the bar; there's pen and ink; help yourself"

The Doctor walked into the bar, and taking up a pen, wrote as follow:

"No credit given here."
And yet I've cause to fear,
That there's a Day-book kept in heaven,
Where charge is made, AND CREDIT GIVEN."

Laying down the pen, and leaving the lines, he walked to the fire and again sat down, expecting an explosion. The landlord whose curiosity, was somewhat moved, went behind his counter and read what he had written. A pause of some minutes ensued, when the Doctor, glancing round, saw to his great pleasure, and somewhat to his surprise from the imitations of dampness about the eyes that he had driven a nail in a "sure place." "A word fitly spoken," how good is it

RELIGIOUS GAMBLING—Not long ago, in a time of a revival a good man, the father of an interesting family, requested me to converse with his son, who had unfortunately become addicted to the vice of gambling. The young man was tenderly loved, and to his parents an object of anxious solicitude.

I called upon the young and was received in a kind and amiable spirit. Frankly my object was stated, and enforced by all the arguments familiar to my own mind. I urged the debasing influence of the vice; the sin which was done to the loser, and the manifest injustice of thus receiving the money which might be needed by the family of another.

The young man heard me through in respectful silence, seeming to admit the justice of all that had been presented. I had supposed I had secured my object and was about to leave with the utmost that God would bless my advice to his reformation and conversion, when he requested me to be seated a moment, while he made a brief statement.

"Three years ago," said he, "the H——— church held a fair and festival. Those splendid bound books you see on the table, were set up at lottery. After much persuasion on the part of a young female friend, a member of your church, I consented against my inclination to purchase two tickets. The prize fell to me, and I was so elated with my good success, that I embraced the first opportunity to gamble on a larger scale, and since then have lost on hundreds of dollars. But for the influence under the patronage of a Christian church, I never should have become a gambler."

The reader may imagine my feelings as I found that the inconsistency of professing Christians had made an apology for the young man, through which none of my arguments could penetrate. I turned away from him with sickness of heart, resolving never to encourage, as a pastor, the ruinous gambling which is carried on by some of the churches on occasions of fairs and festivals.—Watchman and Reflector.

SISTER'S LOVE.

No love is like a sister's love—
Unselfish, free, and pure—
A flame that lighted from above,
Will guide, but ne'er allure.
It knows no frown of jealous fear—
No blush of conscious guile;
Its wrongs are pardon'd through a tear
Its hopes crown'd by a smile.

POETRY.

From the True Union

The Waste of War.

Give me the gold that war has cost,
Before this peace-expanding day;
The wasted skill, the labor lost—
The mental treasure thrown away;
And I will buy each rood of soil
In every yet discovered land;
Where hunters roam, where peasants toil,
Where many-peopled cities stand.
I'll clothe each shivering wretch on earth,
In needful, nay, in brave attire;
Vesture befitting banquet mirth,
Which kings might envy and admire.
In every vale, on every plain,
A school shall glad the gazer's sight;
Where every poor man's child may gain
Pure knowledge, free as air and light.
I'll build asylums for the poor,
By age or ailment made forlorn;
And none shall thrust them from the door,
Hissing with looks and words of scorn.
I'll link each alien hemisphere;
Help honest men to conquer wrong;
Art, Science, Labor, nerve and cheer;
Reward the Poet for his song.
In every crowded town shall rise
Halls Academic, amply graced;
Where IgnorAnce may soon be wise,
And Coarseness learn both art and taste.
To every province shall belong
Collegiate structures, and not few—
Fill'd with a truth exploring throng,
And teachers of the good and true.
In every free and peopled clime
A vast Walhalla hall shall stand;
A marble edifice sublime,
For the illustrious of the land;
A pantheon for the truly great,
The wise, beneficent, and just;
A place of wide and lofty state
To honor or to hold their dust.
A temple to attract and teach
Shall lift its spire on every hill,
Where pious men shall feel and preach
Peace, mercy, tolerance, good-will;
Music of bells on sabbath days,
Round the whole earth shall gladly rise;
And one great Christian song of praise
Stream sweetly upward to the skies!

Home and Woman.

If ever there has been a more touching and eloquent eulogium upon the charms of home and its dearest treasure, woman, than is contained in the following extract from the Christian Inquirer, it has not been our good fortune to meet it:

"Our homes—what is their corner-stone but the virtue of women? And on what does social well-being rest but on our homes?—Must we not secure all other blessings of civilized life to the support of our private dwellings? Are not our hearth stones, guarded by the holy forms of conjugal affection, and parental love, the corner stones of Church and State—more sacred than either—more necessary than both? Let our temples crumble and our academies decay—let every public edifice, our halls of justice, and our Capitols of State, be levelled with the dust—but spare our homes. Man did not invent, and he cannot improve or abrogate them. A private shelter to cover in two hearts dearer to each other than all the world; high walls to seclude the profane eyes of every human being—seclusion enough for children to feel that mother is a peculiar name—this is home; and here is the birth place of every virtuous impulse—of every sacred thought. Here the Church and the State must come for their origin and support. Oh, spare our homes! The overwhelming presence there gives us our faith in an invisible goodness; the purity and disinterestedness of home is our foretaste and our promise of a better world. In the relations there established and fostered do we find through life the chief solace and joy of existence. What friends deserve the name compared with those which a birthright gave us! One mother is worth a thousand friends—one sister dearer and truer than twenty intimate companions. We who have played on the same hearth under the light of smiles, who date back to the same season of innocence and hope, in whose veins run the same blood—do we not find that years only make more sacred and important the tie that binds us? Coldness may spring up, distance may separate, different spheres may divide; but those who can love anything, who continue to love at all, must find that the friends whom God himself gave are wholly unlike any we can choose for ourselves, and that the yearning for these is the strongest spark in our expiring affection."—True Union

THE APPRENTICE.—A young man whose father was in easy circumstances, was desirous of learning the printing business; his father consented, on condition that the son should board at home and pay weekly for his board, out of the avails of his special perquisites, during his apprenticeship.—The young man thought this rather hard; but when he was of age and master of his trade, his father said "Here my son, is the money paid to me for board during your apprenticeship I never intended to keep it, but have retained it for your use, and with it I give you as much more as will enable you to commence your business"

The wisdom of the old man was now apparent to the son, for while his fellows had contracted bad habits in the expenditure of similar perquisites, and were now penniless and in vice, he was enabled to commence business respectably; and he now stands at the head of publishers in this country, while most of his former companions are poor, vicious, and degarded.

PATRICK HENRY.—When the celebrated Patrick Henry, of Virginia, was near the close of life and in feeble health, he laid his hand on the Bible, and addressing an old friend who was near him—"Here is a book," said he, worth more than all others ever printed, yet it is my misfortune never to have read with proper attention till lately." About the same time he wrote his daughter—"I hear it is said the Deists have claimed me The thought gives me more pain than the appellation of Tory.—For I consider religion of infinitely higher importance than politics, and I find much cause to reproach myself that I have lived so long and given no decided and public proof of my being a christian"

THE TABLES TURNED.

FATHER FLYNN had been lecturing us on the greatness and power of the Church, and commanding us to leave the care of our souls entirely to the clergy, and to be satisfied that what they told us, and nothing else, was right. There was a bold fellow present, one Phil Ryan, a decent farmer, with some small holdings in a place near us. After they were dismissed, all but me and two or three more that were in the priest's confidence, Phil came back, and making his best bow, said:

'Plase your reverence, I just forgot how I want to lodge a complaint against Mike Connor; he's so contrary, and scrupulous, and suspicious.'

'Well, be short, man; it's little I'm likely to do in settling your differences; but I always held Mike to be a decenter fellow nor yourself,' says Father Flynn.

'Well, then,' says Phil, 'to make short of it, yer honor, I want Mike to rint of me a snug cabin, and a matter of two acres of good land, or a lease.'

'Well?'

'Mike is unreasonable, your reverence, all out; he wants to see my title, to be sure it's good, and to examine all about the property, which I take very unkind at his hand, seeing he has my word for it all.'

'Why, man alive!' says the priest, who had a liking to Mike, 'what's got into you head now? Do you suppose any but a mere natural would take your bare wo d in a matter where himself, his interest, and his comfort, are all concerned? Go, give him the satisfaction he wants, and don't be setting yourself up in the place of law juctice, lease and all.'

But Phil did not move. 'Plase your reverence,' said he, 'I have the head landlords's authority to say that he executed the l ase, putting me in possession of these premises, to let as I like; and why should any man stand doubting me, or want of proofs?

'Get along, sir,' says Father Flynn to him again; 'produce your lease, show him the title, satisfy the honest man's mind that his own will be good, or else he's a fool if he has any thing to say to you or your holding: it's what every tenant has a right to,' says he again to us, 'and ye know that, boys, very well.'

But what a change came over Phil! He stood as bold as a lion, and as brisk l oking as a kid; and never moving his eyes from the priest's face, that grew all scarlet and blue as he spoke, he said, 'Why, then, your reverence, will you please show me your title to grant me an entrance into the kingdom of heaven; and satisfy me that if I take at your hands I am safe in possession, let who may object to it?'

The priest was like one mad! He made as if he would close in upon him to chastise him; but Phil was a powerful fellow, and not to be trifled with. He stood of his guard firmly, but not disrespectfully, and so went on.

'It's but a cabin, sir, and a patch of ground, and the longest possession a man ca have of it is but a few years But in case that he don't get it, there's scores of places just as good to the fore; or it he's turned out, he needn't want a shelter to go to. But the place that we're depending on your reverence to engage for us when we leave this world—'

Here the priest interrupted him with a worse word than I wish to write down. Watchman and Reflector.

THE COURSE OF COMETS.

THE wonderful characteristics which mark the flight of comets through space; the suddenness with which they blaze forth; their exceeding velocity, and their terrific appearance; their eccentric motions, sweeping towards the sun, from all regions and in all directions, have rendered these bodies objects of terror in all ages of the world. While the planets pursue an undeviating course round the sun, in orbits nearly circular, and almost coincident with the plane of the earth s orbit, all revolving harmoniously in the same direction, the comets perform their revolutions with every possible eccentricity, confined to no particular plane, and moving indifferently in accordance with, or opposed to, the general motion of the planets. They come up from below the plane of the ecliptic, or plunge downward towards the sun from above; sweep swiftly round this their great centre, and with incredible velocity, wing their flight far into the fathomless regions of space, in some cases never again to reappear to human vision.

In the early ages of the world, superstition regarded these wandering fiery worlds with awe, and looked upon them as omens of pestilence and war; and indeed, even in modern times, no eye can look upon the fiery train spread out for millions of miles athwart the sky, and watch the eccentric motions of these anomalous objects without a feeling of dread. The movements of the planets inspire confidence. They are ever visible, and true to their appointed times; while the comet, erratic in its course, bursts suddenly and unannounced upon the sight, and no science can predict in the outset its certain track—whether it may plunge into the sun, or dash against one of the planetary systems or even come in collision with our own earth, is equally uncertain, until after a sufficient number of observations shall have been made to render the computation of the elements of its orbit possible.

Previous to the discovery of the law of universal gravitation, comets were looked upon as anomalous bodies, of whose motions it was quite impossible to take any account. By some philosophers they were regarded as meteors kindled into a blaze in the earth's atmosphere, and when once extinguished they were lost forever. Others looked upon them as permanent bodies, revolving in orbits far above the moon, and reappearing at the end of long but certain intervals. When, however, it was discovered that under the influence of gravitation, any revolving worlds might describe either of the four curves, the circle, elipse, parabola, or hyperbola, it at once became manifest that the eccentric movements of the comets might be perfectly represented by giving to them orbits of the parabolic or hyperbolic form, the sun being located in the focus of the curve. According to this theory, the comet would become visible in its approach to its perihelion, or nearest distance from the sun—would here blaze with uncommon splendor, and in its recess to the remote parts of the orbit, would gradually fade from the sight, relaxing its speed, and performing a vast portion of its vast curve far beyond the reach of human vision.—Prof. Mitchell.

Bridging the Nile.

The editor of the Boston Medical and Surgical Jonrnal, now on a visit to Egypt and Nubia, gives the following account of the bridge in progress of construction across the Nile, near Cairo.

The pyramids are now in full sight, 9 miles off. A French engineer is constructing a strong, beautiful bridge across the river, where the water is both deep and swift. The arches are of large brick, neatly turned. Another appears to be building over the Damietta branch, as seen in the distance. Mud-machines, all iron, worked by steam; pile-drivers, and machinery of all kinds for carrying on a heavy business; besides immense piles of stone, brick, timber and other materials, indepeadently of laborers, stones, carts, boats, and mules give the spot for miles around, an active and bustling appearance Six years, we are informed, have elapsed since the piers were commenced. This is the first bridge it is believed, over the Nile. The undertaking indicates more ample resources, and greater energy in the government than we have seen since leaving Pasha'e fleet at Alexandria. On making a visit to the embankments about the abutments of the bridge, to secure them from the assaults of the angry river god, when he finds these obstructing arches in the way of his floods, I fell in with one of the engineers, and some statistics were gathered from him respecting the bridge. It was commenced by Mahomet Ali, some years since, and a fear is entertained that it will never be finished. The diving bell is an extraordinary machine with which 60 men at once have sunk to the river bed to drive piles, lay the foundation stones, &c. The water at the lowest point is thirty feet deep, and the mud thirty more below that, down through which the foundation for the pillar is sunk in iron boxes, till its weight lodges on the firm bottom. The whole length of the piers ready for receiveing the arches, is 90 feet, twenty feet above high water. Last year 25,000 men were employed, at present only 2000, the Pacha having used up his funds in building and furnishing costly palaces in every direction Every three months, the governor of a village is called on for a certain number of villagers, for this public work. Of course, they are promiscuously impressed and sent down. Their daily pay is only 7 cents—finding their own food as they can. A judge has an office at the arsenal at the east end of the bridge, before whom the laborers are brought on all complaints. Two witnesses are sufficient to sustain a charge; and 30 lashes for a man and 25 for a boy is the ordinary sentence which is instantly executed. A perpetual flogging is going on every day except the Mahommetan Sabbath—to-day (Friday) being one—when all labor is suspended. The chief engineer, a Frenchman, has a salary of 25 purses, a month, epual to 125 sterling; the judge 12 pounds for keeping the peace. A ragged black fellow, half bare above and below, ordered our boat from a pin in the mud to which it was fast, waiting, for wind, saying he was the Pacha's guard. I pointed to our stars and stripes at the peak, and told him to touch the line at his peril. After much display of oratorical wrath, he intimated that a present would make all right, which he did not get

A YANKEE'S PECULIARITIES

Winchell, the distinguished humorist, recited a recent Pilgrim's Festival at Cleveland, Ohio. He gave the following description of a Yankee.

"A real live Yankee, just caught will be found not deficient in the following qualities. He is self-denying, self-relying, always trying, and into everything prying. He is a lover to piety, property, sobriety, notoriety, and the temperance society He is a dragging, gagging, striving, driving, thriving, hoping, swapping, jostling, bustling, wrestling, musical, quzzical, astronomical, poetical, philosophical, and comical sort of character, whose manifest destiny is to spread civilization to the remotest corner of the earth—with an eye always on the look out for the main chance."

Learn some Trade.

Tay. the notorious burglar, has been sentenced to Toronto to twenty years' hard labor in the Provincial Penitentiary. He was found guilty on two indictments, and condemned to ten years' imprisonment on each When brought up to hear the judgment of the Court, he was asked if he had any thing to say why the penalty of the law should not be pronounced against him. He replied as follows:

No, my Lord—I have violated the laws of my country. I have been tried by an impartial jury and convicted, and I humbly bow to their decision—throwing myself entirely upon the leniency and mercy of the Court. There are, however, two favors which I would ask, if a felon in the dock dare ask a favor; first, that, as I have no means of my own, though a portion of the money taken from me belonged to myself, the Court would see my counsel properly feed, since he has ably, though unsuccessfully defended me The second is, that when I am sent to the Penitentiary, they would intercede, and have me taught some trade or profession in order that, should I ever be released from it, I may be able to earn an honest livelihood. I attribute my present course of life solely to the circumstance, that I was never brought up to any trade. Should I not be taught any occupation while in the Penitentiary, when I come out I shall be friendless, homeless, penniless, and ragged—and I must necessarily resume my old habits, and become what I was before—a robber.

Comparative Value of Daughters.—Jean Jacques Rousseau says that when his wife died, every father in the neighborhood offered to console him with one of his daughters; but a few weeks afterwards, his cow having likewise deceased, not a solitary individual of them thought of replacing his loss by the offer of another; thereby proving the different value now set upon their cows and daughters.—True Union

THE COLORED PATRIOTS OF AMERICA.—Mr. Wm. C. Nell, a capable colored man, of Boston, has published a pamphlet in illustration of the "Services of Colored Americans, in the wars of 1776 and 1812" Such facts as the writer could collect from various sources, showing the numbers of the colored soldiers in the American armies, and the estimation in which their bravery and patriotism have been held by Hancock, Eustis, Burgess, Jackson, and others, are here given Among the individuals noticed, is Richard Leavers, or "Black Dick," who was born in Salem, Mass., or vicinity, and whose career in Dartmoor Prison was mentioned in the papers published a few years since by Dr. B F Browne.

MORE EMIGRANTS FOR THE NEW REPUBLIC.—It is stated that Mr Jacob Hikes, a farmer living near Louisville, Ky.; offers to liberate a slave family of eight persons, worth more than $3,000; and to give them an outfit, provided he can be remunerated in the small sum of $650. Most of the amount has been subscribed.

Debate of the Faculties.

ON THE PURSUITS OF LIFE

The members being assembled in the Rotunda, called Cranium, Order took the chair, by general consent, when Causality introduced the following resolution:—

"Resolved, That it is time to make a selection of a pursuit for life, and that this question be now discussed."

"In deciding upon the merits of this resolution," said Causality, "I think it the part of wisdom to select something which will be useful to mankind, and which can always be relied upon for a support. Anything will satisfy me which will not fail with the change of fashion. Agriculture is good and can never fail to be needed, nor will it ever be overdone. Besides, the king and clown alike need bread; so that the vibrations of fashion and fluctation of opinions, religious or political, can never set it aside. The same is true of blacksmithing, carpentry, ship-building, masonry and manufacturing cloth leather, iron and lumber, and many other substantial trades Legitimate commerce, and general trade, are likewise necessary but very liable to be overdone."

Ideality arose, and said, "I trust that great care will be taken in this selection; for really I can hardly perceive it possible for me to be contented with any of these common pursuits named by our venerable friend. I most earnestly implore that we may have something ornamental, like sculpture, painting, daguerreotype, selling fancy goods, or if we must manufacture, let it be watches, jewelry, or that which is decorative and beautiful.

Approbativeness addressed the chair: I agree, in the main; with the last member up; but some of the occupations he has named would not suit me. The idea of working in plaster and marble, and looking dusty like a miller, is horrible. True we might excel so as to obtain fame, like a Canova or a Powers, when we would be courted by the great, and our name sent down to posterity on the enduring statue and scroll of honor. But should we fail of achieving the highest honors of the art. I would by far prefer to be a genteel tradesman in an elegant store, with aristocratic customers, where we could dress finely, and live in style. This is the life and the business for me. I go for a business of the highest respectability, and one in which our efforts will not be regarded as labor."

Causality whispered a word to Calculation who rose, and said, "Our friend who has just resumed his seat is perhaps not aware of the anxious cares, the searching estimates and calculations, the far reaching plans and harassing duties which will devolve on us to keep such as mercantile business in successful operation. Financiering and calculating profit and loss, contriving to meet payments, posting books and making bills, running after bad debts and managing a store full of clerks and selfish customers all day and half the night, is no trifle, but is so much like labor that it takes a world of vanity to twist it into any other name. One may bow and smile over a counter to fashionable customers, and be arrayed in nice attire, with hair perfumed, and lily white hands, loaded with sparkling rings, and perhaps reap a few bargains; but this is the poetry of the business. There are ten thousand annoyances and cares that the unexperienced little dream of, until they become sober realities. Look at the grey looks, careworn features, and anxious, agitated manner of merchants —old before their time—and it takes off some of the tinsel of the commercial pursuit."

"I am informed," said Caustiousness, "that ninety out of every hundred who engage in the mercantile pursuits, fail in business and die poor: and I shall take time to consider before I engage in as hazardous an enterprise, with the assurance, too, that he must work—yes, work—as hard as any mechanic, and that kind of work too which wears out the health, nerves, patience, and sometimes the honestly of the man. I had rather have the dust of the miller, or the soot of the forge, or the clamor and labor the lumber mill, with the certainty of a substantial competence, than to shine in gay colors a few years among fashionables, and run the risk of being kicked at last into the hovel of pinching poverty by the very cliques, for the gratification of whose pride and vanity we have lived and labored, and to which we had finally been sacrified."

"But," responed Approbativeness, "I am informed by Hope, and believe it true, that we shall be of the fortunate class who get rich; and Self Esteem says, we can, without doubt, succeed, as he is quite confident that few possess the talent which we can bring into business. I don't care if we do have balance sheets to make and bank notes to pay, for every one knows it is respectable to be seen and known 'on 'change!" and as to the night watchings and drudgery of the business, so much feared by Cautiousness and magnified by Calculation, who cares so much for that, if one can be called a splendid merchant, and ride in his carriage, and live fashionably? But it should be remembered that a merchant does very little work: that is done by clerks and porters. It should not be forgotten that we are to be a merchant, the owner and proprietor. Then we can wear fine cloth, elegant ornaments, polished boots, and live in ease and respectability."

"Nonsense, "said Combativeness, "give us a business that is manly in its character. I am utterly disgusted with the soft twattle of Approbativeness about elegance, gentility, and effeminacy. For a white hand, standing dicky, flashy chains and rings, and fashionable dress, he would run the risk of protested notes, bankruptcy a hungry stomach, and a hovel. I would a thousand fold prefer to grapple resolutely in sterm effort, and force from the grasp of relentless fortune an honorable competence, than to smile and bow to win the good graces of the fickle dame. He may rub his white hand, and whisper soft persuasive blarney for success; but I prefer to seize the prize with my hard hand and stalwart arm, and shout my manly triumph with the lion's voice.—I am ready, with Firmness, Destructiveness and Constructiveness, to plunge into the rugged wilds of the West, and redeem it from solitude; or to build ships, or in them ride the stormy ocean; or in the mine, forge or factory, force matter into useful forms; anything of an industrial character, that will enable us to drive our way to prosperity, will suit me better than selling shirt buttons, needles, pins and tape It is not in my nature to wait for a business to come to me. I desire to rush out into active life; and by main strength of muscle or machinery, force prosperity to yield her treasures."

"Well said," responded Firmness, "give us a business, whatever it may be; that requires, and will repay manly energy and perseverance. I cannot endure fickleness and irregularity. 'Sure and steady wins the day. Our friend Combativeness may rely upon my constancy in aiding his proposition."

Self-Esteem rose, with unbending dignity, and" having surveyed each member very coolly, proceeded to say, "I have listened to the several suggestions of members, hoping that the choice of a pursuit might be made without any counsel from me, choosing that those who have the work to do would satisfy themselves as to the kind of business to be done; leaving to me merely the general direction or superintendence of the business when established. Let it be understood, however, that I would much prefer a dignified calling—a large, heavy business, I care not what is its character, whether tilling the soil, navigating the ocean, wielding the sledge, rearing the edifice, felling the forest, or substantial merchandise. Give me as aids, Conscientiousness, Firmness, Causality, Combativeness, Destructiveness, and Constructiveness, as right hand men, and I will engage to make honorable any business which a man ought to engage in. Inglorious idleness, and consequent dependence, I cannot tolerate. To pursue a course requiring us to cringe to public caprice is equally odious. I cannot eat the bread of dependence, nor wear garments spotted with dishonor. I would be a street scavenger rather, and ennoble my avocation by a character above reproach, and an elevated intelligence. No labor which is useful is degrading; and if I could be heard, to make a boot or rule a kingdom should neither elevate one man nor depress another. We lack true personal dignity when we suppose that the honest dust and sweat of useful toil degrades the MAN, or that simpering gentility in ornamental occupations, necessarily accompanies true HONOR.

Interesting Retrospect.

Remarkable Discoveries, Inventions, &c From 1800 to 1851.

Let us look back to the beginning of this century, and see how mighty works have been done by inventors since that time. In 1800, there was not a single steamboat in the world. In 1807, Fulton launched the Clermont, which made a passage to Albany in 32 hours. At that time the mode of travel was by schooners and sloops, which were frequently six days on the passage. The improvement was certainly great, but what would Fulton say now, to see steamboats running the same distance in 8 hours—and some of them large enough to stow the Clermont on their forward decks. No steamboat had broke the waters of the Mississippi previous to 1815; the voyage from Cincinnati to New Orleans; was a tremendous undertaking, and occupied more time than a steamboat would now take to circumnavigate the globe.

In Europe steamboats were unnown until 1814, and no sea was regularly navigated by steamboats until 1842.—If in 1800 there was no steamboat in the wide world, where is the country now where they are not seen, and where they are not exercising a most important influence? No country in the world

The steamboat is not the only important invention of the last half century—the progress of invention is just as marked in other departments of discovery. Look at that iron horse moving out of his stable, screaming and panting to start on his journey. That is the steam engine in its most perfect state—it is a near approach to the spiritual and physical combination. Within three months the Quen of England was transported from the interior of Scotland to London, a distance of 400 miles in ten hours. In 1800 the same journey could not be accomplished in less than eight days. If the steamboat has revolutionized intercommunication by river and sea, the locomotive has done more to revolutionize travel by land. In 1800, there was not a single locomotive in the world; not for 29 years after viz: the 6th day of October, 1829 the day on which the Rocket ran on the Liverpool and Manchester railway, at the average rate of 15 miles per hour. Neither Asia nor Africa can boast of a single Railroad line completed. What were the old Roman roads in comparison to the footpaths of our iron horses?

Who, if they were told, twenty years ago, that the sunlight was used for a limner's pencil, would have believed it? Not one; and yet this has been done. When M. Daguerre, a distinguished chemist of Paris, first published, in 1836, that he had discovered a method of taking pictures on metal plates by the sun; the public regarded his metal tables with feelings of wonder. And if this discovery has not yet produced such important results, nor affected the customs of society so much as the steamships and railways, still it is a beautiful and wonderful discovery; and the time may be not far distant when it will be applied to point the planets as they roll in their courses, and thus impress the warm kiss of the star upon the pale cheek of the artist's metalic canvass.

Among the grand discoveries of the last half century, the Electrical Telegraph stands out in bold relief. It has given to man the power of transmitting his thoughts to his fellow-man thousands of miles distant in a few seconds. "Electricity leaves her thunderbolts in the sky, and like Mercury dismissed from Olympus acts as letter carrier and messenger boy." In 1837, when Morse first proclaimed that he could write messages by electricity at any distance, wise people shrugged their shoulders and looked with bland unbelief upon such a daring proposition; and when the proposal was before Congress, in 1843, to appropriate $30,000 to test his system of telegraphing, it met determined side cuts and stern opposition from men (and there are a great number in the world,) who are conservatives in nothing else but scientific discovery. In 1843 the first line of telegraph was completed in our country; between Washington and Baltimore, and since that time the progress of telegraph lines has been most surprising and astounding. if anything can surprise us in the shape of discovery. All the important cities in our Union are linked together by the lightning tracts; and wherever we travel there we behold suspended on slender poles those attenuated threads. along which the lightning flies with messengers of love, hope, gain, or fear. The telegraph has produced most astonishing changes in the mode of conducting business. A few years ago, what a wear and tear of horse flesh there was in getting news for our daily papers, what a trouble and delay there was in getting the news from Halifax during the winter season. Now what a change! A steamship arrives at Halifax, Boston, or New York this morning, and the European news is published in the New Orleans papers in the evening. The speeches delivered in the halls of Congress to-day, are delivered to the readers of the newspapers in all our important cities next morning. Our astronomers, "pale watchers of the rolling sphere," employ the lightning pen to register their observations. The whole science of Voltaism, Electro-Magnetism; and Electro-typing, are trophis of the discoveries made during the last fifty years. Volta's letter to Sir Joseph Banks, announcing the discovery of the Voltaic Pile, is dated March 20th. 1800 The splendid discovery of Electro Magnet, by Oersted, is dated 1821; and the beautiful art of Electro-typing, whereby electricity is made to resolve the metals from their liquid solution, and copy with the utmost accuracy, the metals of Duer, the most delicate etchings, and even write in permanent characters of gold, is but a few years old. Electro-magnetism has been employed to separate metals from their ores, to drive machinery, to make huge bars of iron dance in mid air, like the fabled coffin of Mahomet; and what it may accomplish in future times. (for there are still mysteries connected with it,) it is not posible to predict.

Before the beginning of the present century, what was the printing press in comparison to what it now is? A few years ago there was not a single printing press driven by steam, now there is not a paper with a large circulation printed without

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr. Herald:

In my last communication to you, and through you, to the public on the subject of certain grievances and complaints loudly descanted upon, and widely circulated throughout all ranks of Liberian society, I ventured the suggestion of a remedy—the presentation of a plan, which if put in operation, and assidously and prudently conducted, will effectually remove or cure the greivances and their consequents, the complaints. Lest however, the suggested plan might be distasteful, as involving too much of self-denial—too great a sacrifice of that kind of indulgence which we, and the lower order of God's creation alike delight in—and also the surrender of another kind of gratification for which the brute creation has too much sound philosophy to have any regard;—lest any one of these supposed consequents upon the plan, should produce a revulsion of the public taste, and cause a closing of the ear, against all further argument—and of the eye, upon all the certain and accumulating benefits which would result from its adoption, and leave the mind still in the region, of cheerless darkness where nought is felt, but the grindings of high prices, nor heard but the wailings of unavailing complaint, I entered into a recognisance to suggest another plan in your next. If your readers should perchance look into your next, they may be inclined to think I have forfeited my recognisance, and exposed myself in consequence to all the pains and penalties of forfeiture. Availing myself however, of that common law privilege, extended to all by the too often heartless demand of one of the maxims of justice "what have you to say that judgement should not be pronounced against you!" I throw myself upon the lenity of my country, and in arrest of judgement, or at least in mitigation of the penalty beg to put in the following pleas: First, that although I am a professed and practised scribbler, and where nonsense is the theme—or nothing, or all parts of the heavens the aim, can write current calum. I find where sense is to have a place in the effusion; when all reasons, arguments and illustrations adduced, are required to be made convergent to a single point; where, in other words a reach is to be made down into the hidden recesses of the soul, and truths to be brought up from their concealment to the light of day, and to be formed into a regular series, and to be put down upon paper in a natural dependent concatenation—when my engagement requires—not that I shall attempt men, and as suits my temper or my genius, heap up opprobious or laudatory epithets upon them—but that I shall concert and compact measures, and so illustrate and enforce them, as to impel the public mind to adopt them, and to test their practicability by a fair trial: when this is to be done I find it is much easier to make the engagement than to work out the performance. Second, That at the time when to redeem my promise, I should have been engaged in exploring with the torch of contemplation and abstraction, the dark inner caverns, where truth lies in mysterious abayance, I was called upon to be "absent on duty"—a duty wholly inconsistant with calm and collected reflection. Third: a conviction that the importance of the subject demands that whatever might be set forth and commended to the adoption of the people should present claims, to at least their serious and earnest attention, I was irresistibly inclined to a hope, that the sternness of the law, would in my case, be abated; and acting upon that hope I deferred the execution of my purpose to a more convenient season.

And lastly, that when the truths, by an exhausting effort had been brought up, without order or regularity from their concealment within, and were undergoing a mental analysis and classification, the whole logical apparatus was thrown into utter confusion by the untimely announcement of my boy; "the flour is twelve dollars and seventy two cents a barrel, sir!" A sound which drove the beautiful image from my mind—sent my nerves capering in a more than St. Vet's dance, and determined me to call off all regards and desire from the leeks garlic and onions of Egypt, and by way of preventive of like occurrence in future, to fall back on may "reserved rights"—my cassada, Rice and Potatoes. As I can see no reason why I should not be discharged, but very many why I should be, I assume it that I am acquitted; and in all the liberty which that acquital brings I proceed to put down my thoughts and to define my plan.

In order the more effectually to do this, or to exhibit the plan to the greatest advantage it may not be unwise to set the object to be effected and the plan by which it is proposed to be effected in close juxtaposition.

What is the object to be effected? It is to escape from the heavy and grinding tribute imposed upon us, in the shape of prices. The last vessel that entered our port (I write on the 23rd, Sept.) demanded $12, 72 for flour—30 cts for butter—20 $ for tobacco and $10 a barrel for mackarel—perfect minnows in size, and as lean as a miser's soul. I am not one of those who inveigh against the owners, supercargos or agents of that vessel. Mutatus mutandis change places and the abusers will be the abused. The science of casuistry is carried into the regions of trade by those only who are losers in a bargain. Wayland has written well. We all subscribe to the truths of his teaching—but we regard them as more a system of speculative abstractions, than a code of practial and every-day ethics. We refresh our mind with Wayland, and go out upon our change with his sublime maxims upon our lips, but as we cannot assure ourselvs that the very first man we meet with, is indoctrinated into Wayland, or prepared to go with us, and to bargain wtih us, in those ethereal regions of more than conventional honor and honesty, we deem it a measure of prudence to gard ourselves against trickery and design, and to meet that very first man with that maxim of doubtful honesty, "It is lawful for one to make the best bargain he can for himself"—wholly forgetting the possibility, that he with whom we have just met and just bargained, was himself delectating in those higher and purer regions of social and commercial integrity and simplicity, in which our imagination had just been revelling; and that by the character alone of the warfare which we made upon him, was he forced from his high ascent back to those sorded regions, where truth is too often made to blush, and honesty to hang its head. Thus much by way of proem; in the next you will have the plan.—

Yours,

LIBERIA,

FROM OUR JOURNAL

Mr. Herald,

Having made an excursion from Monrovia through the north west part of our State; to some 25 or 30 miles south of Sangner; I have thought it well to send you some of my observations of the region through which I travelled, which if you deem worthy of your columns, may be of service to some of our citizens desirous of visiting or establishing mercantile houses in that section of our State:

My means of observation were necessarily limited—but never having met with a description of the route pursued, I have condensed them, trusting they may prove of some little value. Arriving at Monrovia from the U. S. on the 7th of Feb, 1850; there I remained until the 11th. Leaving Monrovia on Friday 11th at ten o'clock A. M. I proceeded up the St. Paul's about 10 miles, then landing at More's Ferry on Payne's creek, from thence I passed for about 3 or 4 miles over the most beautiful tract of land I ever seen. Well timbered, at 4 in the afternoon I arrived at Vonswar a small town at present: but the immense influx of native merchants and Mandingo Missionaries, is destined soon to hold out great inducements to the merchants and farmers to open a large road for the purpose of geting with greater facility its commodities: here I stayed 10 days, during which time I visited all the half towns and farms of note in the vicinity, I found the land very fertile.

21th. On leaving this place I travelled due east for about 20 miles, over a beautiful portion of country; soil light and sandy; well timbered and richly addorned with the Flora tribe: being now about 31 miles from Monrovia. I found myself at the the well known city of Sewenhy, this is also a neat little town with a population of 4 or 500 inhabitants. Here farming is carried on, on a more extensive plan, than at Vonswar; soil, about the same; staple commodities, cotton rice, and potatoes.

27th. From Sewenhy striking so newhat in a northeasterly direction for about 25 miles: the face of the country assumes an entirely different appearance, a mold of nearly 3 feet thick highly productive and well watered by small streams or rivulets:

The growth of timber here is immense, principally what is here called bastard mahogany. This soil would yield I suppose from 900 to 1000 lbs of seed cotton or 35 bushels of corn per acre. Sweet potatoes seem to grow here spontaneously. I passed through 3 very large farms on this path, at 6 P. M entered Gamah, a Golah town of some note in this region containing 2 or 300 souls, here I intended stoping only for the night: but being informed by his lordship Brumly "that big water live close here," I concluded to remain and visit the place next morning early accompanied by his lordship and a part of a suit I secured in search of the spot, in an hour after leaving Gebbeh I found myself upon the banks of the beautiful St. Paul's; it was a refreshing sight to my eyes to behold once more that stream, the mouth of which I had left seventy five miles below, this stream seemed to be navigable just here for large vessels and perhaps for 20 or 30 miles beyond. Just below Gebbeh, there are 3 beautiful falls in the river, which may with propriety be called the Niagara of Liberia. Here I crossed the river and entered Gebbeh, proper a city of no recent date—with a population of about 700 souls. The lands here are rich [illegible] cotton, seemed to be one of the principle products:

28th. Leaving Gebbeh a little to the south, I travelled upon the banks of the St. Paul's somewhat northwest about 12 or 15 miles, and suddenly entering a small but handsome town to my surprise I found it to be the long expected Sewenhy, situated on a declivity of a high rang of hills, and immediately on the banks of the St. Paul's; in this town strange to say, the citizens have left a few of the original forest tress standing, which gives to it an agreeable appearance: here the soil is prolific and cultivation on the increase:

March 1st. Leaving this place I resumed my northwest course, descending into a circular valley, or an area two miles square—the soil is of a rusty color, and not a Palm to be seen within its limits: at the south end is an extensive bed of iron ore, which covers the surface on the ground for several acres. Ascending from this vally the beautiful amount Jane (so named by myself after His Excellency, the President's Lady,) on whose summit is situated the magnificent city of Samma, Although the whole country is one of admiration, yet so beautiful and fertile, is this mount whose summit is, I suppose about 300 feet above the level of the sea, that all below it seemed to present a furlorn appearance. I verily thought that Nimous, who in search of perpetual spring would have been satisfied had he attained this. I deem it unnessary to detail all the ceremonies which took place on my arrival, however the day after my arrival, his majesty Larsarnah, ascended the throne and had me before him, of course for interrogation, after which he assured me that he would protect me, and that his name was a sufficient passport for me, in all this region. Having received these tokens of kindness and respect from his majesty, I left "the" palace much pleased with my new home. After remaining here three weeks and geting things somewhat straight, I then determined to visit Boporah, a city of ancient date and much venerated by the people of this region. Accordingly Wensday morning at 9 o'clock I set out for Boporah, entering the most beautiful path that I had seen on the whole route, a mountain taking its rise at the foot of mount Jane and runing south-west, resembling the blueridge of Old Virginia, more than any thing I have yet seen. I stoped several times to examin the soil which I found to be the loum lands of this region. I was informed by two of the aboriginal farmers that rice yielded twice as much here as in other parts of the country. Arriving at Boporah, about 11 A. M. I was gladly received by his Highness Mamourah. This is a large and well inhabited town, situated between too lofty mountains, here I find that horses, cows, sheep goats &c. &c. are in greater abundance than in Samma, they have daily markets in both places.

From this place I visited Gollary Ninny; this is also situated in a valley two miles in length, running north and south, and about one mile wide, on either side is a high mountain at the base of the southern one, runs Boatswain's creek. The quarries in this region appear to be inexhaustible, and will at no distant day I hope, be worked by Liberians in such quantities as to produce a sufficient supply for all Africa. The grit varies in quality from the finest hone to the coarsest whetstone.

LIBERIOUS,

Mr. Herald.

We are compelled a second time, to beg that you will allow us a space in your columns, for a few remarks, so that we may have an opportunity of acknowledging our unpardonable neglect in seeking to know the powers of the Court of Quarter Sessions, and confessing our wilful ignorance of our state laws relating to marriage &c.

It was not our intention in the remarks over signature of "A Correspondent," to invite any thing in the shape of a controversy or a paper war fire; nor was it our wish to make that which is already obscure more obscure; but we merley wished to call the public attention to to the fact of some occurrences, which seem to have a bad tendency, and which if they are permitted to continue will in future result in ruinous consequences.

Our opponent after admitting the justness of the divine precept "Let every man have his own wife &c" goes on to commend us for our "efforts" by saying that they "have not been without some success."—In the next place he sets to railing against us for not having given ourselves the "trouble" to obtain correct information with respect to the proceedings &c of the court &c.—Thirdly he charges us of being ignorant of the facts of the case;—fourthly he gives us the proceedings of the Court before which the Kroo-men were brought to answer for living loosely, and contrary to law with some American women.—Fifthly he tells us what the law says in relation to marriage.—Sixthly he says that one Kroo-man did obtain license according to law and was married, the others deemed marrying, and in our opinion very properly set adrift.

And lastly our friend says, that should it be ascertained that Boston had a wife at Niffoo or Bottoo he and his securities are answerable for the amount of the bond, and himself and spouse liable to transportation and Timbuctoo shall be the place of his banishment.

Now we are not disposed to quarrel nor bicker about Boston, Jim a Jim, or any one else, but in view of all these disqualifications with which we are said to be clothed, and the host of contradictions with which we are assailed, together with the soreness which we feel from the pressure of those heavy beams of "enlightenment" which have been thrown down upon us in our misty dungeon, we feel called upon to make some remarks in self defence, and to prove most conclusively what our opponent has "taken the trouble" to disprove. It was our intention to follow our studious antagonist step by step but fearing that we might darken counsel by words, which (we are sorry to say, our opponent has done intentionally, we therefore will confine ourselves to uncontrovertible facts, and to the more sure word of prophesy.—In our first, we asserted that we had witnessed the marriage of some three or four Kroo-men to a corresponding number of American women, and that those marriages were the consequences of a Town Council ordinance or some measure resorted to by the Grand Jury—we take back the latter part of this assertion, because, we did not as our opponent says "give ourselves the trouble to obtain correct information in respect to the proceedings instituted, and the order of the Court in the case referred to"—In the next place we intimated that each one of these Kroo-men who were married had a wife or wives in his country. —To this our friend opposes the law by saying and concludes with "well one of the Kroo-men we learn did obtain license accordinging to law and was married. But should it be ascertined that Mr. Boston had a Wife at Niffoo or Bottoo, he and his securities are answerable for the amount of the bond, and himself and spouse liable to transportation"—Now if we are charged with wilful blindness, surely our opponent can be said to be perfectly earless, or if he has ears, he certainly must be determinedly deaf; for had he taken the same pains to unstop his ears which he says we should have taken to open our eyes, he would have known that four Kroo-men were married to four American women —And now we have "given ourselves the trouble" to be correctly informed, and by our information we are ready not only to prove that four American women whose names can we called if necessary, were married, by men in authority, but also to prove that each one of these Kroo-men had a wife or wives at Niffoo; and if Mr. Remarks will only give himself a little "trouble," just enough to hear the statement of Prince and Jim-a-Jim, he will be better informed in the case referred to, and may also be branded with the easy spelt epithet "ignorant," and be asked to go and search the books. Yes; let him go and search the records of the Justice of the Peace, and he will find what we have said and wrote there in Big Letter Now we hope our opponent will take the "trouble" to see the penal money of those bonds, if he can find any planked down, and this transportation to Timbuctoo effected, and then we will be friends again. * * *

A CORRESPONDENT.

Remarks

We beg, most distinctly, to state for the information of our friend "A Correspondent" that, in our remarks, in reference to his article which appeared in the 5th No. of this paper—we had not the slightest intention of provoking a news paper warfare,

We may also be permitted to state that it was not our intention to question the sincerity of his motives. We know "A Correspondent" too well—and entertain the highest respect for his opinion; and, instead of "drawing against him, we beg to assure him that we always receive his articles with particular satisfaction, and give them that attention they are justly entitled to. We know him to possess a clear head, and correct judgment on almost all subjects, and, therefore, we were the more surprised to find him, in that particular instance, so far short of the mark. He was evidently not present at the examination of the parties referred to, and therefore must have obtained his information second hand: and in his zeal, taking for granted all that had been stated to him as being strictly true, too hastily, we maintain charged upon certain tribunals, and judicial officers, conduct and proceedings totally at variance with the fundamental principles of our notion of the institution of marriage.

The statements involved sentiments of the greatest importance; and as they were calculated to convey wrong impressions, we felt ourselves called upon—having some knowledge of the facts in the case—in justice to the officers implicated; to set our friend right. In doing this it was not our wish to produce the least "soreness" of the tender sensibilities of our friend; and we still hope to retain the sunshine of his friendship.

Now a word or two in reference to the above. "A Correspondent" after an array of, what he calls, "unconvertible facts" in support of his position tells us that we are wilfully blind, and that we "intentionally" by many words, "darken counsel." Let this be as it may, we are glad to observe that we so far succeeded as to convince "A Correspondent" that what was said in reference to the Grand Jury was erroneous. Now, if he will revolve the subject once more in his mind, he will readily perceive that his assertion—that those marriages were the consequence of a Town Council ordinance—is also an error. The parties were arraigned before the Court of Quarter Sessions—this "A Correspondent" will admit, and we are sure he will also admit that the C. Q. S., is not a corporation tribunal, nor are the Town Council ordinances enforced there—then "A Correspondent" will take back that part of his assertion also. Further, we did not pretend to say that "A Correspondent" had not witnessed "the marriage of some three or four Kroo-men to a corresponding number of American women"—and truly upon the books of some Justice of the Peace, a record of such marriages may be found in due season.

We have said nothing of these—nor do we pretend to deny that many such marriages have taken place. And why not, if no lawful impediment exists?—And we will not either take the ipse dixit or exparte statement of Mr. Prince or Mr. Jim-a-Jim on which to consign them to Timbuctoo—or extract from them "the penal money of their bonds." Fair play Mr. Correspondent. We confined our remarks to the parties accused before the court—and wished to correct the assertion that "the court had directed their marriage &c., &c. We still maintain that only one of those parties has taken to himself a "rib"—and would, therefore, recommend "A Correspondent" to a further search after truth. Herald.

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr. Herald:—

Permit me to throw out a few suggestions, to the public, through your columns. In thinking of late upon means calculated the better to enhance the growing interests of our common country, my mind has cogitated upon two plans, or schemes, which if properly developed, will tend in the opinion of your humble servant, to great and lasting consequences. The first is, the holding National Agricultural Fairs in Monrovia, annually or biennially, the first to be held (say) in January 1853—which will allow time for due preparation to be made therefor:—the second is, the running a steamboat of sufficient capacity for practicability in the Liberian waters, to plough our noble rivers and ply the coast, facilitating and promoting the more rapid and extensive inter-communication of the country.

The idea of holding National Agriculture Fairs, suggested itself to my mind while pondering our Agricultural interests in general. That Agriculture—if not now—will be acknowledged emphatically the bone and sinew of Liberia, I think no reflecting person will deny,—certainly, not with success

But as it now is—dependant upon the fluctuating and capricious effort of a few isolated individuals, unsupported by even the sympathies of the great mass. (!) Agriculture must remain comparatively weak, unsystematic, and uncared for. Aggregation in all things is well. yea, ten, a thousand fold better for purpose, than isolation: nine threads added to one make ten, which for strength are ten times as strong as one, and by parity one hundred are stronger than ten—and so on to a thousand. So if ten persons engage in agricultural pursuits they will give a vitality and energy unseen when one only was engaged therein, and if through general sympathy one hundred or one thousand be led to engage therein, they will in due proportion enhance the system in interest and importance. A common end, a common cause, common principles, produce common sympathies, and in order to awaken and command them, we should appeal strongly to the common feelings of a common people, who unitedly tend to a common destiny: and by bringing before the nation the importance of agriculture through the means of Fairs to be regularly holden, a chord will be struck in the national heart which vibrating through the whole system will throw off responsive notes from the people, and thereby an impetus must be given to agriculture which shall be felt far and wide. Agriculture is a science as well as an art, and he who is best acquainted therewith will realize the more success, and he who meets with the more success in producing will enjoy the more of public patronage, will lend most to manufactures, and most advance the interests and happiness of society Let, then, this matter be attended to. for I am sure the Legislature will countenance such a scheme for improvement, by passing resolutions commending and approving the same.

The idea of a steam-boat in Liberia for the purpose afore mentioned. will, I know be laughed at by some repudiated by others and be indignantly scouted by more. But. what of that, Mr. Herald? What enterprise brought with consequences of good, was ever mooted that did not meet with the most strenuous opposition? Let Fulton let the Am: Col: Society answer! But let us look at the practicability of the subject. A steamboat of 18 horse power sufficiently commodious for passengers and freight can be procured in the United States and delivered here for $4000. and she can be kept running here six months for $1000 more—by the expiration of which time she will evince to a demonstration the practicability of the scheme; the whole amount required to ascertain which, is $5000. This say the objectors, is the sine qua non that can not be acquired. Stop: We will see as to that. Let us try it. There is no one Liberian willing to invest that amount in a steamboat or any other stock as his risk would be too much: in case of a failure he would loose all and possibly impoverish himself. But, that the plan may work well and immediately affect more, let the stock be apportioned into one hundred shares of $50 each; let these shares be put out among the citizens of Liberia and he who cannot purchase one share can join with his neighbor, and they two can purchase one in the name of one of them; and he who can, let him purchase even ten shares or more; let there be stockholders appointed to attend to the business of the company, men who shall be responsible and render an account to the company at the expiration of every six months, at which time let a pro rata dividend be made of the profit or loss which may accrue. Let us see what the steam-boat is likely to do She can ply St Paul's river for passengers and freight at stated times: she can go on pic nic and other excursions.—and she will induce them frequently she can unlade vessels in our anchorage, bringing the freight to our wharves, she can ply the coast to our different settlements with and for freight and passengers at stated times. her trips being prompt and her charges moderate: and would she not thus become a profitable stock to the company pecuniarily,—not to mention her service and importance to community in facilitating inter-communication and saving the great loss of time, expense, and life, which we are now so necessarily (though for the want of enterprise) subject to? You will no doubt, Hr. Herald, express your views upon the subjects of this communication whether they be to back them up or to oppose them: I shall however attempt to defend these propositions if it becomes necessary for me to do so

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr. Herald.

I humbly beg a space in your paper, which petition I trust will be granted. I am no writer, no boaster, and certainly no Grammarian; but as you are like all other Editors, greedy for information of importance; pardon me when I say that I am not adequate to the task of affording it just at this moment: there is, however, a character who in your paper for Oct. 1st, 1851, have appeared over the "Soubriqun" of Simon Pure, a splendid fellow a good Grammarian, and all this sort of things. Now between you, the gate post and all Liberia, permit me to ask who is this wonderful Prodigy of modern days, dealing out his deadly poison versus Mr. Hicks, and that in a low dirty style; but laying aside all jokes I would like to have been behind Polonius's hiding place, (the arras) while this wonderful fire brand was being penned by our Hero, whose legs must have resembled old Falstaff's, while giving an account of the Gyves in use, in the days of Henry the IV. we think the creeking of our Hero's literary pen would have thrown me into a bad way, like "Niobe" all tears the melody of its music would have lulled me into a commitose state—there is however, but one step from the sublime to the ridiculous, and this step old Simon has adopted, mid all of his boasted talent. But who is the secret author with his usual great big, little swell of self-impudence? I pause for an answer—since Mum is the word—I therefore venture to inform you my readers, who this great big little youngster is.

He is no less than one Liberia boaster, surnamed the unfledged Harpie, who has assumed the name of "S. Pure;" well, we will call him so. Now old Simon, come out of that old sedan of yours and lay aside your un quaked "Vuelta abajo" for none of us are able to use them here but you, your being one of the "Hydulgas" accounts for it. I say come forth old Boy and let us smell you—you have now been indulging under the borrowed Paraphanalia of others ever since the convention met to form the Constitution of our Republic, and I must confess that you supposed yourself in the right, and why not old Boy, since you are one of the "Elite" of Liberia, but more properly of Monrovia. the emporium, for here you "reign a very, very Peacock" —again old Simon you say that on the 8th Sept. last, that you had no business in Court, and that you were in and about its parlieus by way of whiling away the time.—Not true old boy! for there is ample proof that you told N M. Hicks differently 3 days prior to said Court—you have tried old Simon to make an impression on the minds of your readers that N. M. Hicks is a swindler; here Simon you would if you knew how, use the Stilletto in the dark, but in this old Simon your intention was to "speak, daggers" but use none.—Here it is proper that I should inform my readers, that this old boy and N. M. Hicks have been rather too intimate, and that it is singular that old Simon should act thus. This is it—The old coon failed to confer with his "Talisman." Old Simon further informs his readers that N. M. Hicks's liabilities are enormous, and that his assets are but one 12th.—

O wonderful, a second Daniel come to judgment!" poor N. M. Hicks, I would advise him to be comforted, since misery is fond of company; do you take old boy?—or do you see what I would be at. But what about whiling away the time; now old Simon, get away in thy ever-homeward coin, for it is only since Oct. or Nov. 1850 that you have presumed to make so free use of the word "while away the time, all," good old boy, get an inkling when you can I would here inform my readers that "Simon Pure" having been at great costs in winning golden opinions from all sorts of people, keeps me in mind of the same sir I Falstaff, who boasted of his sack, and our Hero of his influence and money —never-theless he is an honest boy;—Bob Handy says so, and Bob Handy is a good sort of a soul —I quite forgot to say that it is conceded that old Simon has an eye like Mars to threaten and command, and if the major part of the ground being caused to quake for fear, on hearing the very stones prate of the whereabouts of this grand re, why should I a pigmy not do the same? Now old Simon you are lucky in your way, and no wonder, since you have accustomed yourself to the use of that celebrated medicine, which in lead is simple and mild in its effects, is of ancient or in and called soft soap, unlike the sulphat of quinine. is sold by the ton instead of the ounce.—Again old coon you are said to be self poised. floating upon the surface of stability,—and so is the corner post of a house: but just knock away the proper braces and down it rolls, and great will be the fall!—But logic old Boy, went do, went do horse, —yet Simon I cannot leave you, for there is something about you which hath a charm, when you commence swelling and boasting about your unequaled influence as well as that borrowed degree of "Nonchallance with which you speak of your money. It is enough to disgust a wild "Bedouan;" ay! to cure the Canine Kind of the Hydrophobia. and after all this old boy, joined to that noted old Sedan; behind the fumes of a choice "Vuelta abajo" may be said to be a lovely piece of flesh.—He is far superior to any thing of his sort; being free from debet,—very well read, at outrages for his Bankers:—abroad loaded with Diplomatic confidence, a "Cid vant alenda" and all this sort of things, that thereby hangs a tale.—Come forth old Boy, come forth I say, and appease the rage of our Alfacries. Old Boy you are certainly a big man, and if Liberia looses you, she must go to rot. But what induced you to publish that dirty stuff, that Mr. Hicks,— had much better held your tongue, for you in this acting, proved yourself guilty of blowing hot and cold upon the same breath.—Ah! old Boy this is what they call getting off to get one better, so you miss it; you could not come it quite horse.—I humbly beseech you old Simon to abandon that old Sedan and come forth and listen to a round & unvarnished tale—not a tale of mystery.—Not long since the whole ear of Liberia was rankly abused about an article which appeared over the signature of Alpha, and when it was said that this old Boy was the author, O how it pleased him, he was like the neighing steed; he capered and drove off, with what he supposed the palm —Falstaff did the same when he plunged the dagger into Hotspur giving that Percy, after he was already dead,—so you see old Boy you will have to run for it again.—Now old Boy suppose you get some one to write out an article over the signature of Omega, then you might get the purse;—but old Boy I pity you —get out your old "He Popingjay" and leave off that old fashion of yours—feeling in the dark if the light is out.—Now by way of condolence, permit me to say old Boy you are most done,—some cheer up old coon, you are said to be good at counselling.—This is the—my name is two common, insomuch that dogs bark at me as I halted by them —what think you of a motion to the ensuing Legislature to change it! Be candid old Boy, for your influence with that body is like the dark blue sea —Deep!! Deep!!! Again you have done the State some service and they know it—now just look how he swells in self aggrandisement, Ah old Simon, you have kept an evil dam—which required the cathartic I just administered soft soap pulverized, you say that it is high time that Liberians should commence taking rigid steps with all persons guilty of swindling transactions, I grant it, but we must hold to this maxim—that charity begins at home—then by the next Legislature if she does her duty must —call for her own.—But Simon you have I say done the State some service, and they know it—now old Simon, you had better repair to the valley of Mandragora, till you shall have been healed of your diseased opinions, for they are dirty. —I say old Sy, is it true that you a few evenings since called a caucus, forced them to flatter your wonderful tyrade versus Mr. Hicks, and you in the center of a semi-circle, awing them to obedience, and what must have been your appearance! I will tell you—it was anything but handsome.—But I know you coon, tho' you have assumed a fictitious name, but old Boy better look after thine own business—

The Interior.

A few days since, we had a conversation with a Chief of the Pesse tribe respecting the trade of the interior. He professed to have considerable knowledge of it, and said what many have long known, that a few days walk beyond Bo-Poro, the country is thickly settled, and the inhabitants are a trading people. The trade of that country does not find its way here, owing to the rapacious character of the people of Bo-Poro. Some of our readers, may remember, that at one time, gold was brought into our market; and that it was through the Bo-Poro people that the trade with the rich interior ended.

Coming from beyond Bo-Poro, travellers necessarily have to pass through or near it, and the chances are ten to one, that they fall in with strolling parties of Bo-Porians who either rob, or carry them before some of their head-men, and then under some pretext they are compelled to retrace their steps with empty hands.

The people of the wealthy interior have no intercourse with us—they carry their ivory, gold and hides to Sierra Leone, and the Gambia—they would, comparatively speaking, have but a short distance to come, if they had an unmolested route to Liberia—to the jorney they now have to make to carry on their trade.

The Bo-Poro, people live by plunder—they attack defenseless towns, take away every thing they can find and make the inhabitants slaves.

We would advise government to give some attention to the interior—let it send commissioners to Bo-Poro, to demand the reason why traffers are interfered with on their way to Liberia: and indeed, commissioners might be sent beyond Bo-Poro to encourage the traders to open their trade with us.

Hereafter we will again refer to this subject; our object now is, to attract the notice of the people to it: that they may give it consideration, in time so that they will be prepared to urge the matter before the Legislature in December next.

Revival of Religeon—great out pouring, and in gathering:—The army of the living God has had battle with the powers of darkness, superstition, and idolitry;—and victory rests among the ranks of Zion. All praise and glory to God !!

For weeks past the churches in and about Monrovia, and the settlements along the banks of the St. Paul, have been blessed with a wonderful out pouring of the Holy Spirit. An awful solemnity for some days, seemed to pervade the whole community. Scores of souls, we understand, have experienced converting grace,—And among them, a number of the aborigines. 'Spite the efforts of the wicked one, Etheopia shall stretch out her hands unto God.

Our Quaker friends, Mr. and Mrs. Jones have been holding meetings in all the towns and villages of the Republic they have been able to visit, and we learn, express themselves highly gratified at the attention with which their message of love was received by the People. May their labors be abundantly blessed.

UNITED STATES.

EXPLORATION OF THE INTERIOR OF AFRICA —The Washington correspondent of the Journal of Commerce states that Lieut. M. C Watkins, of the Navy, has laid a plan for the exploration of Africa before the Secretary of the Navy. He simply asks leave of absence or present pay for himself, one Midshipman, one Engineer, and six mechanics now belonging to the naval service. He asks also for the use of a small iron steamer, which he will take out to Africa in one of the Government store-ships He does not even ask for rations for his party, as he expects to procure supplies very cheaply by traffic with the natives. Ten thousand dollars will cover all the expenses of the expedition, which the Government is called upon to pay. Mr Watkins will take with him a draughtsman, a naturalist and a physician. Suitable men who are already acclimated, will volunteer for the enterprise. Six or eight colored men from Liberia, who are accustomed to the natives, and have been engaged in former explorations, will complete the party. They will first explore the St Paul's river, and trace it to its source, and afterwards the Niger and Congo rivers. Mr. Watkins is confident from information received when in Africa, that he can find coal fields on the St. Paul's, and if so, one of the chief obstacle to the establishment of a line of steamers between this country and Africa, will be removed. The expedition will also promote the colonization and civilization of Africa by ascertaining and making known its resources, and geography. It will open to the native tribes of Africa new subjects for commorce, and widen the boundaries of modern science and knowledge.

The colored members of the congregation of the Reformed Dutch Church (Rev. Mr. Van Neste's) at Round Brook, we are informed, have both this year and the last, made up a handsome purse to aid in distributing the Scriptures in the Republic of Liberia.

Here's a chance for some Liberian!—We earnestly hope that some citizen of the "New Republic" will put in his claim for this $150. Who better understands the subject?—And who is more likely to succeed?—No one: then try it.—HERALD

The sum of $150 has been placed in the hands of a gentleman of New York, by a colored man, formerly a slave in Cuba, to be appropriated in a manner deemed most eligible for the benefit of the negro population The person who holds the money, has offered it as a prize to the author of the best essay on the subject of emigration to Liberia Those who write for the reward, are desired to send their manuscripts to the editors of the New York Evening Post.

England.—On the occasion of the prorogation of Parliament, 8th, Sept. last—Her Majesty remarks, "I am happy to be able to congratulate you on the very considerable diminution which has taken place in the African and Brazilian slave trade. The exertions of my squadron on the coast of Africa and Brazil, assisted by the vigilance of the cruizers of France and the United States, and aided by the co-operation of the Brazilian Government have mainly contributed to this result." Has not Liberia too contributed her mite?—And is she not also entitled to some meed of praise? Had there been a Liberia, on the South Coast. Is it unreasonable to suppose that the slave trade there would be any more flourishing than on the west coast?—Certainly not—

But this announcement of Her Majesty is, indeed, gratifying; and we sincerely trust sufficiently encouraging to silence further opposition to the continuance of the blockading squadron on this coast. To withdraw the squadron, we hesitate not to say, will be to surrender nearly, if not all, that has been gained—and again abandon Africa to the ravages of her dead-liest foe. From so great a calamity, may an all-wise Providence deliver her!!

The third night after the arrival of the Ohio, Captain Ingalls had a serious difficulty with his crew in consequence of their complaints respecting the quality of the provisions. They refused to do duty, and peremtorily demanded their discharge.

At the request of Capt. Ingalls the Authorities interposed and succeeded in arranging the difficulty; and the men returned to duty. Strange that the U. S. SMILES AND TEARS

BY MATURIN M. BALLOU.

Repine not that so much of sorrow
Falleth to the lot of man!
We weep to-day, but smile to-morrow:
At best, life's but a span.

The fairest fruits our life adorning,
Come of mingled smiles and tears;
In life's eve, as in its morning,
This manifest appears.

Thus herbage and the fruits require
Both sunshine and the rain;
A wisdom than our own far higher,
Has mingled joy and pain.

The fields without the rain from heaven,
Would parch and wither dry;
So without tears by sorrow given,
The barren heart would die.

Then grieve not that so much of sorrow
Falleth to the lot of man;
We weep to-day, but smile to-morrow:
At best, life's but a span.

BIRTH-DAY OF CALIFORNIA.

In order to appreciate the story we are going to subjoin, the reader must recollect that three short years ago the name of California conveyed no more impressive ideas to European or American ears than that of Kamscatka or Bhootan. The country itself was a vast unexplorable desert, and the shores of the Pacific about San Francisco were scantily tenanted by a few scores of Rusians and Spaniards, who lived without rivalry or suspicion, and who scarcely waited for the sanction of their respective governments to effect such changes or sales of ground convenience might suggest. Nobody knew or cared whether the enormous tract beyond contained inhabitants or not, and a journey across its plains was considered as remarkable as a journey across the desert of Central Africa. If we were to speak at this moment of the province of Sonora, it is probable that nine tenths of our readers would be without any distinct conceptions of the locality referred to, yet Sonora is the next "country" to California, and in 1847 one region was about as well known as the other.

This remote district is now the seat of a powerful independent State—a State which has been founded and constructed, from beginning to end, in about thirty months time, and which, though junior in political birth even to the French Republic, has obtained a formal recognition of its existence, and is exercising all the functions of an organized commonwealth. When the precious metals of Potosi and Peru were first poured into Europe, the discovery exerted an instantaneous influence on the affairs of the Old world, but failed to create any corresponding movements in the new. The treasures of California, on the contrary, have hitherto wrought their chief wonders in the land of their production, and, though they have not yet materially affected the currency of Europe, they have called into being at the extremities of the Pacific a community unparalleled in the manifold fusions of men. Apart therefore, from the amusing features of the following sketch, we seriously commend to the reader's observation the extraordinary purport of the scene, as an earnest of what the industry of all nations may succeed in commanding.
